Dissention be-

Edward and Glocester.

telne. In the forthe and fourth ycare of king Henries reigne, the first daie following the feast of Simon and Jude, in a parlement holden at Westminster, were read in ptesence of all the lordes and commons, the acts and ordinaunces made in the parlement holden at Orenford, with certeine other articles by the gouernours therevnto added and annexed. After the reading wherof the archbishop of Canturburie being requested with his suffragans to the number of nine bishops, besides abbats and others, denounced all them accursed that attempted in word or deed to bzeake the said statutes, or anie of them. In the same parlement was granted to the king a talke called scutagium, or escuage, that is to saie, forthe shillings of euerie knights fee throughout England, the which extended to a great summe of monie. For as diuerse writers do agree, there were in England at that time in possession of the spiritualtie and tempozaltie beyond forthe thousand knights fees, but almost halfe of them were in spiritual mens hands.

Upon the first day of Nouember the king came vnto Paules, where by his commandement was the folkemote court assembled, and the king (according to the former ordinaunces made) asked licence of the communalte of the citie to passe the sea, and promised there in the ptesence of a great multitude of people, by the mouth of Hugh Bigod his chiefe iustice, to be good and gracious lord vnto the citie, and to mainteine the liberties thereof unhurt. Wherewith the people for ioy made a great shout. The eight day of Nouember he rode through the citie towards the sea side, and vpon the thirteenth daie of Nouember, he toke the sea at Douer and arriued at Whitland; and so from thence he rode vnto Paris, where, of the French king he was most honozable receiued. The cause of his going ouer was chiefele to conclude some assured peace with the French king, that he should not need to doubt any foren enemies, if he should come to haue warre with his owne people, whereof he saw great likelihoods, and therefore he made such agreement with king Lewes (as in the French historie more at large appeareth) which (to be short) I here omit.

This one thing is here to be noted, that besides the monie which king Henrie had in hand, amounting to the summe of an hundred and fiftie thousand crownes for his resignation then made vnto For-mandie, Aniou and Paine, it was accorded, that he should receiue yearelie in name of a tribute the sum of ten thousand crownes. Others write that he had three hundred thousand pounds of small Turon mo-nie, which he receiued in readie payment, and was promised restitution of lands to the value of twentie thousand pounds of yearelie rent: and that after the deceale of the French king, that then was, the counte of Poitou should retorne vnto the English dominion. Some write that immediatlie after king Henrie had concluded his agreement, he began to repent himselfe thereof, and would neuer receiue penie of the monie, nor leaue out in his stile the title of duke of Normandie. But it is rather to be thought that such an agreement was at point to haue bene concluded, or at the leastwise was had in talke, but yet neuer concluded nor confirmed with hands and seales, as it ought to haue bene, if they had gone through with it.

In the meane time that king Henrie was thus occupied in France, dissention fell in England betwixt prince Edward and Richard earle of Glocester, for the appeasing wherof a parlement was called at Westminster, to the which the lordes came with great companies, and speciallie the said prince and earle. They intended to haue lodged within the citie; but the maiors going vnto the bishop of Glocester, to sir Hugh Bigod, and to sir Philip Basset (vnto whome, and to the archbishop of Canturburie, the k. had committed the rule of the land in his absence) required to know their pleasure here in. Wherupon they thought it good to haue the aduise of Richard the king of Almaine, and thereupon went to him, where they concluded, that neither the said prince nor earle nor anie of their partakers should come within the citie, the gates wherof were by the maiors appointment closed and kept with watch and ward both day and night. Some after also, for the more safegard of the citie, the gates were by the maiors appointment closed and kept with diligent watch and ward both day and night. Some after also for the more safegard of the said citie, and sure keeping of the peace, the king of Almaine with the said sir Hugh and sir Philip came and lodged in the citie with their companies, and such other as they would assigne, to strengthen the citie if need required. Wher in their prouident consent to withstand so foule a mischief as sedition might haue bred in the citie, deserueth high commendation, for it was the next waie to preserve the state thereof against all occasions of ruine, to witte harts and hands in so sweet an harmonie, which the law of nature teacheth men to do, and as by this sage sentence is insinuated and giuen to vnderstand,

Manus manum lauat & digitus digitum,

Vir virum & ciuitas ciuitatem.

Shortlie after, the king returned out of France, and about the feast of S. Sparke came to London, and lodged in the bishops palace. And because of cer-teine rumors that were spzed abroad sounding to some euill meaning, which prince Edward should haue against his father, the king brought ouer with him a great power of men in armes being strangers, howbeit he brought them not into the citie, but left them beyond the bridge in the parts of Surrie, notwithstanding being entred the citie, he so kept the gates and entrees, that none was permitted to enter, but such as came in by his sufferance. The earle of Glocester by his appointment also was lodged within the citie, and the prince in the palace at Westminster. Shortlie after by the kings commandement he removed to S. Johns, & all the other lordes were lodged without the citie, and the king of Almaine removed againe to Westminster. In which time a drection was taken betwixt the said parties, and a new assemble and parlement assigned to be kept in the quindeine of S. John Baptist, and after deferred or prorogued till the feast of Saint Edward; at the which time all things were pacified a while, but so as the earle of Glocester was not beside the roome which he had amongst other the peers, and so then he joined in friendship with the earle of Leicester, as it were by way of confederacie against the residue, and yet in this last contention, the said earle of Leicester toke part with the prince against the earle of Glocester.

This ycare the lord William de Beauchampe the elder deceased. The lord Edward the kings sonne, with a faire companie of knights and other men of armes, passed the seas to exercise himselfe in iusts, but he himselfe and his men were euill intreated in manie places, so that they lost horse, armour, and all other things to his great grieve and disliking (as may be esteemed) yet (as some write) he returned home with blazour in the iusts. This ycare at Leukeburte, a Jew falling by chance into a talle spout the saturdaye, in remembrance of his sabbath would not suffer any man to plucke him forth, wherof the earle of Glocester being aduertised, thought the christians should doe as much reverence to their sabbath which is sundae, and therefore would suffer no man to go about to take him forth that day, and so lieng thit

Death of Rich.
Eleanore.

Diuers noble men departed this life in this peare, as the earle of Albemarle, the lord William Beauchampe, Stephen de Longespée lord chiefe iustice of Ireland, and Roger de Turkeby one of the kings chiefe counsellors and iustices of the land, William de Kirkham bishop of Durham, and John de Crake hales treasurer of England, a spiritiual man, but rich beyond measure: also Henrie de Ba another of the kings iustices of the bench. In the 45 peare of king Henries reigne, Alexander king of Scotland came to London anon after the feast of S. Edward, with a faire companie of Scotishmen, and shortly after his wife the quene of Scots came thither also. Forpouer king Henrie kept a roiall feast at Westminster, there he made to the number of foure score knights, amongst whom, John sonne to the earle of Britaine, who had married the ladie Beatrice, one of the kings daughters was there made knight. Shortly after was sir Hugh Spenser made lord chiefe iustice.

After Christmasse the 11. comming into the towre of London, fortified it greatlie, & caused the gates of the citie to be warded, sending forth commandement to his lords that they should come to the towre, there to hold a parlement; but they denied that he so to do, sending him word that if it pleased him, they would come to Westminster, where usually the parlement had bene kept, and not to any other place, whereupon there rose dissention betwixt him and the barons. After the feast of the Purification, at a folkemote holden at Baules crose (where the king was present in person, with the king of Almaine, the archbishop of Canturburie, and diuerse other of the nobles) commandement was giuen to the maior, that euerie striping of the age of 12 peares and aboue, should before his alderman be sworn to be true to the king and his heires kings of England, and that the gates of the citie should be kept with armed men, as befoze by the king of Romans was deuised.

The presumptuous procedings of the barons against the king.

About Easter the barons of the land with consent of the prelates, discharged sir Hugh Spenser of his office of chiefe iustice, and placed in his come sir Philip Basset without the kings assent, he being not made priue thereunto. Whereupon a new occasion of displeasure was ministered to kindle debate betwixt the king and his lords, but by the policie of the king of Almaine and some prelates, the matter was quieted for a time, till after at Hallowentide next ensuing, which was the 46 peare of H. Henries reigne. At that time the barons took upon them to discharge such shiriffes as the king had elected & named gardians of the countiees and shires; and in their places put other shiriffes, and besides that would not suffer the iustice which the king had admitted, to do his office in keeping his circuit, but appointed such to do it, as it pleased them to assigne, whereupon the king was so much offended, that he laboured by all means to him possible about the disanulling of the ordinances made at Oxford; and upon the second fundaie in Lent, he caused to be read at Baules crose a bull, ordained of pope Urbane the fourth, as a confirmation of an other bull before purchased of his predecessor pope Alexander, for the abolishing of the king, and all other that were sworn to the maintenance of the articles agreed upon at Oxford. This abolition he caused to be shewed through the realmes of England, Wales & Ireland, giving straight charge that if any person were found that would disobey this abolition, the same should be committed to prison, there to remaine till the kings pleasure were further knowen.

March. West.
Amp. gouern.

Swerte the most part of those prelates which had the rule of the king and kingdom thus in their hand, perceiuing the enormitie that baslie grew of so manifold heaps and gouernours, were minded of themselves to dissolve those provisions and ordinances so made at Oxford, in somuch that there were but five which stilled stood in defense of the same, that is to saie, the bishop of Worcester, and the earles of Leicester and Gloucester, with Henrie Spenser, and Peter de Spontfort, the which by no means could be brought to confesse that they might with a safe conscience go contrarie to those ordinances which they had confirmed with their solemn oth, notwithstanding the popes dispensation; whereas the same oth was rather a bond of iniquitie (as saith March. Westminster) deuised to conspire against Christ and his annointed, that is to saie, their naturall liege lord and lawfull king, than any goodlie oth aduiseable taken, or necessarie to be receiued of god meaning subiects, yea and of such a frivulous oth it is said, that

In June the king of Almaine took shipping and sailed ouer into Dutchland, and king Henrie at a folkemote holden at Baules crose the fundaie after S. Peters day, had licence to saile into France, and the morowe after he departed from London towards the sea side, with the quene and other lords, his two sonnes prince Edward and the earle of Lancaster being at that present in Guen. When he had bene a season in France, he went unto Bourdeaur, and there fell sicke of a feuer quartane, by occasion whereof he taried in those parties till S. Nicholas tide next following. There were few that went ouer with him that escaped free without the same disease, so that in manner all his companie were taken and sore handled therewith. Marie died thereof to the number of thre score, and amongst them as chiefe were these, Baldwin de Lisle earle of Deuonshire, Ingram de Berce, and William de Beauchampe.

In this peare died Richard the Clare earle of Gloucester, and his sonne sir Gilbert de Clare was earle after him, unto whom his father gaue great charge that he should mainteine the ordinances of Oxford. In the 47 peare of king Henries reigne, by reason that a Jew had wounded a christian man at London within Colechurch, in the ward of Cheap, not onelie the said Jew was slaine by other christians that followed him home to his house, but also manie other Jewes were robbed and slaine in that furie and rage of the people. The Welshmen with their prince Llewlin made wars against the men and tenants of Roger de Mortimer; and took two of his castles (the one called Ikenet) and rased them both to the ground. The said Roger being sore grieved herewith, got such assistance as he could of other lords there in the marches, and watching the Welshmen at aduantage, distressed diuerse companies of them, sometime thre hundred, sometime foure hundred, and other whiles six hundred. But at one time he lost thre hundred of his souldiers that were entred the countie, and so he trusted that they could make no shift to escape.

Upon the euen of S. Thomas the apostle, the king landed at Wboud, and came to London the Wednesday before the bodie day of Christ made. In this peare the frost began about S. Nicholas date, and continued for the space of a moneth and more; so extreme, that the Thames was frozen, so that men passed ouer on horsebacke. The same winter the kings little hall at Westminster, with manie other houses thereunto adjoining, was consumed with fire, by negligence of one of the kings seruants. Variance rose betwixt the citizens of London, and the constable of the towre, for that contrarie to the liberties of the citie he took certeine ships passing by the towre with wheat and other vittels into the towre, making noys pernicious to a commonwealth.

The Londoners rob the house of the lord Gray.

Prince Edward the kings sonne returning from the parts beyond the sea, went with a great power (as well of Englishmen as strangers) against the Welshmen towards Snowdon hills: but the enemies withdrawing themselves to their strength within the woods and mounteines, he could not much indamage them, whereupon after he had fortified certeine castles in those parts, with men, munition, and vittels, he returned being sent for backe of his father. The archbishop of Cantuarburie seeking the trouble that was like to issue betwixt the king and his barons, got licence of the king to go unto Rome, about such businesse as he failed to haue to do with the pope, and so departed the land, and kept him a while till the trouble was appeased. Upon Midlent sundaie, at a folkemote holden at Pannes crosse, before sir Philip Basset and other of the kings counsell, the maior of London was sworne to be true to the king, and to his heires kings of England, and upon the morrow at the Guildhall euerie alderman in presence of the maior took the same oth. And upon the sundaie following, euerie inhabitant within the citie, of the age of 12 yeares and above, before his alderman in his ward was newlie charged with the like oth.

Then began the displeasure betwene the king and his barons to appeare, which had bene long kept secret, diuers of whom assembling together in the marches of Wales, gathered unto them a power of men, and sent a letter unto the king, vnder the seale of sir Roger Clifford, beseeching him to haue in remembrance his oth and manifold promises made for the obseruing of the statutes ordeined at Oxford. But although this letter was indited and written verie effectually, yet received they no answer from the king, who minded in no wise to obserue the same statutes, as by euident tokens it was most apparent. Whereupon they determined to attempt by force to bring their purpose to passe. The king and the queene for their more safegard got them into the towne of London, and prince Edward laie at Clerkenwell, but such necessity and discredit for monie, that neither had they any force to furnish their wants, neither was there any man that would trust them with a groat.

Prince Edward not able to abide such dishonor, in the feast of the apostle Peter and Paule, taking with him Robert Waleran, and certeine others, went to the new temple, and there calling for the keeper of the treasure-house, as if he meant to see his mothers Jewels, that were laid up there, to be safely kept, he entred into the house, and breaking the coffers of certeine persons, that had likewise brought their monie thither, to haue it in more safetie, he took away from thence the value of 1000 pounds.

Magnum pauperies opprobrium inbet in illis Quidam facere et pati in illis, et in illis vntusque vnam deserit ardua.*

The citizens of London were so offended herewith that they rose in armour against him and other of the kings counsell, in somuch that they assailed the lodging of the lord John Gray without Ludgate, and took out of his stables 32 horses, and such other things as they might laie hold upon, keeping such sure that the lord Gray himselfe was forced to flee beyond Fleetbridge. The like rule they kept at the house of John de Basseleu.

John Mansell departing forth of the towne to the Thames, with the countesse de Aile, and other ladies that were strangers borne, sailed into France, and landed at Whittland, where the said Mansell hearing that the lord Henrie, sonne to the king of Almaine, that then held with the barons was in those parts, he caused the lord Ingram de Fines to stile him as prisoner, and so he remained, till king Henrie upon the agreement betwixt him and the barons, found meanes to get him released, and so then he returned into England.

But now touching the barons, they proceeded in their businesse which they had in hand with all earnest diligence, of whome these were the chiefe that undertooke this matter: young Humfrie de Boun, the lord Henrie son to the king of Almaine, Henrie Spontford, Hugh Spenser, Baldwin Wake, Gilbert Cusford, Richard Gray, John Kos, William Sparmon, Henrie Hastings, Waimon le Strange, John Fitz John, Godfrey Lacie, Nicholas Segraue, Roger de Leiboine, John Welle, Roger de Clifford, John de Claus, Gilbert de Clare, Gilbert de Lacie, and Robert Wepont, the which with one generall consent leued for their chiefe captains and generall gouernours, Simon de Mountfort earle of Leicester, Gilbert of Clare earle of Gloucester, and Robert Ferris earle of Darbie, and John earle of Warren. On the kings part these persons are named to stand with him against the other. First, Roger Bigod earle of Hereford, and Suffolke, Humfrie de Boun earle of Hereford, Hugh Bigod lord chiefe iustice, Philip Basset, William de Valence, Geoffrey de Laignan, Peter de Sauoy, Robert Walrand, John Mansell, Geoffrey Langley, John Gray, William Latimer, Henrie Berrie, and manie other. The barons notwithstanding hauing assembled their powers, resolved to go through with their purpose.

The first enterprise they made was at Hereford, where they took the bishop of that se named John Beeton, and as manie of his canons as were strangers borne. After this they took sir Mathew de Weylles knight of Gloucester, a stranger borne, and keeping on their waie towards London, with banners displayed, so manie as came within their reach, whom they knew to be against the maintenance of the statutes of Oxford, they spoiled them of their houses, robbed them of their goods, and imprisoned their bodies, hauing no regard whether they were spirituall men or temporall. In diuers of the kings castles they placed such captains and soldiers as they thought convenient, and displaced others whom they either knew or suspected to be aduersaries to their purpose.

About the thirtieth of March when they were nere to London, they sent a letter to the mayor and aldermen vnder the seale of the earle of Hereford, willing to understand whether they would obserue the aces and statutes established at Oxford, or else aid and aduise such persons as meant the breach of the same. And here with they sent unto them a copie of those articles, with a provision, that if any of them were principall, or in any wise hurtfull to the reuerie and common wealth, that then the same by the advice of discreet persons should be amended and reformed. The maior bare this letter, and the copie of the articles unto the king, who in this meane time remained in the towne of London, together with the queene and the king of Almaine, latelie returned out of Almaine, also his sonne prince Edward, and manie other of his counsell. The king asked of the maior what he thought of those articles: who made such answer as the king seemed seemed well pleased therewith, and so permitted the maior to returne againe into the citie, who toke much paine in keeping the citie in good quiet now in that dangerous time.

All such the inhabitants as were strangers borne, and suspected to fauour either of the parties, were banished the citie, but within a while after, prince Edward let them of the most part of them in offices within the castell of Wyndsoze. On the saturday next after the translation of saint Benet, as the queene would haue passed by water from the towre vnto Wyndsoze, a sort of lewd naughtypacks got them to the bridge, making a noise at hir, and crying; *Do youne the witch, thew do youne stones, cudgels, dirt, and other things at hir, so that she escaped in great danger of hir person, fled to Lambeth, and through feare to be further pursued, landed there, and so she staid till the maior of London with much ado appeasing the furie of the people, repaired to the queene and brought hir backe againe in safetie vnto the towre. so that the whole citie revolted from him, and prepa- red to besiege him in the castell, not doubting but easilie to win it. When he saw how the world went, he sent to the bishop of Worcester that was of the barons side, promising that he would agree with the barons, if he would helpe to deliuer him out of the Bristow mens hands. The bishop taking his promise conueied him forth in safetie toward the court; but when he came nere vnto Wyndsoze, he turned thi- ther, greatlie to the mistaking of the bishop; yet neuertheless when the barons came forward to besiege that castle, the lord Edward met them not farre from Abington, offering them conditions of peace. Some write that he was traied and not suffered to returne againe to Wyndsoze, after he had ended his talkes with the barons; but howsoeuer it was, the castell was surrendered, with condition that those that were within it should safelie depart, and so they did; and were conueied to the sea by Humfrey de Bohun the younger. About the same time, Leolin prince of Wales destroyed the lands of prince Edward in Cheshire, and the marches therabouts. The two castles of Delford and Cannoc he toke and destroyed, being two very faire fortresses.

About the feast of the Ascension of our Moie, there was a parlement holden at London, at the which all the nobles of the realme both spiritual and tempo- rall were present, and then the citie of London, and the cinque ports joined in league as confederats with the barons; but the king plainlie protested be- fore all the assemblee, that by the statutes and proui- sions (as they termed them) made at Wrenford, he was much deceived. For contrarie to that which the barons had promised, he felt himselfe rather charged with more debt than anie thing released; and there- fore sith he had obtained of the pope an absolution of the oth both for himselfe and his people, his request was to be restored vnto his former estate of all such prerogatiues as in time past he had inioied. The barons on the other side stiffelie mainteined, that they could not with safe consciences go against their oth, and therefore they meant to stand in defense of the articles aforesaid euen so long as they had a daie to liue.

Thus thilest both parts kept so farre from all hope of agreement, and were now in point to haue depar- ted in sunder, through mediation of some bishops that were present a peace was concluded, and the parties so agreed, that all matters in controuersie touching the articles, prouiisions, and statutes made at Wrenford should be ordered and iudged by the French king, whom they chose as arbitrator betwixt them. Whereupon, on the thirtenth of September, both the king and queene, with their sonnes, and di- uerse other of the nobles of this land, toke shipping, and sailed ouer to Bullongne, where the French king as then was at a parlement, with a great number of the nobles and pères of France. The earle of Le- cester also with diuerse of his complices went thi- ther, and there the matter was opened, argued, and debated before the French king, who in the end vpon due examination, and orderlie hearing of the whole proceesse of all their controuersies, gaue expresse sen- tence, that all and euerie of the said statutes and or- dinances deuised at Wrenford, should be from thence- forth utterlie void, and all bonds and promises made by king Henrie, or anie other for performance of them, should likewise be aduiled, fordone, and clearelie cancelled.

The barons highlie displeased herewith, refused to stand to the French kings award herein, because he had iudged altogether on the kings side. Whereupon after they were returned into the realme, either par- tie prepared for warre; but yet about the feast of S. Edward,

Edward, the king and the barons chifones met at London, holding a new parliament at Westminster, but no good could be done. Then when the king of Almaine and prince Edward, with others of the kings counsell saw that by rapine, oppression, and extortion practised by the barons against the kings subjects, as well spirituall as temporall, the state of the realme and the kings honour was much decayed, and brought in manner unto utter ruine, they procured the king to withdraw secretly from Westminster unto Windsoze castell, of which his sonne prince Edward had gotten the possession by a traine. From Windsoze he went to Reading, and from thence to Wallingford, and so to Oxford, having a great power with him.

At his being at Oxford there came unto him the lord Henrie, son to the king of Almaine, John earle Warren, Roger Clifford, Roger Leiboine, Hamond le Strange, and John de Clare, which had revolted from the barons to the kings side. John de Clare also did the like: but he shortly after returned to the barons part againe. The kings sonne the lord Edward had procured them thus foredoit, promising to euerie of them in reward by his charter of grant fiftie pounds lands to aid the king his father and him against the barons.

After this the king went to Winchester, and from thence came backe unto Reading, and then he marched south with his armie unto Dover, where he could not be suffered to come into the castell, being kept out by the lord Richard Gray that was capteine there. Hereupon he returned to London, where the barons againe were entred, through favour of the commoners, against the will of the chiefe citizens, and here they fell chifones to treat of agreement, but their talke profited nothing. And so in the Christmasse weeke the king, with his sonne prince Edward and diuerse other of the counsell sailed ouer againe into France, and went to Amiens, where they found the French king, and a great number of his Nobles. Also for the barons, Peter de Spontford, and other were sent thither as commissioners, and as some write, at that present, to wit on the 24 daie of Januarie, the French king sitting in iudgement, pronounced his definitive sentence on the behalfe of king Henrie against the barons: but whether he gaue that sentence now, or the yeare before, the barons iudged him verie parciell, and therefore meant not to stand unto his arbitrement therein.

The king having ended his businesse with the French king, returned into England, and came to London the morrow after S. Valentines day. And about seven or eight daies after, the lord Edward his eldest sonne returned also, and hearing that the barons were gone to the marches of Wales (where toining with the Welshmen, they had begun to make warre against the kings friends, and namelie against his lieutenant Roger lord Mortimer, whome they had besieged in the castell of Wigmore) the lord Edward thereupon, with such power as he could get together, marched thitherwards to raise their siege: but the lord Mortimer perceluing himselfe in danger, fled priuillie out of the castell, and got to Hereford, thither the prince was come. The barons informed their strength in such wise that they won the castell. Prince Edward on the other side toke the castels of Hereford and Huntingdon that belonged unto the earle of Hereford young Henrie de Boun.

The castell of Brecknock was also deliuered into his hands, which he betooke to the keeping of the lord Roger de Mortimer, with all the territorie thereto belonging. Robert earle of Darbie that toke part with the barons, besieged the citie of Gloucester, and toke it by the old castell, sacked the citizens goods, and constrained the Iewes to be baptised. The citie of Gloucester also was taken by the barons: but prince Edward following them and reparing the bridge ouer Scuerne, which the barons had broken downe after they were come ouer, he entred the castell of Gloucester with his people. The next day by procurement of Walter bishop of Worcester, a truce was taken betwixt prince Edward and the barons that had taken the towne, during the which truce the barons left the towne, and the burgesles submitted themselves unto prince Edward: and so he having the castell and towne in his hands, imprisoned manie of the burgesles, & fined the towne at the summe of a thousand pounds. Then he betooke towards his father lieng at Oxford, or at Woodstocke, gathering people to gather on each hand.

In the meane time the lords drew towards London, and the new assurance by writing indented was made betwixt the commonalties of the citie and the barons, without consent of any of the rulers of the citie. The commoners herewith appointed of themselves two capteins, which they named constables of the citie, that is to saie, Thomas Piwelston & Stephen Bakerell, by whose commandment and tolling of the great bell of Paules all the citie was warned to be readie in harnesse, to attend upon the said two capteins. About the beginning of Lent the constable of the towne sir Hugh Spenser, with the said two capteins, and a great multitude of the citizens and others went to Whilleworth; and there spoiled the manour place of the king of Almaine, and then set it on fire, and destroyed the water milles, and other commodities which he there had. This deed was the cause (as some haue iudged) of the warre that after ensued. For where before this time the said king of Almaine had bene, by reason of the alliance betwixt him and the earle of Gloucester, continuallie an intreater for peace, he was now euer after this time an utter enemie unto the barons, and unto their side, so farre as laie in his power.

The king hearing of this riotous act, and being informed that Peter de Spontford was at Southampton, assembling people to strengthen the barons part, he got together such men of warre as he could from all places, and so he had with him his brother Richard king of Almaine, his eldest sonne the lord Edward, William de Valence his halfe brother on the mothers side, & John Comyn of Ward in Scotland with a great number of Scots, John Balliol lord of Gallowate, Robert Bruce lord of Annandale, Roger Clifford, Philip Marmon, John Clare, John Leiboine, Henrie Percie, Philip Basset, and Roger Mortimer.

Thus the king having these noble men about him, with his armie sped him towards Northampton, and coming thither toke the towne by force, slew diuerse, and toke prisoners Peter Spontford, and Simon Spontford the earle of Leicesters son, William Ferries, Baldwin Wake, with Nicholas his brother, Berengarius de Waterulle, Hugh Cubin, Robert Butenlein, Adam of Petomarch, Robert Newton, Philip Wyble, Crimbald Dauncefoet, Roger Beltram, Thomas Mansell, and diuerse other to the number of 80 knights (or as Matthew Westminster hath 15 barons, and 60 knights) besides a great number of esquires and burgesles, the which were bestowed abroad in sundrie prisons. The towne (as some write) was taken by this means. Whilste diuerse of the capteins within were talking with the king on the one side of the towne towards the meadows, the lord Philip Basset approached the walles nere unto the monasterie of S. Andrew, and there with his people having spades, mattocks, and other instruments provided for the purpose, undermined a great great paine of the wall, and reuerfed the same into ditches, making such a breach, that fortie horsemen might enter afront. Some put the blame in such monks of the abbeie as were strangers, as though they should prepare this entrie for the enimie: but howsoeuer it was, the king got the towne out of his enimies handes.

This also is to be remembred, that where by reason of variance, which had chanced that yere betwixt the scholers of Oxford and the towne men, a great number of the same scholers were withdrawen to Northampton and there studied. They had raised a banner to fight in defense of the towne against the king, and did more hurt to the assailants than anie other band; whereupon the king threatned to hang them all, and so had he done indeed, if by the persuasion of his counsell he had not altered his purpose, doubting to procure the hatred of their friends, if the execution should haue bene so rigorously prosecuted against them: for there were amongst them manie young gentlemen of good houses and noble parentage. Thus was the towne of Northampton taken on a saturday being Passion sundaye euen, and the morow after the date of St. Ambrose which is the first of Aprill. On the monday following, the king led his armie towards Leicester, where the burgeses receiued him into the towne at his comming thither. From thence he marched to Nottingham, burning and wasting the houses and manors of the barons and other of his enimies, and speciallie those that belonged to the earle of Leicester. Here he also gathered more people, and so increased his power: in so much that diuerse Noblemen, as Roger Clifford, Henrie Percie, Richard Gray, Philip Basset, Richard Sward, and Hubert earle of Kent, doubting the lacke of power in their companions, reuoluted into the kings side.

He sent his sonne prince Edward into Darbyshire and Staffordshire with a strong power, where he wasted the manours and possessions of Robert de Ferrers earle of Darbie, and namelie he ouerthrew and defaced the castell of Tutburie. Wherefoeuer the kings armie, or that which his sonne prince Edward led, chanced to come, there followed spoiling, burning and killing. The barons on the other side fate not still, for the lord John Gifford, with others that were appointed by the earle of Leicester to kepe Killingworth castell (which was furnished with all things necessary, maruellouslie, and with such strange kind of engines as had not bene lightlie heard of nor seene in these parts) toke by a policie the castell of Warwike, and William Mauduit earle of Warwike, with his wife and familie within it; and leading them to Killingworth, there committed them to prison. The cause was, for that they suspected him that he would take part with the king against them. The castell of Warwike they raced downe, least the kings people should take it for their refuge. In the Passion weeke the Jewes that inhabited in London being detected of treason, which they had deuised against the barons and citizens, were slaine almost all the whole number of them, and great riches found in their houses, which were taken and caried awaie by those that ranched the same houses.

After Easter the erle of Leicester, hauing London at his commandement, went to Rochester and besieged that citie, but the capteine thereof John earle of Warren did manfullie resist the enimies; till the king aduertised thereof, with the power of the marches of the north parts and other came and remoued the siege. This done, he left a conuenient garrison within the citie to defend it, and comming to Tunbridge, wan the castell, and taking the countesse of Gloucester that was within it, permitted hir to depart. This done, he repaired to the sea side towards France, to staie there till his brethren, Gesteire and Quie, the sonnes of the earle of March should arrive with some band of souldiers, for whom he had now sent and reuoked into the realme, being latelie before banished by the Nobles, as before yee haue heard. They shortly after landed, whereupon the king hauing his power increased, came to Lewes, and pight downe his field not farre from that towne.

In the end of Aprill the barons hearing where the king was, departed from London with a great multitude of the citizens, whom they placed in the vantage, and marched forth towards the king, and comming nere to the place where he was lodged, set downe their tents, and incamped themselves a little beside him. Either here or by the waie as they came forward, the barons deuised a letter, and sent it vnto the king, containing an excuse of their doings, and a declaration of their well meanings, both towards him, and the wealth of the realme; and here with accused those that were about him, and with euill counsell misinformed him, both against them, against the publike wealth of the land, and his owne honor. This letter was dated the tenth of Maie, and subscribed with the names of a great number of noble men, of the which the more part dw here insue, but yet not all; Sir Simon de Montfort earle of Leicester and high steward of England, sir Gilbert de Clare earle of Gloucester, Robert Ferrers earle of Darbie, Hugh Spenser lord chiefe iustice, Henrie Montfort sonne and heire to the earle of Leicester, Richard Grey, Henrie Hastings, John Fitz John, Robert de Wapont, John Gifford, Robert Knap, William Hamton, Baldwin Wake, Gilbert Gifford, Nicholas de Segraue, Godfrey de Luce, John de Wessie, William de Mountchense, with other. The king answered this letter, in charging them with rebellion, and mouing of open war against him, to the great disquieting of the realme. Also he laid vnto their charge, the burning of the manours, houses and places of his nobles and counsellors; and herewith desired them by the same answer, which was dated at Lewes aforesaid on the twelfth of Maie.

Also the king of Romanes, and prince Edmound sent their defiance to the barons at the same time, writing vnder their seales, for that the barons in their letter to the king, had burthened them and other with misleading the king with untrue informations and sinister counsell. Thus as they wrote to and fro such nipping letters, all the treatie of peace was forgotten and laid aside, so that they prepared to battell. The king had indeed the greater number of armed men, but manie of them were vnfaithfull, and cared not greatlie though the losse fell to his side, and so whil实现 they went to it without order, & vnadvisedlie, they fought at aduenture, & continued but faintly. His capteines made three battels of their armie, the lord Edward led the foreward, and with him William de Valence earle of Penbrooke, and John de Warren erle of Surrey and Sussex. In the second, the Is. of Almaine, with his sonne Henrie were chieftaines. The third the king gouerned himselfe.

The barons diuided their host into foure battels, the first was vnder the gouernment of the lord Henrie de Montfort and others. The second was led by the lord Gilbert de Clare, the lord John Fitz John, and the lord William de Mountchense. The third, in which the Londoners were placed, the lord Nicholas de Segraue ruled. The fourth was led by Simon Montfort earle of Leicester himselfe, and one Thomas de Beuckston. Thus being ordered, on the fourteenth of Maie being Wednesday, they ioined in fight, and at the first encounter, the L. Hen-

ric de Hastings, the lord Geoffrey de Lucie, & Humphrey de Bohun the younger were wounded, and the Londoners forthwith were beaten backe: for prince Edward so fiercely assailed them, that they were not able to abide the hurt. He hated them indeed above all other, namely for that of late they had misused his mother, reviling hir, and throwing durt and stones at hir, when she passed the bridge (as before ye have heard) which wrong and abuse by them committed was peradventure on their parts forgotten, but of prince Edward (as it seemeth) remembered, for

Hereupon prince Edward now to be revenged of them, after they began to flie, most eagerly following them, chased & slue them by heaps. But whilst he separated himselfe by such earnest following of the Londoners to farre from the residue of the kings armie, he was the onelie cause of the losse of that field: for the earle of Leicester, perceiving that the prince with the chiefest force of the kings armie was thus gone after the Londoners (of whom he made no great account) he exhorted his people to shew their valiancie at that instant, and so comming upon his adversaries with great courage, in a moment put them to flight. There were taken the king of Almaine, the lords John de Burgh and Philip Basset with all other the chiefest that were about the king, but the king himselfe retired with those few about him that were left, into the priorie of Lewes, and other there were that withdrew into the castell. The barons pursuing them, entered the towne, and took of slue so manie as they found within the castell and priorie. At length, prince Edward returned from the chase of the Londoners, whom he had pursued for the space of foure miles, and finding the field lost, began a new battell: but the earle of Surrie, William de Valence, and Guy de Lusignan, with Hugh Bigod and others, having with them three hundred armed men, straightwaies fled unto the castell of Hemsted. Prince Edward then perceiving slaughter to be made on each hand, cast about the towne, and with his companie got into the priorie to his father.

In the meane time the barons gaue assault to the castell, but they within valiantlie defended themselves, with whose hardie doings prince Edward incouraged, gathered his people together againe, and meant effronies to give battell; but the subtil head of the earle of Leicester beguiled them all, for he caused certeine friers to take in hand to be intreators betwixt them, which comming to the king and to the prince his sonne, declared that the barons, to avoid that more christian blood should not be spilt, would be contented to have the matter put in compromise of indifferent persons; but if it were so, that the king and his sonne would needs stand to the uttermost trial of battell, they would not faile but strike off the heads of the king of Almaine and other prisoners, which they would set upon the ends of their speares in steed of standards.

The king and his people having the respect of pittie before their eyes, changed their purposed intent to fight, and falling to a parle (which continued for the most part of all the night next following) at length it was agreed upon, that the French king with three prelates and three other noble men of the temporalitie, should chuse forth and name two noble men of France, which comming into England should take a third person to them whom they thought good, and they three should have the bearing of all controuersies betwixt the king and the barons, and what order so ever they took therein, the same should stand, and be receiued for a perfect conclusion and stable decree. This agreement was confirmed, and prince Edward and Henrie sonne to the king of Almaine were ap-

Other wise otherwise of this battell at Lewes, affirming, that not onelie the king of Romans, but also king Henrie himselfe, having his owne horse thrust through on both sides, was taken, and likewise his sonne prince Edward with other on their side, to the number of five and twentie barons and bannerets: and that moreover, there died on the kings side that day in the battell and chase, six thousand and five hundred men, as Polydor noteth: howbeit, Richard Southwell saith, there died on both parts onlie 3400. But March. Westminster writeth, that as the report went, there died five thousand on both sides, and amongst other, these he nameth as chiefe, William de Wilton one of the kings iustices, & the lord Fouke Fitz Warren a baron that took the kings part. On the barons side, the lord Rafe Weringander a baron also, and William Blunt the earles standardbearer. Of them that were taken on the kings side, beside such as before are recited, we find these named, Humphrey de Bohun earle of Hereford, William lord Bardsolfe, Robert lord of Catthale, Roger lord Somerrie, Henrie lord Percie, John de Balioll, Robert de Bruis, and John Comin, with other barons of Scotland, having lost all their souldiers whom they had brought with them to the kings aid.

Moreover, it should appeare by some writers, that the king being thus in captiuitie, was constrained to make a new grant, that the statutes of Oxford should stand in force, and if any were thought unreasonable, the same should be reformed by foure noble men of the realme of France, two of the spiritualtie and two of the temporalitie. And if those foure could not agree, then the earle of Arion and the duke of Burgoyne should be iudges in the matter. But if either those or the other were appointed to be arbitrators, like it is, that the former report touching the successe of the battell is true; for if both the king and his sonne had bene taken prisoners in the field, the barons would surely have constrained him to have consented to the obseruance of the statutes, without putting the same in compromise, to be altered at the discretion of any arbitrators, and namely strangers.

But howsoever it was, on the tuesday before the Ascension day, peace was proclaimed in London, betwene the king and the barons; and whereas the king either by constraint for safegard of himselfe or his friends, either upon assurance of the barons promise, committed himselfe unto the companie of the same barons, at their comming with him to London they went from this last agreement, and forthwith devised other ordinances as thus. They ordeined, that two earles and a bishop, which being elected out by the communalitie, should chuse to them nine other persons, and of these, three of them should still remaine about the king, and by their order and the other nine, all things should be governed both in the court and in the realme. They constrained the king and his sonne prince Edward (menacing to depose the one, and to keepe the other in perpetuall prison) to consent and agree to this last ordinance: and so the earles of Leicester and Gloucester, and the bishop of Winchester were ordeined there the chiefe rulers, and letters sent with all speed unto the cardinall Sabienus the popes legat, and to the king of France, to signifie to them, that the compromise agreed upon at Lewes was utterly renoked, and that a new peace in frendlie wise was concluded.

But although the bishops of London, Winchester, and Worcester instantly required the said legat, that he would helpe to further the same peace, yet he sore rebuked them, in that they would give their consent, so much to abate and bring under the kings royal power. And because he might not be suffered to enter enter the realme, he first cited them to appeare before him at Bullongne. And whereas they feared to contemne his authoritie, and appeared not, he both suspended the said three bishops, and excommunicated the said earles of Leicester and Gloucester, and their complices, with the cite of London, and the cinque ports: but the foresaid bishops, earles and barons, feigning to make their appeales to the popes consistorie, or if need were, unto a generall councell and so forth, though indeed trusting more to the temporall sword, than fearing the spiritual, they did not heare to save and heare divine service in churches and else where, as before they had done, till the coming of the cardinall of Rhobone.

The capteines and men of warre, whom the king had left at Lumbidge, immediately upon the agreement concluded betwixt the king and the barons, were commanded by the k. to depart, & repaire evertie man to his home; but they fearing the malice of their enemies, would not breake in sunder, but keeping together, went strait to Wythowe, and there remained, till the lord Edward the kings sonne was escaped out of captivitie. But this is to be remembered, that before their departure from Lumbidge, when by report of William de Sale, who escaping from the battell at Lewes, was come thither, they understood how the matter had passed on both sides, and that the Londoners being chased out of the field, were lodged at Croydon, about the evening tide they came thither, and assailing them in their lodgings, slew manie, and won a great spoile. The earle of Leicester and the barons having the rule of the king and realme in their hands, sought to oppresse all such as they knew to be against them, and not to like of their proceedings; namely, the northerne lords, and those of the marches of Wales, as the lord Spottimer and others: but warring herewith willfull, they used things with small discretion, which at length brought them to confusion. For the four sonnes of the earle of Leicester, Henrie, Guie, Simon, and another Henrie, which had served right worthilie indeed on the date of the battell, began to ware so proud, that in comparison of themselves, they despised all others.

The lords of the marches of Wales, as Roger de Spottimer, James de Audelle, Roger de Clifford, Roger de Leborne, Waimon le Strange, Hugh Turberville, and other that had escaped from the battell at Lewes, began to make against them that had thus usurped the rule of the land, under colour of having the king in their hands. The earle of Leicester advertised hereof, joined in league with Leolin prince of Wales, and coming with the king into those parts, entered into the castell of Hereford, into the which he removed the lord Edward from Worcester, where he was first kept in ward, after he had yielded himselfe at Lewes. After this, the earle of Leicester recovered the castell of Saie, and waisting the lands and manours of the lord Spottimer, constrained Hugh Spottimer to yield himselfe, so that his castell called Richar, and other his possessions, were committed to the keeping of the lord John Fitz John. Robert de Ferrers earle of Darbie, with a great puissance of horsemen and footmen came to Chester, in favour of the earle of Leicester, against whome although William de Couche, and David brother to the prince of Wales, taking the contrarie part with the lord James Audelle and other, came to encounter, yet they durst not abide him, but fled, and lost an hundred of their men.

In the meane time, the earle of Leicester proceeding in his businesse, won the castell of Ludlow, and after marching towards Pontgomerie, whither the lords Roger de Spottimer, and James Audelle were withstanding, he constrained them at length to a feigned agreement, so that they gave hostages, promising to come to the next parliament that was appointed to be holden, where they were banished the land for a twelve moneths, and all the castles on the marches, in marche from Wythow to Chester, were delivered to the earle. After this (as by Nicholas Trivet it appeareth) there was a great assemble of men of warre made out of all parts of the realme, to resist such strangers as the quene (remaining in the parts beyond the seas) had got together, meaning to send them into England to aid the king against the barons, and for that purpose had caused a great number of ships to be brought into the haven of Dam. But now that the king was in the barons hands, and that such a multitude of horsemen and footmen were assembled on Warham-downe (as a man would not have thought had bene possible to have found within the whole realme) to resist the landing of those strangers, the said strangers were sent home againe, without having done any pleasure to the quene, other than spent hir monie. The king held his Christmas at Woodstoke; and the earle of Leicester, who seemed then to rule the whole realme, kept his Christmas at Billingswoth.

After this, a parlement was holden at London in the octaves of saint Hilarie, and manie things were concluded, covenants accorded, and oths taken for performance by the k. and his sonne prince Edward, which shortly after came to little effect. Yet prince Edward, and Henrie the sonne and heire of the king of Almaine, which had bene kept as pledges about the tearme of nine moneths and odd daies, were in the Lent following set at libertie, upon assurance made, that the said prince Edward should remaine in the kings court, and not depart from thence without licence of the king and certeine of the barons. He was also constrained to give unto the earle of Leicester the countie of Salantine of Chester, before he might obtaine to have so much libertie. Betwene Easter and Whitsuntide, the earles of Leicester and Gloucester fell at variance, through the presumptuous demeanour of the earle of Leicesters sonnes, and also because the earle of Leicester would not deliver the king of Almaine and other prisoners unto the earle of Gloucester, requiring to have the custodie of them, because he had taken them in the battell at Lewes.

The earle of Gloucester, perceiving himselfe not well used, secretly entred into confederacie with the lord Spottimer, and other of the marches: whereupon the earle of Leicester having thereof some inkling, came to Hereford, in purpose to have taken the earle of Gloucester, and to have put him in safe keeping, as lately before he had served the earle of Darbie. But by the practise of the lord Spottimer, shortly after the lord Edward or prince Edward (whether ye list to call him) assailed abroad in the fields an horse or two, such as he should use at fusts and tozies, which were appointed to be holden, he mounted at length upon a light courser, which the said lord Spottimer had sent to him; and bidding the lord Robert Ross and other (that were appointed to attend on him, as his keepers) farewell, he galloped from thence, and could not be overtaken of them that pursued him, till at length he came to the lord Spottimer, who with a great troupe of men was come forth of his castell of Wigmore to receive him. This was on the thurdaie in Whitsuntide.

About the same time, the earle of Warren, with William de Valence earle of Penbroke, the kings halfe brother, and others, who (as ye have heard) fled from the battell at Lewes, were now returned into the realme, landing first in Southwales with a power power of crossbowes and other men of warre, the which hearing that the lord Edward was thus escaped out of captivite, came to London, and there joined with him, and so likewise did the earle of Gloucester. Now after they had commyned together, and were made friends and confederates, they caused all the bridges to be broken, that the enemies should not come to oppresse them, till they had assembled all their forces, and passing forward towards Gloucester, won the citie, and still came people unto them from all sides, namelic these lords and capitains, which all the time since the battell of Lewes had laine in North. After this they came to Gloucester and entered there also. When the earle of Leicester was hereof advertised (who in all this meane time by order taken, was about the king, and ruled all things in the court) he sent in all hast unto his sonne Simon de Montfort to raise a power of men, the which accordingly assembled to him much people, and comming with the same unto Winchester, won the citie by surrender, spoiled it, and slew the more part of the Jewes that inhabited there. Then he laid siege to the castell, but hearing a feined rumor that prince Edward was comming thither with his power, he departed from thence with his companie, and went to Basingworth.

On the last day of Julie, prince Edward with his host came to Basingworth aforesaid, and there fighting with the said Simon de Montfort and his armie, with little slaughter discomfited the same, and took prisoners the erle of Arford, the lords William de Montchense, Adam de Beuimarch, Baldwin de Wake, and Hugh Penill, with divers others: the lord Simon himselfe fled into the castell, and so escaped. In this meane while the earle of Leicester having raised his power, came to the castell of Monmouth, which the earle of Gloucester had lately taken and fortified: but they that were within it being open to yield, it was now rased downe to the ground. This done, the earle of Leicester entring into Glamorganshire, and joining his power with the prince of Wales, wasted and burned the lands of the said earle of Gloucester: but hearing what his adversaries went about in other places, he returned from thence, and came forward towards the said prince Edward, who likewise made towards him, and at Evesham they met on the first day of August, where was fought a verie fierce and cruell battell betwixt the parties.

Some write, that the earle of Leicester placed king Henrie in the front of his battell, whom he had there with him as captive, and had arrayed him in his owne cote-armour, that if fortune went against him, whilest the enemies should be earnest to take the king bearing the semblance of the chiefe capitaine, he might himselfe escape: but king Henrie, when they came to joine, fought not, but called to his people, and declared who he was, whereby he escaped the danger of death, for being knowne of them he was saved. The Welshmen which in great numbers the earle of Leicester had there on his side, at the first onset fled and ran awaie; which their demeanour, when the earle saw, he exhorted those that were about him to plaie the men, and so rushing forth into the preele of his enemies, he was inclosed about and slain, together with his sonne Henrie. Whereupon, his death being knowne, his people took them to flight as men utterly discomfited. There died in that battell about 4000 men (as Polydor saith). But Richard Southwell saith, there were killed of knights or rather men of armes 180, and of peomen or rather demilances 220, of Welshmen 5000, and of such footmen as were of the earle of Leicesters owne retinue 2000, so that there died in all to the number of ten thousand men, as the same Southwell affirmeth. Among whom of noblemen, these are reckoned Hugh Spenser lord chiefe justice, the lord Rafe Bassett, the lord Peter de Spontfort, the lord John Beauchamp, sir William Forke, the lord Thomas de Chertie, the lord Walter de Creppings, Guie de Baille a Frenchman, the lord William de Sandvill, the lord Roger de John, the lord Robert de Regoz, and others.

This ruine fell to the barons by the discord which was sprung latelie before, betwixt the earles of Arford and Gloucester, through the insolencie and pride of the earle of Leicesters sonne, who (as I said before) despising other of the nobilitie, and forgetting in the meane time the nature of true and unbiased noblesse, whereof it is said and justlie remembered, that spake many reprochfull words by the said earle of Gloucester, and wiled him in such evil sort, that he upon displeasure thereof, had not onelie procured the escape of prince Edward, but joined with him in aid, against the said earle of Leicester, and other of the barons, to the bitter confusion, both of them and of their cause. The body of the same earle was shamefullie abused & cut in peeces, his head and his private members were cut off, and fastened on either side of his nose, and presented unto the wife of the lord Roger Spontfort.

The people conceived an opinion, that this earle being thus slain, fighting in defense of the liberties of the realme, & performance of his oath, as they take it, died a martyr: which by the hated holinesse of his passed life and miracles ascribed to him after his death, was greatlie confirmed in the next age. But the feare of the kings displeasure staid the people from hastie honouring him as a saint at this time, where otherwise they were inclined greatlie thereto, reputing him for no lesse in their conscience, as in secret talke they would not sticke to utter. There were wounded & taken, besides the other that were slain at that battell of Evesham, Guie de Montfort, the earle of Leicesters sonne, the lords John Fitz John, Henrie de Hastings, Humfris de Bohun the younger, John de Bekie, Peter de Montfort the younger, and Nicholas de Segraue with others. The king being delivred out of his adversaries hands, and likewise the king of Romans, went unto Warwick, and there increasing his power, determined to pursue his enemies.

But first, about the Patience of our ladie was a parlement holden at Winchester, where the statutes of Arford were clerelie repealed. Also, all such as had favoured the barons, and were as then either in prison or abroad, should be disherited. It was also ordeined at this parlement, that the wealthiest citizens of London should be cast into prison, and that the citie should be deprived of hir liberties. Also, that the shulps and cheins, wherewith the streets were fenced, should be had awaie, because that the citizens had aided the earle of Leicester against the king and his realme. All this was done, for the chiefe citizens were committed to ward within the castle of Windsor, till they had paid no small summes of monie for their fines. The liberties of the citie were suspended, and the towe of London was made stronger by the shulps and cheins which were brought into it out of the citie. Moreover, because Simon de Montfort might not agree with the king, being come to this parlement upon assurance, he was restored to the castle of Basingworth.

After this, in the feast of the translation of S. Edward, a parlement was holden at Westminster, and the sentence of disheriting the kings adversaries was pronounced against them, whole lands the king forthwith gave unto his trustie subjects, where he thought good. Some of the disherited men redeemed med their possessions; with a portion of monie, in name of a fine. Other of them flocking together, got them into the woods and desert places, where keeping them out of sight as outlawes, they lived by spoiles and robberies. The chiefest of them was Robert erle of Ferrers, who neuerthelesse was restored to his lands, but yet with condition, that if afterwards he fell into the like crime, he should forfeit his earldome for ever. The Londoners with much ado, at length, obtained pardon of the king. The maior and aldermen of the citie were glad to submit themselves, though the commons, without consideration of the great perill which they were in, would have stood still at defiance with the king, and defended the citie against him. It was no marvell though they were of diuerse and contrarie opinions, for in those daies, the citie was inhabited with manie and sundrie nations which then were admitted for citizens. At length, by on their submission, the king toke them to mercie, upon their fine, which was seized at twentie thousand marks.

About Alhallowtrentide, cardinall Dthobone came from the pope into England as his legat, to helpe towards some agreement to be had betwixt the king and his barons. He was committed to prison (as some write) by the Londoners, for that he spake against their doings, when they shut their gates against the king; but he was shortly released as should appeare. On the first day of Nouember in the fiftith yere of his reigne, king Henric came to Westminster, and shortly after, he gaue auaile the number of thre score houses, with the household stuffe in the same contained, so that the owners were compelled to redeeme them againe of those his seruants, to whome he had giuen the said houses, together with all such lands, goods and cattels, as the same citizens had within any part of England. Then was one called sir Dthobon made custos or gardian of the citie, who was also constable of the tower, he chose to be baillies, and to be accountable to the kings vse, John Adisan, and Walter Henric, citizens of the same citie. The king also toke pledges of the best mens sonnes of the citie, which pledges he caused to be put in the tower, and there kept at the costs of their parents. ¶ The king by aduise of his counsell ordained, that within euery thire of the reime, there should be a capteine or lieutenant appointed with necessarie allowance of the king for his charges, the which, with the assistance of the shiriffe, should punish and kepe downe the wicked outrage of theues and robbers, which in time of the late ciuill warres were sprong vp in great numbers, and growen to exceeding great boldnesse; but now, through feare of de-serued punishment, they began to cease from their accustomed rapine, and the kings power came againe in estimation, so that peace after a manner toke new root and increase.

Upon S. Nicholas euen, the king departed from Westminster, towards Portsmouth, where the cardinall Dthobone held a synod, and according to that he had in commandement, pronounced all the kings aduersaries accursed, and named all the bishops which had aided the barons against the king, in time of the late warres, of whome afterward he absolved the most part. But John bishop of Winchester, Henric bishop of London, and Stephan bishop of Chichester were sent to Rome, to purchase their absolution of pope Clement the fourth, as well for other points of disobedience, as this for that, where the quene had procured a curse of pope Urbane the fourth, that was predecessor to this Clement, to ac-curse all the barons and their supporters, which was against the king his husband: the said bishops (to whome the commission was sent to denounce that curse) for feare of the barons deferred the execution.

Walter bishop of Worcester, chancing to fall sicke at that time, died about the beginning of Februarye, confessing first, that he had grievously erred, in maintaining the side of the erle of Leicester against the king, and therefore directed his letters to the popes legat, requiring to be absolved, which his petition the legat granted. Moreover, in this counsell at Portsmouth, there was published by the cardinall a grant, made to the king by the pope, of the dismes of the english church for one whole yere then next insuing.

A little before the kings departure from London now in this last time, he ordeined sir John Linde knight, and maister John Walbyen cleark, to be gardians of the citie and tower, by the names of seneshals or stewards: but such earnest suit was made to the king, to obtaine a perfect pardon for the Londoners, that at length after the aforesaid seneshals had taken suerties for the payment of their fine, the k. caused his charter of pardon to be made vnder his broad seale, and sent it vnto them, wherein all former trespasses committed by them in the last warres was clerelie pardoned; certeine persons, whose bodies and goods were giuen vnto his eldest sonne Edward, excepted out of the same pardon. This charter was dated at Portsmouth, the tenth day of Januarye, in the fiftith yere of king Henrics reigne.
Then also were discharged the foresaid seneshals, and the citizens of themselves chose for maior, William J. itz Richard; and for shiriffs, Thomas de la Fourd, and Gregorie de Rochelleg.

Whilist the king late at Portsmouth, the lord Simon de Montfort put himselfe vpon the dome and order of the legat Dthobone, and was therefore permitted to be at large in the kings court: but at the kings coming to London, he suddenly departed out of the court, and rode to Winchelsie, where he associated himselfe with rousers, and after some pices taken, departed from them, and went into France, where he offered his seruice to the French king, and was receiued. Thus saith Matthew Westminster, and other. But Polydor saith, that by Dtho-bons means, he was reconciled to the kings fauour; and thereupon to auoid occasion of further displeasure, he commanded, that the castell of Killingworth should be restored vnto the king, which the capteine refused to deliuer, hauing fortified it with all manner of provision, and things necessarie to defend a siege.

The wardens of the cinque ports, which (during the time of the barons warre) had done manie roberies on the sea, as well against the Englishmen as other, were at length reconciled to the king, who was faine to agree with them vpon such conditions as they thought good, because at that time (as the common saying went) they had the dominion of the sea in their otone hands. But in some writers we find it thus recorded, that when certeine prisoners which were kept by the barons of the cinque ports in the castell of Douer, heard how all things prospered on the kings side, they got possession of a tower within the same castell, and toke vpon them to defend it against their keepers; whereof when aduertisement was giuen to the king and to his sonne the lord Edward, they hastied forth to come & succour their friends. The keepers of the castell, perceiving themselves beset with their enemies, sent to the king for peace, who granting them pardon of life and limme, with horse, armour and other such necessaries, the castell was yielded vnto his hands. From thence, prince Edward departing, visited the sea coasts, punishing diuerse of the inhabitants within the precinct of the cinque ports, and putting them in feare, receiued diuerse to the king

his fathers peace. The inhabitants of Winchelsea onlie made countenance to resist him, but prince Edward with valiant assaults entred the towne, in which entrie much guiltie blood was spilt, but yet the multitude by commandement of prince Edward was spared. And thus having wonne the towne, he commanded that from thenceforth they should abstaine from piracies, which they had before time greafully vsed. Thus were the seas made quiet, and those of the cinque ports brought to the kings peace, and throughlie reconciled.

In this meane while diuerse of the disherited gentlemen, sore repining at the sentence and order giuen against them, had taken the Ile of Wyholme in Lincolneshire, whither a great number of euill doers immediatlie resorted, and began to do mischefe in all the countries next adioining. They took and sacked the citie of Lincolne, spoiled the Jewes, and slew manie of them, entred their synagog, and burnt the booke of their law. At length prince Edward, or (as other saie) his brother earle Edmund, was sent against them, who compelled them by force to come to the kings peace, which to obserue, they receiued an oth shortly after at London, but neuertheless were as fowle reddie to breake and renounce the same, and began a new broile in sundrie parts of the realme.

Diuerse of them fortified the castell of Killingworth, providing themselves of all things necessarie for defense out of the countries adioining. The king aduertised hereof, sent vnto them a pursuant, commanding them to cease fro such rebellious attempts, but the messenger had one of his hands cut off, and so with a contemptuous answer was sent back againe.

Prince Edward in passing through the Forrest of Aulton, got sight of sir Adam Curdon one of the disherited men, with whome he coped and took him prisoner with his owne hand, yet sauing him, and pardoning the offense of rebellion, in respect of the ballancie which he tried by proofe to rest in him: but his soldiers and complices being there taken, he caused to be hanged vpon tres within the same Forrest. Robert earle Ferrers contrarie to his oth of late receiued, accompanied with the lord d'Euille and others, did much hurt by way of open war against the kings friends in the north parts. Against whom the lord Henrie, sonne to the king of Almaine was sent with a great power: the which comming to Chesterfield fell vpon his enemies in such wise on the sudden, that they had not time to arme themselves, and so were distressed and overcome.

Yet the lord John d'Euille brake out, and incourting with sir Gilbert Hanlard, ouerthrew him, and escaped out of danger. Great slaughter was made on eche hand, and in the meane while the Nobles and gentlemen fought to get out of perill by flight. The earle of Darbie got into a church, but he was deserted by a woman, and so was taken. There were manie other also taken: & amongst them the lord Waldeuine Wake, and sir John de la Haie with much paine escaped. This battell was foughten about the midd of Maie, or vpon Whitson eue, as the Chronicle of Dunstable saith. Those that escaped, as the lord John d'Euille and others, gaue not ouer yet, but assembling themselves together in companies, keeping within woods and other desert places, brake out oftentimes, and did much mischefe. On the ninth of August they took the Ile of Elic, and so strengthened it, that they held it a long time after, spoiling and robbing the countries round about them, as Northfolke, Suffolke, and Cambridgeshire.

The bishop of Elic had undertaken to keepe the Ile to the kings vse, but being now dispossessed thereof, he got him awaie, and fell to cursing them that were thus entred against his will, but they seemed to pass little vpon his thundering excommunications. On the 16 of December, they came to the citie of Norwich, and spoiling it, took manie of the wealthie citizens, and ransomed them at great summes of monie. The lord Henrie Hastings and Simon de Batellshull, with diuerse others, got them into the castell of Killingworth, and daile went forth at their pleasures, spoiling and wasting the townes about them, or causing them to fine with them to be spared. And this they forced not to do, although the lord Edmund the kings sonne laie in Warwicke, to cut them short of such their licentious doings. The king therefore menting to haue the said castells of Killingworth by force, began his siege about the same vpon the euen of S. John Baptist. But the lord Henrie Hastings, the capteine of that castell, and other his complices defended it so stronglie, that though the king enforced his power to the vttermost to win it of them, yet could he not anie thing puenale, till at length vittels began to faile them within, and then vpon the euen of saint Thomas the apostle before Christmasse, the lord Henrie Hastings deliuered the said castell into the kings hands, vpon condition that he and all other should haue life and limme, houle and armour, with all things within the place to them belonging. And thus this siege had continued from the 26 of Iune vnto the 20 day of December.

¶ Here is to be remembred, that at the beginning of the siege, there were within the castell a thousand and seuen hundred armed men, and eight score women, beside lackies and cofferers. Here is also to be remembred, that whilest the siege laie before Killingworth, by the aduise of the kings councill, and of the legat Ethobone, there were twelue peres appointed and chosen forth, which should deuise and make ordinaunces touching the state of the realme, and the disherited persons, who according to their commission, ordained certeine prouisions, the which are contained within the statute intituled Dictum de Killingworth. The king after that the castell of Killingworth was deliuered to his hand, left therein his sonne Edmund, and went himselfe to Couentrie or (as other haue) to Oxford, and there held his Christmasse. Shortly after comming to Westminster he held a parlement there, studing to set a quietnesse in all matters and controuersies depending betwixt him and the barons. In this parlement sentence was giuen against earle Ferrers for the forfeiture of his earledome: then was Edmund the kings yonger sonne put in possession both of the earledome of Darbie and Leicester.

On the first of Februarie being sundae, the king came to S. Edmundsburie, and staid there till the two and twentieth of the same moneth, set forthward that day towards Cambridge, where he laie with his armie, the better to hyde them that kept the Ile of Elic against him. He laie there all the Lent season. And in the meane time the earle of Gloucester taking great displeasure, for that he might not haue his will, as well for the banishing of strangers, as for re-stitution to be made vnto the disherited men of their lands, he began a new sturre, and assembling a great power in the marches of Wales came nere vnto London, pretending at the first as though he had come to aide the king, at length he got licence of the maior and citizens to passe through the citie into Southwarke, where he lodged with his people, and thither came to him shortly sir John d'Euille, by Southerie side, bringing with him a great compaignie.

The maior caused the bridge and water side to be kept and watched both day and night with armed men, and euerie night was the water bridge drawne vp: but within a while the earle died the matter so, that that he was permitted to lodge within the cite with certeine of his men, by reason whereof, he drew more and more of his people into the cite, so that in the end he was master of the cite, and in Easter weeke took the keies of the bridge into his hands. The legat comming forth of the towre, repaired to the church of S. Paule, under a colour to preach the crossey, but in the end of that his exhortation, he turned his words to the earle of Gloucester, admonishing him to obeye the king as he was bound by his allegiance. And further, whereas the earle had given commandement that no vicuals should be suffered to be brought into the towre where the popes legat was lodged, he thought himselfe evill used in that behalf, sith he was a mediator for peace, and no partaker. But when the earle seemed to give small regard to his words, he got him secretly againe into the towre, with certeine noble men the kings friends, meaning to defend it unto the uttermost of their powers.

The earle of Gloucester and his complices began to feare the matter, and sent to him for peace which could not be granted: whereupon they appointed to give him batell upon Woundeslow heath. The king comming thither in the morning, found no man there to resist him, and therefore, after he had staied there a certeine space, he marched forth and came to Stratford, where he was lodged in the abbey: his host incamped and laie at Ham and thereabouts.

Matth. We. Am.

This chaunced about thre weekes after Easter. The soldiers which laie in London and in Southwarke, did much hurt about in the countrie of Southerie, & else-where. They also spoiled the towne of Westminster, and the parish-church there: but the monks and the goods belonging to the abbey they touched not, but made haucke in the kings palace, drinking by & destroying his wine, breaking the glasse windowes, and defacing the buildings most disorderlie, yea scarce forbearing to set the house on fire. Also there were of them that brake by & robbed certeine houses in London, of the which misgoverned persons there were foure taken, that were the cognisance of the earle of Darbie: whome the earle of Gloucester caused to be put in sackes, and so they were into the Thames.

Westminster spoiled.

Soldiers taken and thence taken into the Thames.

As the king thus laie at Stratford, there came unto him from the parts of beyond the sea, the earle of Bullongne, and S. Paule, with two hundred men of armes, and their suit of other souldiers. Also there arrived in the Thames a fleet of great vessels fraught with Gascoins, and laie afoze the towre, abiding the kings pleasure. The earle of Gloucester had caused bulwarks and barbicans to be made betwixt the towre and the cite, and also in sundrie places where need required ditches and trenches were cast, so that the cite was stronglie fortified. Howbeit now that the said earle and his complices perceived themselves in manner as besieged, they sought for peace. And by mediation of the king of Almaine, the lord Philip Basset and the legat of Rhobone, the same was granted, the ordinance of Billington in euerie condition observed. The Londoners were pardoned of their trespasses for receiuing the earle, though they were constrained to paie a thousand marks to the king of Romans, in recompense of the hurts done to him in burning of his house at Chisleworth.

Whylest the earle of Gloucester kept the cite of London against the king, one Henrie de Cuderesch, steward to the said earle, departing from London, came to the manour house of Gestepe saint Aeger at Offeld, which he burnt, and turning from thence came to Wyckhill. The lord Reigold Craie that held of the knights part, advertised hercof, followed him with his retinue of men of warre, and comming upon his enimie at vnwares, took the said Henrie, and slue thirtie of the cheffest of his companie, some he took, howbeit manie escaped. But now to our purpose. By this agreement concluded betwixt the king & the earle of Gloucester, he also accepted to his grace the lord John Cineley, the lord Nicholas de Segraue, the lord William Sparmon, the lord Richard de Craie, the lord John Fitz John, and the lord Gilbert de Lucie, with others: so that all parts of the realme were quieted, saving that those in the Isle of Ele would not submit themselves: yet at length by mediation of prince Edward they were reconciled to the king, and all the fortresses and defenses within that Isle by them made, were plucked downe and destroyed.

In the octauies of S. Martine, the king held a par- lament at Warleborough, where the liberties confen- ded in the booke called Magna charta were confirmed, and alfo diuerfe other good and wholesome ordinaunces concerning the ftate of the common-wealth were eftablished and enacted. ¶ In the moneth of Aprill there chanced great thunder, tempeftuous raine, and fouds, occafioned by the fame, berie foze & horrible, continuing for the fpace of fixtene daies together. The legat Rothobone, after he had in the fynods holden at Poorthampton and London, deuifed and made manie orders and rules for churchmen, and leuied a- mongft them great fummies of monie, finallie in the moneth of Iulie, he toke leaue of the king and re- turned to Rome, where after the deceaffe of Inno- cent the fixt, about the yeare of our Lord 1276 he was chofen pope, and named Adrian the fixt, living not paff 50 daies after. He went fo nere hand to fearch out things at his going awaie, that he had inrolled the true value of all the churches and benefices in England, and toke the note with him to Rome.

Prince Edward the kings fonne, and diuerfe o- ther great lords of England before this legats depar- ture out of the realme, receiued the croffe at his hands in Poorthampton on Midfummer day, mea- ning thortlie after according to promife there made, to go into the holie land to warre againft Gods e- nemies. In this yeare fell great variance betwene the corporations or fellowships of the goldsmiths and tailors within the citie of London, wherevnto e- uill words flowing from the tong gaue originall, for Pondus valde graue verbum vas sine clauis, fo that one euening there were affembled to the number of fue hundred in the ftreets in armour, and running together made a fowle fraie, fo that manie were wounded and fome flaine. But the thiriffes hearing thereof, came & parted them, with affiftance of other trades, and sent diuerfe of them being taken vnto prifon, of the which there were arreigned to the number of thirtie, and thirtene of them condemned and hanged.

In the fiftie & thirde yeare of king Henries reigne, there was fuch an exceeding great froft, beginning at faint Andrews tide, and continuing till it was nere candlemaffe, that the Thames from the bridge upwards was fo hard frozen, that men and beafts paffed ouer on feet from Lambeth to Weftminfter, and fo weftward in diuerfe places vp to Kingfton. Alfo merchandize was brought from Sandwich and other places vnto London by land, for the fhips by reason of the yce could not enter the Thames. ¶ And about the feath of S. Medaff, which falleth on the 6 of February, fell fo great abundance of raine, that the Thames rofe fo high, as it had not done at any time before, to remembrance of men then living; fo that the cellars and vaults in London by the water fide were drowned, and much merchandize marred & loft.

About S. Georges day there was a parlement holden at London, for the appealing of a controuer- fie depending betwixt prince Edward the kings fon and the earle of Gloucefter: at the which parlement were prefent almoft all the prelates and peeres of the realme. At length they put the matter in compo- mife, into the hands of the king of Almaine, under- taking to be adized by him high and low fouding all controuerfies: and likewife for the iourne to be made into the holie land, but the king of Almaine did little in the matter to any great effect. ¶ In the beginning of Lent the king gaue to his fonne prince Edward the rule of the citie of London, with all the reuenues and profits thereto belonging. After which gift, the faid prince made fir Hugh Fitz Wothon con- ftable of the towre and cuftos of the citie of London. ¶ Upon the ninth day of Aprill, Edmund the kings fonne, furnamed Crouchbacke, married at Weft- minfter Auelina the daughter of the earle of Au- marle. Prince Edward commanded the citizens of London to prefent vnto him fix citizens, of the which number he might nominate two thiriffes, and fo ap- pointed William de Hadstocke and Anketill de Al- berne, which were fworne to be accountants as their predeceffours had bene.

In thofe daies a new cuftome or toll was vfed to be paid, which prince Edward let to farme vnto cer- teine ftrangers, for the fomme of twentie marks by yeare. Wherefore the citizens being grieved there- with, bought it of him for two hundred marks. Alfo this yeare there was graunted to the king towards his iourne by him purposed into the holie land, the twentieth penie of euerie mans moueable goods the- roughout the realme of the late fae, and of the spiritualtie was granted by the affent of pope Gregorie the tenth, three difmes to be gathered within the terme of three yeares. This yeare the kings fonne the lord Edward obtained a confirmation for the citie of London of the charter of the ancient liberties, fo that the citizens did then chofe vnto them a maior and two thiriffes, which thiriffes by vertue of the fame charter, had their office to farme, in maner as before time was accuftomed: fauing that where they paid afore but three hundred and fiftie pounds, they paid now foure hundred and fiftie pounds. After which confirmation granted and paffed vnder the kings broad feale, they chofe for their maior John Adrian, and for thiriffes Walter Potter and John Tailor, the which were prefented the 16 day of Iulie vnto the king at Weftminfter by his fonne prince Edward, and there admitted and fworne. Then was fir Hugh Fitz Wothon difcharged of the rule of the citie. The ci- tizens of their owne freewill gaue vnto the king an hundred marks, and to his fonne prince Edward fue hundred marks: There was no great diforder at- tempted this yeare to the difquieting of the realme, fauing that certeine of the difherited gentlemen that belonged to the earle of Darbie, withdrew vnto the foreft of the Weake in Darbifhire, and there making their abode, fpouled and wafted the countries next adioining.

In the moneth of Maie, prince Edward the kings fonne fet forwarde on his iourne towards the holie land, and taking the fea at Douer, paffed ouer into France, and came to Burdeaur, where he ftayed a while, and after went to Agues Mortes, and there took shipping, firft failing (as fome write) vnto Cha- nis, where the chiftian armie, which letwes the French king as then deceaffed had brought thither, was

When the spring of the yeare began to approach, prince Edward escones toke the sea, and finally arrived at Acres with a thousand chosen men of warre, though there be writers that affirme, how there arrived with him of sundrie countreies five thousand horsemen, and double the same number of footmen. But amongst those that went out of England with him, these we find as principall, John de Britaine, John de Belcie, Mtes de Granton, and Robert de Buse, besides other. Of his noble chivalrie there attuned, we shall find a briefe note in the description of the holy land, and therefore here we omit the same. Howbeit this is to be remembred, that whilst the lord Edward sojourned there in the citie of Acres, he was in great danger to have bene slaine by treason: for a traitorous Saracen of that generation which are called Arfacides, and latelie retained by the same lord Edward, and become verie familiar with him, found means one day as he sat in his chamber, to give him three wounds, which suerlie had cost him his life, but that one of the princes chamberleins staied the traitors hand, and somewhat brake the strokes, till other servants came to the rescue, and slew him there in the place.

¶ There be that write, how prince Edward himselfe, perceiving the traitor to strike at his bellie, warded the blowe with his arme: and as the Saracen offered to have striken againe, he thrust him backe to the ground with his foot, and catching him by the hand, wrested the knife from him, and thrusting him into the bellie, so killed him, though in struggling with him, he was hurt againe a little in the forehead: and his servants withall comming to helpe him, one of them that was his musician, got by a tressill and stroke out the byaines of the traitor, as he lay dead on the ground, and was blamed of his maister for striking him, after he saw him once dead before his face, as he might perceive him to be. Some write, that this traitor was sent from the great admerall of Japha, on message to the prince Edward, and had bene with him divers times before, & now making countenance to take forth letters, got forth his knife, and attempted so to have wrought his feat. Whatsoever the man was, the prince was in great danger, by reason of the envenomed knife wherewith he was wounded, so that it was long yer he could be perfectlie whole. These Saracens called Arfacides, are a wicked generation of men, infected with such a superstitious opinion, that they beleue heauenlie blisse is purchased of them, if they can by any means slea one of the enemies of their religion, & suffer themselves for that fact the most cruell death that may be devised. ¶ Prince Edward, after he was whole and recovered of his wounds, perceiving that no such aid came into those parts out of chylendome, as was looked for, toke a truce with the enemies of our faith, and returned towards England, as hereafter shall be shewed.

On the fourth nones of Aprill (as some saie) or in the moneth of februarie (as other write) in the sixt yeare of his Henries reigne at Berkhamsted, died Richard king of Almaine and earle of Cornewall, and was buried in the abbey of Walsles which he himselfe had founded: he was a worthy prince, and stood his brother king Henrie in great stead, in handling matters both in peace and warre. He left behind him issue begotten of his wife Sancta two sonnes, Edmund and Henrie. This Edmund was he that brought the blood of Walsles out of Germanie: for as he was there upon a time with his father, it chanced that as he was beholding the reliques, and other pretious monuments of the ancient emperors, he espied a box of gold: by the inscription wherof he perceived (as the opinion of men then gave) that therein was contained a portion of the blood of our saviour.

He therefore, being desirous to have some part thereof, so intreated him that had the keeping of it, that he obtained his desire, and brought it over with him into England, bestowing a third part thereof after his fathers deceasse in the abbey of Walsles, as it were to adorne and enrich the same, because that therein both his father and mother were buried; and the other two parts he did reserve in his owne custody, till at length moved upon such devotion as was then used, he founded an abbey a little from his manour of Berkhamsted: which abbey was named Albyng, in the which he placed monks of the order of Bonhommes, being the first that ever had bene seene of that order here in England. And herewith he also assigned the two other parts of that blood to the same abbey. Whereupon followed great resort of people to those two places, induced thereunto by a certaine blind devotion.

Henrie the brother of this Edmund, and sonne to the foresaid king of Almaine, as he returned from Affrike, where he had bene with prince Edward, was slaine at Viterbo in Italie (whither he was come about business which he had to doe with the pope) by the hand of Guie de Pontfort, the sonne of Simon de Pontfort earle of Leicester, in revenge of the same Simons death. This murder was committed afore the high altar, as the same Henrie knelled there to heare divine service. The foresaid Guie upon that murder committed, fled unto his father in law, the earle of Anguillare, then gouverneur of Aulkein. There was at Viterbo the same time Philip king of France, returning homewards from the iourne which his father made into Affrike, where he died. Also Charles king of Sicill was there present, whome the said Guie then served. Both those kings were put in much blame, for that the murder and wilfull escape was done and suffered in their presence and no pursuit made after the murderer. Boniface the archbishop of Canturburie, when he had ruled the sea seven and thirtie yeares, departed this life: and after his deceasse, about two yeares or more, was one Robert Killwarbie appointed in his place by pope Gregorie, which Robert was the sixt and fortieth archbishop that had governed the see of Canturburie.

About the moneth of June there fell great debate and discord betwixt the monks of Poerwich and the citizens there; which increased so farre, that at length the citizens with great violence assaulted the monastery, fired the gates, and forced the fire so with red and drie wood, that the church with the bookes, and all other ornaments of the same, and all houses of office belonging to that abbey were cleane burned, wasted, and destroyed, so that nothing was preserved except one little chapell. The king hearing of this riot, rode to Poerwich, and causing inquiry to be made thereof, thirtie young men of the citie were condemned, hanged and burnt, to the great griefe of the other citizens, for they thought that the prison of the place was the occasion of all that mischief, who had got together armed men, and toke upon him to keepe the belstrate and church by force of armes: but the prison was well enough borne out, and defended by the bishop of Poerwich, named Roger, who (as it is likelie) was the maister of the mischief, though hands were not laid upon him nor his adherents: perhaps for

The king returning by saint Edmundsburie, after he had done his deuotions to S. Edmunds thine, began to waue somewhat crasse: but after hauing a little recovered his health, he called a counsell there, wherein he went about to haue taken order for the punishment of rebels: but his sicknesse againe re- newing, he brake vp the assemble, and with all speed passed to London. Prince Edward upon his returne out of the holie land came to Chalons in Burgogne, & at the request of the earle he did attempt with his companie to hold a iustes and tournie against the said earle & all other commers; And though through disdain and spite there was homclie plaie shewed, upon purpose to put the Englishmen to the foile & reproch; yet by high valiancie prince Edward and his companie bare themselves so worthilie, that in the end the aduersaries were well beaten, and constrained to leaue the hono: of that enterpise to the said prince Edward and his partakers. After this, he kept on his iornie till he came vnto Paris, where he was honourable receiued of the French king, and from thence he went to Burdeaur, and there remained till after his fathers death.

Anno Reg. 57. In this meane time king Henrie, being returned to London from saint Edmundsburie (as before ye haue heard) his sicknesse so increased upon him, that finally he departed at Westminster on the sixteenth day of Nouember, in the yeare of our Sauour 1272. after he had liued thre score and siue yeares, and reigned fiftie and six yeares, and seauen and twentie daies. A little before his death, when he perceived that he could no longer liue, he caused the earle of Gloucester to come before him, and to be netolie sworn to keepe the peace of the land, to the behoofe of his sonne prince Edward. His bodie was buried at Westminster. He had issue by his wife queene Elianor two sonnes, the foresaid Edward, prince of Wales, that succeeded him; and Edmund earle of Lancaster, by some autho: surnamed Crouchbacke, though (as other affirme vnturlic) that this Edmund was the elder brother: but bicause he was a deformed person, therefore his yonger brother Edward was preferred to the kingdome, which was deuised of purpose to conueie a right to king Henrie the fourth, which fetched the descent from the said Edmund, and by force vsurped and held the crowne, as after it may appere. Moreover, king Henrie had thre daughters by the said Elianor, as Margaret married to Alexander king of Scots, Beatrice whom the duke of Britaine had to wife, and Catharine which died before she was marriable.

He was of bodie well cast and strong, of a good stature in heighth, well fauoured of face, with the lid of one of his eyes comming downe, so as it almost couered the apple of the same eye. Of nature he was courteous, and of stomack rather noble than stout; a deuout prince and liberall towards the poore and needy. Yet he wanted not dispraise in some points, namelie for that in ordering of things and weightie affaires, he vsed small consideration. He was also noted to be a great faker of monie by leanes, fares, and subsidies: but therevnto he was inforced by necessity, to beare the charges of warre and other publicke affaires, than of any couetous mind or purpose to serue his owne turne. What capitains of honour among the nobilitie liued in his time, it may appere by the course of the historie of his age.

Of sundrie learned men these we find mentioned in maister Bales centuries and others. Walter of Couentrie an historiographer: Radulphus Niger that wrote both histories and other treatises, Cernusius de Spelkelte, Abbot of London, Robert Curson a man excellentlie learned both in diuine and humane letters, so that comming to the court of Rome he there grew in such estimation, that he became a cardinall, of whom we find this recorded by Matthew Westminster and Matthew Paris. [At the taking of Damiate, a citie in Egypt, there was with Belagius, the cardinall of Alba, the popes legat, maister Robert Curson an Englishman a most famous clerke, bozne of a noble house, and cardinall of the church of Rome.] These are reported to flourish in the daies both of king John and king Henrie his sonne.

In the said kings time also there liued other learned men, as these; Hugh Birkehead, Richard of Elm, Peter Penham, John Gile of de Sancto Egidio an excellent physician, Caducan a Welshman bozne and bishop of Bangor, Alexander a singular learned man that wrote diuerse and manie treatises aswell in diuinitie as philosophie and humanitie, both in verse and prose; also Stephan Langton, that for his singular knowledge was made high chancellor of the vniuersitie of Paris, and at length was admitted archbishop of Canturburie, against the will of king John, in which quarell so great trouble infused, as before ye haue partlie heard; Rafe Coggeshall also liued in king Henries daies, that wrote the appendix vnto the chronicle of Rafe Pigge, he was abbat of Coggeshall abbey in Essex, whereof he toke his surname; William Lanthorne, Peter of S. Saulor, a canon of the house called S. Saulor, or of the trinitie by London; Alexander Hailes a frier of the order of the minors, who wrote manie treatises in diuinitie; Richard surnamed Medicus a most learned physician, and no lesse expert in philosophie and the mathematical. There be also remembred by maister Bale, Radulfe the earle of Chester, the third and last of that name, who hauing great knowledge and understanding in the lawes of this land, compiled a booke of the same lawes, as a witnesse of his great skill therein: Alexander Wendocke bishop of Chester, John Blund, Edmund Rich, Robert Rich, Henrie Bacon, that excellent lawier, who wrote the booke commonlie called Bacon after his name, intitled De consuetudinibus Anglicanis; Richard surnamed Theologus, Walter de Cuesham, Rafe Jres bozne, Laurence Somercote, brother as it is thought to Robert Somercote, at that time a cardinall of the Romane church; Nicholas Fernham a physician, Robert Bacon a notable diuine, Simon Langton, brother to the archbishop of Canturburie Stephan Langton; Richard Filaker, Simon Stokes, John of Kent or Bantianus, William Shitwood, Spichael Blaunpaine, John Godard, Vincent of Couentrie, Alberke Wer, Richard Rich, John Basing alias de Basingstoke, Roger Waltham, William Seningham, Robert Crofted that learned bishop of Lincoln, whose memorie amongst the learned will remaine while the world lasteth.

This Edward the first, when his father died, being about the age of 35 yeares, was as then in the holie land, or rather in his iourne homewards: but wherefoever he was at that present, the nobles of the land, after his father was departed this life, assembled at the new temple in London, and causing a new scale to be made, they ordeined faithfull ministers and officers, which should haue the treasure in keeping, and the administration of iustice for the maintenance of peace and tranquillitie within the land, and on the 22 day of Nouember he was proclaimed king. Who after he had remained a time in the holie land, and perceived himselfe destitute of such aid as he looked for at the hands both of the Christians and Tartarians, he left in the citie of Acon certeinne spendarie souldiers, and taking the sea sailed homewards, arriuing first in Sicill, where, of Charles king of that land he was honozable receiued and conueied, till he came vnto Civita Vecchia in Italie, where pope Gregorie as then late with his court, of whome (as of his old friend that had been with him in the holie land) he obtained that earle Aldebrandino Rosso, and Guy of Pontfort, that had murdered the lord Henrie, eldest sonne to Richard king of Almaine, might be sent for. Earle Aldebrandino purged himselfe, but Guy de Pontfort was excommunicated, as a violator of the church, a murderer and a traitor, so as he was disherited euen vnto the fourth generation, till he had reconciled himselfe to the church, as he was informed.

After this, it is wonderfull to remember with what great honor king Edward was receiued of the cities, as he passed through Tuscaine and Lumbardie. At his comming ouer the mounteins at Chalon in Burgundie, he was at a iusts and toynie, which then was there holden by the Frenchmen against the Englishmen, the honor whereof remained with the Englishmen. In this toynie the sight of the footmen was great: for the Englishmen being fore provoked, slew manie of the French footmen, but because they were but rascals, no great accompt was made of them, for they were bnrmed, gaping for the spoile of them that were ouerthrowen. & Edward passing forth, came to the French court, where of his cosine germane king Philip he was iofullie receiued. Here king Edward, doing homage to the French king for the lands which he ought to hold of him in France, passed into Guien.

A tenth was granted of the cleargie to the king and to his brother Edmund earle of Leicester and Lancaster by the popes appointment for two yeares, a chapleine of the pope a Gascoigne borne named Reimond being sent into England for that purpose, who gaue part vnto them, and part thereof he kept to himselfe towards his charges, but the most part was reserved to the popes disposing. ¶ Whilest the king remained in Gascoigne, he had somewhat to do against certein rebels, as Gaston de Biernie, and other that were revolted from him. The castels belonging to the said Gaston he subdued, but his person he could not meet with. Finallie, after he had set things in order aswell in Guien as in other places in the parts of beyond the seas, he hastied homewards, and came to London on the second day of August, where he was receiued with all ioy that might be deuised. The streets were hangd with rich cloths of silke, arras, and tapestrie, the aldermen and burgesles of the citie thre out of their windowes handfulls of gold and silver, to signifye the great gladnesse which they had conceiued of his safe returne: the conduits ran plentifullie with white wine and red, that ech creature might drinke his fill. Upon the 19 day of August in this seconds yere of his reigne he was crowned at Westminister, together with his wife queene Eliano, by the hands of Robert Biltwarbie archbishop of Canturburie.

At this coronation were present Alexander king of Scots, and John earle of Britaine, with their wiues that were sisters to king Edward. The king of Scots did homage vnto king Edward for the realme of Scotland, in like maner as other the kings of Scotland before him had done to other kings of England. At the solemnitie of this coronation there were let go at libertie (catch them that catch might) fise hundred great horses by the king of Scots, the earles of Cornetwall, Gloucester, Denbroke, Warren, & others, as they were alighted fro their backs. ¶ On St. Nicholas euen there chanced such an earthquake with lightning and thunder, and therewithall the appearing of the burning drake, and a blasing starre called a comet, that the people were brought into no small feare vpon consideration thereof. degrees of men, that he seemed to exceed the reasonable bounds of courteous humanity, much more than became his royal estate. After this, he reformed divers laws and statutes, and devised some new ordinances, greatly for the wealth of the realm. He held his first parliament at Westminster, where the ordinances were made, called the statutes of Westminster the first.

To this parliament was Leolin the prince of Wales summoned to come and do his homage, having been requested first to come to the kings coronation, but he refused; and now having summons to come to this parliament, he excused himself, affirming that he durst not come for feare of certaine noblemen that late in wait for his life, requiring to have pledges delivered for his safe coming and going, the kings sonne, and Gilbert earle of Gloucester, with Robert Barneil the lord chancellor. The king was greatly offended with such a presumptuous demand, but passed it over, till after the end of the parliament, then repairing to Chester he sent effrons messengers to the said Leolin, requiring of him to come & do his homage, but he still delayed time, so that in the end the king raised an armie, meaning to recover that by force, which otherwise he could not obtaine by quiet meanes. ¶ This yere the people paid a fifteenth to the king of all their temporall goods, which was said to be granted first to his father.

March, Westm.
Bretton bishop of Hereford departeth this life.

The same yere departed this life John Bretton bishop of Hereford, who being verie expert in the lawes of the land, compiled a booke of them called Le Bretton. The 11 of September, a generall earthquake chanced betwixt the first houre and the third of the same daie, the church of S. Michael on the hill without Claffenburie, was therewith throwne down to the ground. After this, it rained blood in the countrie of Wales, as a prodigious evill token to that nation, with whose blood thortlie after that region was in manie places moistened and stained. For as it chanced thortlie after, Leolin the sonne of Griffin came to have the government of Wales, who partlie to raise new seditions in England, and partlie to purchase him friendship and alliance in France, sent unto king Phillip, requiring of him that he might have in marriage the ladie Cleane, daughter to Simon Montfort earle of Leicester, the which together with his mother and brother Emerike, remained as banished persons in France. The French king granted his request, and sent him under the conduct of his said brother to be conveyed into Wales unto Leolin, who had promised to marrie him. But yer they approached to Wales, at the Ile of Sillie both the brother & sister were taken by foure ships of Bristow, the owners whereof that so toke them, sent them unto king Edward. When Leolin understood that his wife was taken from him by the waie as he was coming, he was not a little wroth, and incontinentlie began to make warre upon king Edwards subjects that bordered nere unto Wales, killing the people, spoiling their goods, and burning by their townes and houses on each side.

The earle of Montforts daughter appointed wife to the prince of Wales taken.

Leolin prince of Wales beginning to make wars.
March, Westm.

Herewith the king of England was so moved, that although the said Leolin made sute for peace, and offered no small sum of monie to have the daughter of the earle of Leicester his fianced wife delivered to him, yet would not the king by any meanes consent to that marriage, nor receive any monie of him, except he would restore unto the right owners such lands as he had invaded and got into his possession, and further repaire such castles as he had destroyed. Whereupon grew no small grudge betwixt the Welshmen and Englishmen, so that to represse the invasion of the enemies in the parts towards

Bristow, Mountgomerie and Chester, the king sent three hundred men in armes on horsebacke. In the quindene of Easter, the king departing from Westminster, hasted towards Wales with a mightie power, and caused the courts of the erchebisher and of his bench to remove unto Shrewesburie, that they might be nere unto him, making forward with all convenient speed to come to the aid and succour of his liege people.

10 Whereupon entering into Wales he toke the castle of Rutland, and sent into West Wales a valiant captain named Rhaine de Camureys, who with fire and sword wasted that countrie, so that the people offering themselves to the kings peace, delivered unto the said Rhaine the castle of Stridborne with the countrie adjoining. When Leolin the prince of Wales, perceiving that he was not able to resist the kings power, and knowing that if he did attempt the conflict against him the danger would rebound

20 to himself & his traine, did as thold verse counsellors, and therefore made suit for peace, in so much that finally it was agreed, that commissioners for both parts should talke concerning certaine articles, and whatsoever they concluded, aswell the king as the said Leolin should hold the same for firme and stable. The king appointed one of his commissioners, to wit, the lord Robert de Liptoft, to take an oth for him, & authorized the said Robert, Anthony Beke, and frier William de Southampton, prior prouinciall of the friers preachers, commissioners, nominated on his behalfe, to receive the like oth of the said Leolin. Which Leolin appointed commissioners for his part, Tudor ap Edeuener, and Grono ap Helin, the which commissioners with good deliberation concluded upon certaine points and articles, of which the principall were as followeth.

First, that the said Leolin should set at libertie all prisoners which he held in captivitie for the king of Englands cause, frelie and without all challenge.

40 Secondlie, that to have peace and the kings of Englands favour, he should giue unto the said king fiftie thousand pounds sterling, the daies of the payment whereof to rest in the kings will and pleasure.

Thirde, that the land of the foure cantreds with out all contradiction should remaine for ever to the king and his heires, with all lands conquered by the king and his people, the Ile of Anglesey excepted, which Ile was granted to the prince, so that he should 50 paie for the same yereleie the summe of one thousand marks, and five thousand marks for an income. Provided, that if the prince chanced to die without issue, then the said Ile to reuert againe into the kings hands.

4 Fourthe, that the prince shall come to Rothelan or Rothland (as it is commonlie called) there to do fealtie to the king, and before his coming thither, he should be absolved and have the interdiction of his lands released, and at his being at Rothelan, a date shall be appointed him by the king for his coming to London, there to do his homage. Whereupon was order taken for his safe conduct, aswell in his coming to Rothelan, as to London. There he that wrote that he was appointed to come unto London, at the feast of the natiuitie of our Lord.

5 Fiftie, it was couenanted, that all the homages of Wales should remaine to the king, except onelie of five barons which inhabited nere unto the castle of Snowdon: for otherwise the said Leolin could not conveniently call himselfe prince, except he had some barons under him.

6 Sixtie, that he should receive the title and name of prince so long as he liued, and after his decesse the homages of those five barons should reuert to the king king and to his brethren.

Seventhly the king granted unto the said Leolin, the lands that belonged to his brother David, for the term of the said Leolin's life, and in recompense thereof was contented to sattle the said David with other lands in some other place, the which offer the be- cause of the said Leolin, the said David should reuert to the king and his heirs. And the said Leolin, for the assurance of which articles and covenants the prince delivered for hostages, ten persons of the best in Wales, which he could get, without imprisonment, disseising, or tennement of deliverance, and of ex- uerie cantred twentie persons, of the best and most sufficient, to be chosen by such as the king shall send thither, perelle, shall from yere to yere be swared upon the euangelists, in presence of the justices of the said Leolin, that whosoever the prince shall breake any of these articles, and upon a condition both not reforme himselfe, they shall forsake him, and in all things, being unto him open enemies, shall boare him deable hostility.

Besides this, the prince shall (as farre as in him may lie) pacifie his brethren, of the which he had put two in prison, Owen and Roder (the) the which named Dwen, escaping his hands, fled into England, and remained many yeres with king Edward, who receiving him into his service, made him knight in this warre, and gaue unto him a castell at Denbigh in Wales, with lands to the perelle value of a thousand marks, in recompense of those possessions which he ought to haue had in Anglesey, the which (as before is said) the king granted unto Leolin for terme of his life, and after his decesse to reuert unto the king and to his heirs. Moreover, he preferred David to the marriage of a tollie widow, that was daughter to the earle of Darbie.

As concerning Dwen, through the kings fauour he was deliuered out of prison, by force of the arti- cles concluded at this present by the commissioners, under this forme and maner: that upon his being set at libertie, certeine persons appointed by the king should make offer to him, to chosse whether he would first compound with his brother, and thereupon come to the king, and beseech him to allow the composition, or else to put himselfe under the safe keeping of the king, till according to the lawes and customes of Wales, in the place where he did transgresse, iudge- ment should be giuen of the matter: and if he were acquit, then might he demand his heritage if he thought it so expedient: and which of these two waies he should chosse, the same should be made firme and stable in the kings preference.

All these articles, with other additions, were accor- ded by the said commissioners at Aberconweie, on the tuesday before the feast of S. Martine, in the yere 1277, and letters of confirmation made thereof by the king, dated at Rutland on the tenth daie of No- uember, in the fift yere of his reigne. Also the said Leolin, by the name of Leolin ap Griffin prince of Wales, with letters under his seale, confirmed the abovesaid articles on his behalfe, for the releasing of his right to the foure cantreds and other things that should remaine to the king, which letters bare date at Aberconweie, on the foresaid tuesday in the said yere 1277. Also the king released to the said Leolin, the said summe of fiftie thousand pounds, and the said summe of a thousand marks perelle to be paid for the Ile of Anglesey, as by his letters dated at Rut- land on the said 10 daie of Nouember in the said fift yere of his reigne more at large it appereth. Fewer- thelesse by his letters dated at Rutland, on the said e- leuenth of the said month of Nouember, it is euident that he receiued of the said Leolin the summe of two thousand marks sterling, by the hands of Thomas Beke keeper of his wardrobe.

Moreover, the king in the west part of Wales built at the same time a castle at Lampordenaur, to kepe under the rebellious attempts of the Welshmen. King Edward gaue in marriage by waies of restitu- tion to the fore-remembered Leolin prince of Wales the earle of Leicester's daughter, which was taken (as ye haue heard) at the Ile of Sullie. He also bare all the charges of the feast at the daie of the marriage, and honored the same with the presence of himselfe and the queene. A subsidy of the twentieth part of euerie mans goods was granted to the king, for wards his charges sustained in the Welsh warres. Moreover, in the first yere of his reigne, Edward held a parlement at Gloucester, in the which were cer- teine acts and statutes made for the wealth and good gouernment of the realme, which unto this daie are called the statutes of Gloucester. Alexander king of Septe came into England, to common with is, Edward, of matters touching his kingdome of Scotland. Shortly after king Edward went ouer into France, and there receiued certeine tollages that were restored to him, but not the moitie of those that were promised to his father, when he released his sitle unto the butchie of Normandie.

Robert Kilwarbie archbishop of Canterbury, was by pope Nicholas advanced to the dignitie of a cardinal, and made bishop of Portus, so that he went to Rome, and gaue ouer the archbishopricke of Canterbury, to the which through the popes grant- frier John Beckham was admitted archbishop. This yere there was inquirie made in London for such as had clipped, washed, & counterfitted the kings coine, whereupon the felwes of the citie and diuers gold- smiths that kept the exchange of silver were imple- and after to the number of two hundred foure score and seuentene persons were condemned, and in di- uers places put to execution. There were but 3 En- glishmen among them, all the residue were felwes, but diuerse christians that were participants with them in their offences were put to their fines, and not without iust cause.

About the same time the king removed all such shiriffes as were either priests or strangers, and in their places appointed knights to be shiriffes, that were of the same cuntry where their offices laie. Moreover, about this season king Edward builded the castell of Flint, and fortified the castell of Rut- land and others, placing garrisons of Englishmen in the same to defend the cuntry, and to kepe the Welshmen under obedience. But Leolin so smallie regarded all covenants made, and bene- fits receiued, that shortly after, upon the death of his late married wife, being summoned to come to a parlement holden by king Edward, he disdaind to obeie, and upon a berie spite began to make new warre to the Englishmen, in wasting and destrui- eng the cuntry: notwithstanding king Edward had so manie waies done him good, and had giuen him iust cause of thankfulness, which is the common reward of benefites, and which little recompense tho- so neglecteth to make, being but a little lip-labour.

But being put in feare with the kings comming towards him with his power, he laid armes aside, and began entones to require peace, which the king now the second time did not denie to grant; because he would not lose time to warre with the mounteins, woods and marishes, the places of refuge for Welsh- men in those daies, when they wanted power to a- bide battell and kepe the felos. About the same time the king gaue unto David the brother of Leolin the lordship of Frodestham in Cheshire, and made him knight. Moreover, in this yere the king held a parle- ment,

Frier John Peckham, whome the pope had aleedie consecrated archbishop of Canturburie, being the 47 in number that had governed the said see, came this yeare over into England to supplie the rome. ¶ Also Walter Gifford archbishop of Forke departed this life, in whose place succeeded Willm Wickham, the 37 archbishop there. The archbishop of Canturburie held a synod at Reading about the late ter end of Julie, wher he renewed the constitutions of the generall counsell, as thus: That no ecclesiast-call person shoulde have above one benefice to the which belonged cure of soules; and againe, that all those that were promoted to any ecclesiasticall living, shoulde receive the order of pze within one yere after his being promoted therunto.

In this yeare the king took order for the amending of his monie and coine, which in that season was foully clipped, washed, and counterfeited by those naughtie men the Jewes, and other, as before you have partly heard. The king therefore in the octaves of the Trinitie sent forth commandment to all the shirffes within the land, that such monie as was counterfeited, clipped or washed, shoulde not be currant from thenceforth: and furthermore he sent of his stone treasure, good monie and not clipped, unto certaine cities and townes in the realme, that exchange might be made with the same till new monie were stamped. About the third daie of August, the first exchange was made of the new monie of pence and farthings; but yet the old monie went all this yeare together with the new, and then was the old coine generallie forbidden, and commandment given by publike proclamation, that from thenceforth it shoulde no moze be allowed for currant. Herewith also halfpence, which had bene stamped in the meane time, began to come abroad the same day in which the old monie was thus prohibited.

The lord Roger Spottimer kept a great feast at Billingworth, with iusts and triumphs of an hundred knights and as manie ladies, to the which resorted lords, knights, & gentlemen from diuerse countries and lands, to shew proofe of their valiance in the practise of warlike feats and exercises. In the meane season king Edward standing in need of mo-nie, deuised a new shift to serue his turne, as this:
namely that wheras he was chiefe lord of many lordships, manours, possessions and tenements, he well vnderstood, that partly by length and proces of time, and partly by casualties during the troubles of the ciuill warres, manie mens euidences, as their charters, deeds, copies and other writings were lost, washed, and made awaie, he therefore vnder colour to put the statute of (Quo warrant) in execution, which was ordeined this yeare in the parlement holden at Glocester in August last past (as some write) did now command by publike proclamation, that all such as held any lands or tenements of him, shoulde come and shew by what right and title they held the same, that by such meanes their possessions might returne vnto him, by echeat as chiefe lord of the same, and so to be sold or redeemed againe at his hands.

This was thought to be so sore a proclamation, as that a moze greuous had not lightlie bene heard of.
Open in euerie place made complaint and shewed themselves greivouslie offended, so that the king by meanes thereof came in great hatred of his people: but the meane sort of men, though they stood in defence of their right, yet it auailed them but little, because they had no euidence to shew, so that they were constrained to be quiet with losse, rather than to strive against the streame. Spanie were thus called to answer, till at length the lord John Warren earle of Surrie, a man greatly beloved of the people, perceiving the king to have cast his net for a pze, and that there was not one that woulde make against him; determined to stand against those so bitter and cruell proceedings. And the residue being called asone the instices about this matter, he appeared, and being asked by what right he held his lands, suddenly drawing forth an old rustie sword; By this instrument (said he) doe I hold my lands; and by the same I intend to defende them. Our antecessors comming into this realme with William the Conquerour, conquered theire lands with the sword; and with the same will I defend me from all those that shall be about to take them from me: he did not make a conquest of this realme above; our progenitors were with him as participantes and helpes.

The king vnderstanding into what hatred his people by this meanes he was fallen, and the sore demons to avoid ciuill dissention and war that might therby issue, he lett off his began practise: so that the thing which generallie shoulde haue touched and bene hurtfull to all men, was now suddenly staied by the manhood and couragious stoutnesse onlie of one man, the foresaid earle, who in his rare act of defending common equitie against the mightie antho-ritie who spared not to offer extreme inurie, shewed himselfe a verie true and naturall branch of nobilitie, capis qua fraudula super,

Vilia continent, qua solum tendere ut ignis

Nisitur, et summas penetrat, velut ardea ruber.

The archbishop of Canturburie held another synod at Lambeth, in the which he receiued and confirmed the orders and constitutions decreed and established by the legats Tho and Adhobone, in counsels by them kept here within this realme, adding thereto other of his owne: & in the same counsell he went about to aduocate certain liberties belonging to the croune, as the taking knowlege of the right of pa-tronages and the kings prohibitions in placitis deca-talis, and such like, which seemed merite to touch the spiritualtie. But the king by some in that counsell withstood the archbishop openlie, and with menaces staied him from concluding any thing that might preiudice his roiall liberties and prerogatiues. King Edward held a parlement at London, in the which he demanded a sixteenth of the cleargie, which latelie before he had got of the temporalitie. The archbishop of Forke was content at the first to grant this sixteenth to be paid of the cleargie within his diocesse in two yeares; but the archbishop of Canturburie held off, and required respite till the next parlement to be holden after Easter, and then he granted vnto the king the sixteenth of all his cleargie for three yeares, that in some point he might be different from the archbishop of Forke.

In the ninth yeare of king Edwards reigne, the feast of the round table was kept at Warktoke with great and sumptuous triumph. Whilist these things were in doing, Dauid brother to Leolin prince of Wales, forgetting the great benefitts which he had receiued at the hands of king Edward, became his aduersarie, and caused his said brother the prince of Wales with a great number of other noble men of that countrie to rebell: and to encourage them the soner to attempt the warre, he began the first ex-plot himselfe, taking the said lord Roger Clifford (a right worthy and famous knight) in his castell of Harwardine, vpon Palmesdaye, the said lord being in no doubt of any such matter. Diuerse knights and other that were in the same castell at that time, and made resistance, were slaine.

After this the foresaid Dauid returned to his brother the prince, and therewith assembling an armie, they went both together and besieged the castell of Warktoke.

Kutland. King Edward at the same time being in the parts about Salisburie, where he kept his Easter at the Nics, sent out commissioners to leaue an armie, and commanded such men of warre as he had then in a readinesse, to hast forth to the rescue of the castell of Kutland. And in the meane time, the castell of Lamperdenaur was taken by Rice ap Ihalgone and Griffith ap Iheridoc. Also diuerse other castells were taken by other of the Welsh nobilitie. Moreover, about this time by the labour and suit of John the archbishop of Canturburie, Emericke de Montfort, which had bene retained in prison (sith that he was first taken together with his sister at the Isle of Skille by the Wiffolwomen) was now set at libertie and permitted to returne into France. The said archbishop of Canturburie was sent into Wales to persuade Leolin and his brother with the other rebels unto peace and quietnesse, but returning into England, without bringing anie thing to passe, he denounced them accursed.

1282 The king entred into Wales.

The king hastened forth to come to the rescue of his people, whereupon Leolin and his brother David retired with their people to Snowdon hilles, and fortified the castell there with a strong garrison of men. The king entring into Wales, when he heard that his enemies were withdrawn into the mounteins, passed forth till he came nere unto them, where he pitched downe his field, and the next day causing his horsemen to issue forth of the campe, filled all the plaines which compassed the foot of those hilles (aswell on the east side as toward the south) with the same horsemen, and herewith placed his footmen more aloft on the side of the hilles in covert: this done he prouoked his enemies to come forth to fight, but when he saw this would not be, then that he might stop them from all places of refuge, he caused his ships to take the Isle of Anglesey, because the Welshmen used to flee thither oftentimes for their safeguard, in the which enterprise the mariners of the cinque ports bare themselves right manfullie.

The mariners of the cinque ports.

Meneth.

After this, joining certeine vessels together, he caused a bridge to be made in the riuer of Meneth, into the which an other small riuer falleth that riseth at the roots of those hilles of Snowdon, to keepe the enemies from lodging on the further side of that riuer. This bridge containing some for threescore armed men to passe afront, was made ouer the riuer of Meneth, by the which men saile into the Isle, which by the course of the sea ebbe and floweth euerie twelue houres. But so it came to passe, that before the bridge was well boarded ouer, whilst the king yet remained at Aberconwaite, diuerse of the English nobilitie, to the number of seauen banerets with thre hundred armed men rashly passed ouer, and as they surueied the foot of the mounteine, the tide began to come in so swifflie, that where the Englishmen were advanced a good prettie waie from the water side, they could not now get backe againe to the bridge which as yet was not fullie made vp.

The Englishmen distressed by welshmen.

The lord Cliford.

Claron. Dunst.

The Welshmen perceiving this, came downe beside the mounteine, and assailed the Englishmen verie fiercelie, and with their great multitude so oppressed them, that for feare the Englishmen were driven to take the water, and so by reason they were loaden with armour, manie of them were drowned: and amongst other, that famous knight sir Lucas de Thanie, Robert Cliford, sir William Lindsey, and two gentlemen of god accompt that were brethren to Robert Burnell as then bishop of Bath. There perished in all (as some saie) thirtene knights, seuentene yong gentlemen, and to the number of two hundred footmen. Yet sir William Latimer, as god had would, escaped, and diuerse other. This mischance happened on S. Leonards day.

The castell of Rutland besieged.

In this meane time in an other part of the countrie the earle of Glocester with an armie, made soe warre to the Welshmen, and nere unto the towne called Lantlaware, fought a soe battell with them, in the which manie of the Welshmen being slaine, the earle lost also five knights upon his partie, as William Malence the yonger, being one of that number, who was the kings cousine. The earle of Glocester then departing from thence, Leolin the prince of Wales entered into the countrie of Cardigan and Stradwre, destroying the lands of Rice ap Iheridoc, which now held with the king against the said prince. At length, prince Leolin going towards the land of Buellth with a small companie, left his maine armie behind him aloft upon the top of the mounteine, nere to the water called Waite, and he had set a number of his people to keepe the bridge of Deuwin: and so the Welshmen kept on the one side, and the Englishmen on the other, of whom were capitains the lord John Gifford and the lord Edmund Mortimer, the which perceiving the Welshmen that were readie to defend the bridge, and a great host of them upon the top of the mounteine, they consulted together what they were best to do.

Helias Walewaine.

At length by the couragious exhortation of one Helias Walewaine they drew on the one hand alongst the riuer, where was a ford passable in deed, though not without danger: but yet the Englishmen by the conduct of the same Helias, got ouer by the same ford, so that it bare the name long after of Helias way. And so the Welshmen that kept the bridge (perceiving the Englishmen to be got ouer unto that side) fled, whereupon the residue of the English armie passed ouer at the bridge, whereof rose a great noise, which Leolin lurking not farre off might well heare, but yet at the first he could not be brought to thinke that by any possible means the Englishmen were got ouer to that side of the water. But yet perceiving it to be true, he drew backe toward the height of the mounteine againe, neuertheless being discovered by one Stephan de Franketon, named by some writers Sward, he was so narrowly pursued of the same Stephan, that he was overtaken and slaine.

Stephan not knowing whome he had slaine, returned to the host, the which was now mounting vp the hill to ioine with the Welsh armie that stood still looking for the returne of their prince Leolin (though in vaine) yet they manfullie abode by their tackle, discharging plentie of arrowes and darts at the Englishmen as they came vp towards them. The English archers which were mingled amongst the horsemen, paid them home againe with their shot, so that finally the English horsemen, winning the top of the hill, slue manie of them standing stoutlie at defence, and put the residue to flight. Stephan Sward that had slaine Leolin, after the victorie was achieved, rode to the dead bodie which he had slaine in the beginning of the battell, and upon Deu taken of him perceived who he was, of which god hap the Englishmen were verie iofull. His head was herewith cutt off, which the lord Edmund Mortimer took with him unto Rutland (where the king as then was lodged) unto whome he presented it: and the king sent it unto London, appointing that there should be a yvie crowne set upon it, in token that he was a prince, and so being adorned, a horseman carried it upon the end of his staffe through Cheapside, holding it as he rode on height, that all men might see it, till he came to the tower, where it was plight up aloft upon one of the highest turrets, remaining there a long time after. Thus was the prophesie fulfilled, which was said.

things in due and reasonable order) was having alreadie put armour upon his backe, would not now incline to any peace, but to reuenge his cause, assembled a great multitude of Welshmen, with whose helpe he burnt & destroyed manie towines in Wales, so that the king being then beyond the seas, sent to the earle of Cornewall, whom in his absence he had appointed his lieutenant ouer England, requiring him to send an armie into Wales, to resist the malice and riotous attempts of the Welshmen. The earle shortly thereupon prepared an armie, and went with the same into Wales, or (as other write) the bishop of Ely, the lord prior of S. Johns, the earle of Gloucester, and diuerse barons of the land went thither, and chasing the said king, dispersed his armie, and ouerthrew and rased his castles, but by undermining and reuerling the wals at the castell of Dunsan, with the fall therof, the baron Stafford, and the lord William de Pontchenie, with manie other knights and squiers, were oppressed and bused to death. ¶ This yeare, the king at Blankfote in Galcoigne, took upon him the crosse, purposing it to make a iourneie against Gods enemies.

In the winter of this yeare great floods chanced, by reason of the exceeding abundance of raine that fell: and the sea alongst the northeast coasts from Humber to Portsmouth, brake into the land, ouerflowing the same by the space of three or foure leagues in breadth (as the author of the Chronicle of Dunstable affirmeth) ouerthrowing buildings, and drowning by men and cattell that could not auoid the danger by the sudden comming in thereof, namelie, about Portsmouth, Dunwich, and Gipestwich. Likewise in the Pers land of Lincolnshire it did passing great hurt, bringing all the countrie into water. This chanced in the berie night of the beginning of this yeare, to wit, in the feast of the circumcision of our Lord, and in December it brake out againe in Northfolke and Suffolke, where it did much harme, namelie about

This yeare, and likewise the yeare last past, was such plenty of graine, that wheat was sold in some places of this land for twentie pence a quarter, and in some places for fiftene pence, and pease for twelue pence a quarter. The summer this yeare exceeded in heat, so that men thorough the intemperate excessive thereof died in diuers places. ¶ It chanced in Galcoigne, that as the king & queene sate in their chamber upon a bed talking together, the thunder-bolt comming in at the window behind them, passed through betwixt them as they sate, and slue two of their gentlemen that stood before them, to the great terror of all that were present. ¶ This yeare diuerse of those that robbd the faire at Boston, were executed.

Howeuer, whereas king ap Meridoc continued still in his mischieuous doings, at length, the lord deputie of Wales, Robert Tiptot, using both spiedie diligence and timelie counsell, gathered all such power as he could make, & passed forth against his aduersaries. Whereof when king was aduertised, and understanding that the Englishmen were farre fewer in number than his Welshmen, he thought to ouerthrow them at his pleasure, and therefore encouraging his people with manie comfortable words, to shew their manhood upon the Englishmens approach, he hastied to meet them. The Welshmen being for the more part but yong souldiers, and not trained to keepe any order of battell, ran fiercelie upon their enemies, assailing them on the front before, on the sides a flanke, and on the backe behind, inforcing themselves to the uttermost of their power to brake their arraie.

But the Englishmen valiantlie resisted, so that there was a sore battell for a while, and the more cou-ragionlie the Welshmen assailed, the more stoutlie the Englishmen defended, in keeping themselves close together, and beating backe their aduersaries: and at length perceiving them to faint and wearie, they rushed forth into the middle of the Welshmen, & brake them in funder, so that when they saw themselves thus repelled by the Englishmen, contrarie vnto all their expectation, they knew not what to do, for they durst neither fight nor flee, and so by that meanes were beaten downe on euerie side. The lord himselfe was taken, but the most part of all his armie was slaine, to the number of foure thousand men. Thus were the Welshmen worthilie chastised for their rebellion. Sir Rias ap Meridoc was had to Pothe, where at length, after the king was returned out of Galcoigne, he was hanged, drawn and quartered.

This yeare on S. Margarets euen, that is, the daie of Julie, fell a wonderfull tempest of haile, that the like had not bene seene nor heard of by any man then liuing. And after, there ensued such continuall raine, so dissembling the ground, that coine warden verie deare, so that whereas wheat was sold before at three pence a bushell, the market for rose by little and little, that it was sold for two shillings a bushell, and so the dearth increased still almost by the space of 40 yeares, till the death of Edward the second, in so much that sometime a bushell of wheat London measure was sold at ten shillings.

The king, after he had remained and continued three yeares, two moneths, and fiftene daies in Galcoigne, and in other parts there beyond the sea, he returned into England on the fourth day of August, and upon the euen of the Assumption of our ladye he came to London, where he was most ioyfullie received, & so came to Westminster: where shortly after were presented vnto him manie grieuous complaints and informations against diuerse of his officers, as Sir Thomas Weiland, Adam Strepton, and others, the which were had in examination, and thereupon found gillie of manie trespasses and transgressions, in so much that it was giuen him to understand, that there were among them that had giuen consent to the committing of murders and robberies, and whettinglye had receiued the offenders.

Whereupon, the king caused streight inquirie to be made by an inquest of 12 substantiall personages, who found by verdict, that Thomas Weiland lord chiefe iustice of the kings bench, had caused another to be done by his seruants, and after succoured and maintained them: whereupon he was by the kings officers arrested, but escaping their hands, he took sanctuary in the church of the friers minors at saint Edmundesburie, and was admitted into their habit, but within fourtie daies after, order was giuen by the king that no kind of vittels should be suffered to be conueied to that house, so that all the friers came forth, except three or foure, and at length he was constrained to take vpon him a laie mans apparell, and comming forth was deliuered to the hands of Robert Galet knight, who had before the custodie of him, and now hauing him againe brought him to the towne of London. At length, he was put to his choise of three waies, which sooner of them he would take, that is, whether to be tried by his peeres, or to remaine in perpetuall prison, or to abjure the realme: he chose the last, and so bare-footed and bare-headed, bearing a crosse in his hand, he was conueied from the towne to Douer, where taking the sea, he was transported to the further side of the sea; his goods, moveable and immouable, being confiscated to the kings coffers.

kings bench: also, Robert Lichburle chapleine, and maister of the rolles, being accused of wrongfull iudgements and other trespasses were committed to prison within the tower, and at length with much ado, escaped with paieng their fines, so that he which paid least, gaue a thousand marks. Moreover, Salomon of Rochester, Thomas de Sudington, Richard de Bolland, and Walter de Hopton, iustices itinerants, were likewise punished, and for the semblable offenses put to their fines. Sir Kafe de Wingham a iustice also, to whom in the kings absence the ordering of the realme cheselic appertained, being accused of diuerse transgressions, and committed to the tower, redeemed his offense for an infinit summe of monie. Adam de Stratton, lord chiefe baron of the exchequer, being conuicted of manie hainous crimes, a man plentifully provided both of temporall possessions, and ecclesiasticall reuenues, lost all his temporall liuings, and foure and thirtie thousand marks in readie coine, beside other moueables, in cattell, Jewels and furniture of houtholds, which were all confiscated, and forfeited wholie: and it was thought he was gentlie dealt with, that he escaped with life, and such spirituall liuings as to him remained. Henrie Bjaie elscheator, and the iudges ouer the Jewes, were reported to haue committed manie greuous offenses, but for monie they bought their peace. To conclude, there was not found any amongst all the iustices and officers clere and void of briuist dealing except John de Wetingham, and Elias de Bekingham, who onelic among the rest had behaued themselves byrightlie. When therfore such greuous complaints were exhibited to the king, he appointed the earle of Lincoln, the bishop of Elic, and others, to heare euerie mans complaint, and vpon due examination & trall, to see them answered accordinglie as right and equitie should require. In which administration of iustice against euill iusticiaries, the king perfozmed the charge imposed and laid vpon all such as are in gouernement and magistracie; naimelic,

The Statutes of Westminster the third established.

The Jewes banished out of England.

*Nunc igitur reges respiciere querite restum.
Quorum iudicij terra regenda data est.*

In the eighteenth yeare of his reigne, the king married two of his daughters, that is to saie, Joane de Acres unto Gilbert de Clare earle of Gloucester, and the ladie Margaret vnto the lord John Sayne to the duke of Brabant. The king ordeined, that all the wool, which should be sold vnto strangers, should be brought vnto Sandwich, where the Staple thereof was kept long time after. In the same yeare was a parliament holden at Westminster, wherein the statutes of Westminster the third were ordeined. It was also decreed, that all the Jewes should auoid out of the land, in consideration whereof, a fifthenth was granted to the king, and so hereupon were the Jewes banished out of all the kings dominions, and neuer since could they obtaine any priuilege to returne hither againe. All their goods not moueable were confiscated, with their tailies and obligations; but all other their goods that were immouable, together with their estate of gold and siluer, the king licensed them to haue and conuey with them. A foz of the richest of them, being shipped with their treasure in a mighty tall ship which they had hired, when the same was vnder saile, and got downe the Thames towards the mouth of the riuer beyond Dintwiche, the maister mariner bethought him, of a while, and caused his men to cast anchor, and so rode at the same, till the ship by ebbing of the streame remained on the drie lands. The maister herewith enticed the Jewes to walke out with him on land for recreation. And at length, when he vnderstood the tide to be coming in, he got him backe to the ship, whither he was drawne vp by a cord. The Jewes made not so much hast as he did, because they were not ware of the danger. But when they perceived how the matter stood, they cried to him for helpe: howbeit he told them, that they ought to crie rather vnto God, by whose conduct their fathers passed through the red sea, and therfore, if they would call to him for helpe, he was able inough to helpe them out of those raging floods, which now came in vpon them: they cried indeed, but no succour appeared, and so they were swallowed vp in water. The maister returned with the ship, and told the king how he had used the matter, and had both thanks and reward, as some haue written. But other affirme (and more true) as should seeme, that diuerse of those mariners, which dealt so wickedlie against the Jewes, were hanged for their wicked practise, and so receiued a iust reward of their fraudulent and mischeuous dealing. But now to the purpose.

In the foresaid parlement, the king demanded an aid of monie of the spiritualtie, for that (as he pretended) he meant to make a iourne into the holie land, to succour the christians there: wherupon they granted to him the eleuenth part of all their moueables. He receiued the monie aforehand, but letted by other businesse at home, he went not forth vpon that iourne. In the nineteenth yeare of king Edwards quene Elianor king Edwards wife died vpon saint Andrews euen at Herdebie, or Herdelie (as some haue) nere to Lincolne, the king being as then on his waie towards the borders of Scotland: but hauing now lost the iewel which he most esteemed, he returned towards London to accompanie the corps vnto Westminster, where it was buried in S. Edwards chapell, at the feet of king Henrie the thirde. She was a goodlie and modest princesse, full of pitie, and one that shewed much fauour to the English nation, ready to releue euerie mans greefe that suffred wrong, and to make them friends that were at discord, so farre as in hir laie. In euerie towne and place, where the corps rested by the waie, the king caused a crosse of cunning workmanship to be erected in remembrance of hir, and in the same was a picture of hir ingrauen. Two of the like crosses were set vp at London, one at Charing, and the other in Westcheape. Moreover, he gaue in almes euerie Wednesday wheresoeuer he went, pence a peece, to all such poore folkes as came to demand the same.

About the same time, because the king should be the more willing to go into the holie land, as he had promised to do, hauing monie to furnish him forth, the pope granted vnto him the tenth of the church of England, Scotland and Ireland, according to the true value of all the reuenues belonging vnto the same for six yeares. He wrote to the bishops of Lincoln and Winchester, that the same tenth should be laid vp in monasteries and abbeies, till the king was entred into the sea, called Mare Maggiore, forwarde on his iourne eastwards, and then to be paid to his use. But the king afterwards caused the collectors to make payment to him of the same tenth gathered for thre yeares, and laid vp in monasteries, although he let not one foot forward in that iourne, as letted through other businesse.

Also, by reason of the controuersie which depended as then betwixt diuerse persons, as competitors of the crowne of Scotland, he went into the north parts and kept his easter at Bewcastle, and thortlie after, called a parlement at Northampton; where, by the aduise of the prelates and other of his counsell, learned in both the lawes, vpon knowledge had by search of records, and chronicles of ancient time, he caused all the prelates and barons of Scotland to be called afore him, and there in the parish church of Northam, he declared vnto them his right to the superiourtie of the kingdome of Scotland, and requiring of them, that they would recognise the same, protesting that he would defend the right of his crowne, to the shedding of his owne blood, that a true certificat and information might come to light of his title and rightfull claime, unto the direct and suppreme dominion of uer the realme of Scotland.

He had caused be relie all the histories, chronicles, and monuments that were to be found within England, Scotland and Wales, to be sought up and perused, that it might be known what right he had in this behalf. Whereupon it was found by the chronicles of Marianus the Scot, William of Malmesburie, Roger Houeden, Henrie Huntington, Rafe de Diceto, and others, that in the yeare of our Lord 910, E. Edward surnamed Senio, or the elder, subdued to him the kings of Scots and Welshmen, so that in the yeare 921, the same people chose the said Edward to be their king and patron. And likewise in the yeare 926, Athelstan king of England vanquished Constantine king of Scotland, and permitted him yet to reigne under him. Moreover, Edred the brother of Athelstan, and king of England, overcame the Scots and Northumbers, the which submitted themselves to him and swore him fealtie. Also Edgar king of England vanquished Kingeth the son of Alpine king of Scotland, who swore fealtie to him. Likewise Canute king of England and Denmarke, in the 106 yeare of his reigne overcame Malcolme king of Scots, & so became king of foure kingdoms, England, Scotland, Denmarke, and Norwaie.

Furthermore, that blessed king S. Edward, gaue the kingdome of Scotland unto Malcolme the sonne of the king of Cumberland, to hold the same of him. Again, William Bassard the Norman conqueror, in the first yeare of his reigne vanquished Malcolme king of Scotland, and receiued of him an oth of fealtie. Also, Will. Rufus did the like unto Malcolme king of Scots, and two of his sonnes that successorie reigned ouer that realme. Also, Alexander succeeded his brother Edgar in the kingdome of Scotland, by consent of S. Henrie the first. Also David king of Scotland did homage to S. Stephen, & William B. of Scots did homage to Henrie, the son of S. Henrie the second, when in his fathers life time he was crowned; and againe, to Henrie the father in the 20 yeare of his reigne, as by an agreement made betwixt them two it both appeare. Also, Roger Houeden saith, that William king of Scotland came to his soueraigne lord king Henrie into Normandie, and likewise to king Richard, and moreover to king John at Lincolne, doing to them his homage. Also, in the chronicles of S. Albons it is found, that Alexander king of Scotland married at Porke Margaret the daughter of king Henrie the third, in the 35 yeare of his reigne, and did to him homage.

And further, when king Edward himselfe was crowned at Westminster, in the yeare of our Lord 1274, being the second of his reigne, the last deceased K. of Scotland, Alexander the third of that name did homage unto him at Westminster the moxio after the coronation. All which homages and fealties thus done by sundrie kings of Scotland, unto sundrie kings of England, were direct and most manifestly proued to be done for the realme of Scotland, and not onelie for the lands which they held of the kings of England within England, as the Scottish writers would seeme to colour the matter. But things bring then first in memorie, no such confirmation might be ascribed. And so hereupon king Edwards title being substantiated proued, he was recognised superior lord of Scotland, of all them that pretended title at that time to that kingdome, by writings thereof made and confirmed under their

land, Robert le Bruce lord of Annandale, Iohn de Balioll lord of Galloway, Iohn Hastings lord of Abergeuenny, Iohn Comin lord of Badenaw, Patrike de Dunbarre the earle of March, Iohn de Vescy in ſtead of his father, Nicholas de Sules, William de Ros, ſend greeting in our lord. Bicaufe that of our good will and common aſſent, without all constraint, we doo conſent and grant vnto the noble prince the lord Edward, by the grace of God king of England, that he as ſuperiour lord of Scotland, may heare, examine, define and determine our claimes, chalenges, and petitions, which we intend to ſhew and prooue for our right, to be receiued before him as ſuperiour lord of the land, promiſing moreouer, that we ſhall take his deed for firme and ſtable, and that he ſhall inioy the kingdome of Scotland, whoſe right ſhall by declaration beſt appear before him.

Whereas then the ſaid king of England cannot in this manner take knowledge, nor fulfill our meahings without iudgement, nor iudgement ought to be without execution, nor execution may in due forme be doone without poſſeſſion and ſeizine of the ſaid land and caſtels of the ſame; we will, conſent, and grant, that he as ſuperiour lord to performe the premisses may haue the ſeizine of all the land and caſtels of the ſame, till they that pretend title to the crowne be ſatiſfied in their ſuit, ſo that before he be put in poſſeſſion and ſeizine, he find ſufficient ſuertie to vs that pretend title, and to the wardens, and to all the communalitie of the kingdome of Scotland, that he ſhall reſtore the ſame kingdome with all the roialtie, dignitie, ſeigniorie, liberties, cuſtomes, rights, lawes, viages, poſſeſſions, and all and whatſoeuer the apurtenances, in the ſame ſtate wherein they were before the ſeizine to him deliuered, vnto him to whome by right it is due, according to the iudgement of his regalitie, ſauing to him the homaige of that perſon that ſhall be king; and this reſtitution to be made within two moneths after the daie in the which the right ſhall be diſcuſſed and eſtabliſhed, the iſſues of the ſame land in the meane time ſhall be receiued, laid vp, and put in ſafe keeping, in the hands of the chamberlaine of Scotland which now is, and of him, whome the king of England ſhall to him assigne, and this vnder their ſeales, reſeruing and allowing the reaſonable charges for the ſuſtentation of the land, the caſtels and officers of the kingdome. In witneſſe of all the which premisses, we haue vnto theſe letters ſet our ſeales. Given at Norham the wedneſday next after the feaſt of the Aſcenſion of our Lord, in the yeare of Grace, 1291.

Theſe two letters the king of England ſent vnder his priue ſeale vnto diuerſe monaſteries within his realme in the 10th pere of his reigne, that in perpetuall memorie of the thing thus paſſed, it might be regiſtered in their chronicles. Thus by the common aſſent of the cheſell of the lords in Scotland, king Edward reſtored the land into his cuſtodie, till by due and lawfull triall had, it might apere who was rightfull heire to the crowne there. The homaige or ſealthe of the nobles of Scotland was expreſſed in words as followeth.

The

The forme and tenor of the homage doone by the Scots.

I cause all we are come unto the allegiance of the noble prince Edward king of England, we promise for us and our heires, upon all the danger that we may incurre, that we shall be faithfull, & loiallie hold of him against all manner of mortall men, and that we shall not vnderstand of any damage that may come to the king, nor to his heires, but we shall staie and impeach the same to our powers. And to this we bind our selues & our heires, and are swozne upon the euangelists to performe the same. Besides this, we haue done fealtie unto our soueraigne lord the said king in these words ech one by himselfe; I shall be true and faithfull, and faith and loialtie I shall beare to the king of England Edward and his heires, of life, member, and worldlie honour against all mortall creatures.

Edward.

The king hauing receiued as well the possessions of the realme, castles, manours, as other places belonging to the crowne of Scotland, he committed the gouernement and custodie of the realme vnto the bishops of S. Andrewis and Glasco, to the lords John Comin, and James Steward, who had put him in possession, so that vnder him they held the same, in manner as they had done before. But in diuerse castles he placed such capteines as he thought most meete to keepe them to his vse, till he had ended the controuersie, & placed him in the kingdome, to whom of right it belonged. He also willed the lords of Scotland to elect a sufficient personage to be chancelour of the realme, which they did, naming Alane bishop of Cathness, whom the king admitted, joining with him one of his chapleins named Walter Armundesham, so that on the 12 of June, vpon the greene ouer against the the castell of Roxham, nere to the riuer of Tweed, in the parish of Wpsetelington, before John Balliol, Robert Bruce, the bishops of S. Andrewis and Glasco, the lords Comin and Steward, wardens of Scotland; the bishop of Cathness receiued his seale, appointed him by the king of England as supreme lord of Scotland, and there both the said bishop & Walter Armundesham were swozne trulie to gouerne themselves in the office.

The morrow after were the wardens swozne and with them as associated Brian Fitz Alane, and there all the earles and lords of Scotland that were present swore fealtie vnto king Edward, as to their supreme soueraigne lord, and withall there was peace proclaimed, and publike edicts set forth in the name of the same king, intituled supreme lord of the realme of Scotland. The residue of the Scottish nobilitie, earles, barons, knights, and others, with the bishops and abbats, vpon his coming into Scotland, swore fealtie either to himselfe in person, or to such as he appointed his deputies to receiue the same, in sundrie towns and places, according to order giuen in that behalfe. Such as refused to do their fealties, were attached by their bodies till they should do their fealties as they were bound. Those that came till, but excused themselves vpon some reasonable cause, were heard, and had day giuen vntill the next parlement, but such as neither came, nor made any reasonable excuse, were appointed to be distrained to come.

The bishop of S. Andrewis, and John lord Comin of Badenoch, with Brian Fitz Alane, were assigned to receiue such fealties at S. Johns towne. The bishop of Glasco, James lord steward of Scotland, and Nicholas Segraue were appointed to receiue them at Newcastle of Ire. The earle of Southerland, and the shiriffe of that countie, with his bailiffs, and the chetelaine of Inuerness were ordeined to receiue those fealties in that countie; the chetelaine first to receiue it of the said earle, and then he with his said associats to receiue the same of others. The lord William de Saintclare, and William de Bomille, were appointed to receiue fealtie of the bishop of Whiterne, and then the said bishop with them to receiue the fealties of all the inhabitants of Gallowaie. Amongst other that did their homage to the king himselfe, was Marie quene of Spain, and countesse of Stratherne, vpon the 24 daie of Julie, the king being thus in S. Johns towne, other wise called Perth. To conclude, he was put in full possession of the realme of Scotland, & receiued there homages and fealties (as before ye haue heard) as the direct and supreme lord of that land.

This done, and euerie thing ordered as seemed most expedient, king Edward returned into the south parts of his realme, to be at his mothers buriall, that in this meane time was departed this life. His hart was buried in the church of the Graffriers at London, & his bodie at Ambzeshurte in the house of the nunnies. After the funerals were ended, king Edward returned into the north parts againe; he staid a while at Roxke, and during his abode there, was by order of law condemned & executed. This yeare after Easter, as the flēt late before S. Mathewes in Brittain, there rose certeine discord betwixt the Norman mariners, and them of Balon, and so farre the quarell increased, that they fell to frite it by force, the Englishmen assisting them of Balon, and the French kings subjects taking part with the Normans, and now they fraught not their ships so much with merchandize as with armour & weapon. At length the matter burst out from sparkes into open flame, the sequels wherof hereafter shall appeare, as we find it reported by writers.

But now touching the Scottish affaires. At length the king comming into Scotland, gaue summons to all those that claimed the crowne, to appeare before him at the feast of the natiuitie of S. John Baptist next ensuing, that they might declare more at large by what right they claimed the kingdome. Vpon, when the daie of their appearance was come, and that king Edward was ready to heare the matter, he chose out the number of 40 persons, the one halfe Englishmen, and the other Scottishmen, which should discourse with aduised deliberation and great diligence the allegations of the competitors, deferring the final sentence vnto the feast of S. Michael next ensuing, the which feast being come, after due examination, full trial, and assured knowledge had of the right, the kingdome by all their assents was adjudged vnto John Balliol, who descended of the eldest daughter of David king of Scotland. Robert Bruce, betwixt whom and the same Balliol at length (the other being excluded) the question and trial anlie rested, was descended of the second daughter of king David, though other wise by one degree he was nearer to him in blood. Thus writeth Nicholas Trivet.

But others affirme, that after long disputation in the matter, by order of king Edward, there were appointed 80 ancient and graue personages, amongst the which were 30 Englishmen, vnto whom (being swozne and admonished to haue God before their eyes) authoritie was giuen to name him that should be king. These 80 persons, after they had well considered vnto whome the right appertained, declared with one voice, that John Balliol was rightful king.

king Edward allowed their sentence, and by his authority confirmed unto the same John, the possession of the kingdome of Scotland, with condition that if he did not gouerne that realme with iustice, then upon complaint, the king of England might put vnto his hand of reformation, as he was bound to do by his right of superiourtie, that in him was inuested. Whereupon king Edward awarded forth his writ of delinerie of seizine at the suit of the said J. Balioll, to William and Robert, bishops of S. Andrewes and Glasco, to John lord Comin, James lord Steward of Scotland, and to the lord Brian Fitz Alane, wardens of Scotland, commanding them to deliuer vnto the said John Balioll the seizine and possession of that realme, sauing the releases and debts due to him of the issues and profits of the same realme, vnto the day of the date of the writ, which was the nineteenth day of Nouember, in the twentieth yere of his reigne. Also there was another writ made, and directed to such as had the keeping of the castels in their hands, 20 in forme as followeth.

Edwardus Dei gratia rex Anglia, dominus Hibernie, dux Aquitania, & superior dominus regni Scotia, dilecto & fideli suo Petro Burdet, constabulario castri de Berwike salutem. Cum Iohannes de Baliolo nuper in parlamento nostro apud Berwicum super Tuedam, venisset coram nobis, & petuisset predictum regnum Scotia sibi per nos adiudicari, & seisinam ipsius regni ut propinquiori heredi Margareta filie regis Norwegie dominie Scotia iure successionis liberari, ac nos auditis & intellectis petitionibus, & rationibus diligentur examinatis, inuenerimus prefatum Iohannem de Baliolo esse propinquiorem heredem predictae Margaretae, quo ad predictum regnum Scotia obtinendum: propter quod idem regnum Scotia, & seisinam eiusdem, saluo iure nostro, & heredum nostrorum, cum voluerimus inde loqui, predicto Iohanni reddidimus: tibi mandamus quod seisinam predicti castri de Berwico cum omnibus pertinentiis suis, una cum alijs omnibus rebus tibi per chirographum traditis, secundum quod in predicti castri tibi commissa custodia res huiusmodi recepisti, sine dilacione prefato Iohanni de Baliolo, vel attornatis suis has litteras deferentibus, delibere facias. Teste meipso apud Berwicum super Tuedam, 19 die Nouembris, Anno regni nostri 20.

In English thus.

Edward by the grace of God, king of England, lord of Ireland, duke of Aquitaine, and superiour lord of the realme of Scotland, to his welbeloued and faithfull seruant Peter Burdet constable of the castell of Berwike, sendeth greeting. Where Iohn de Balioll late in parlement holden at Berwike vpon Tweed, came before vs, and demanded the said realme of Scotland to be adjudged to him by vs, and seizine of the same realme to be to him deliuered as next heire to Margaret daughter to the king of Norwaie, ladie of Scotland by right of succession. We hauing heard and vnderstood the same petitions; and reasons being diligentlie weighed and examined, we had the said Iohn Balioll to be next heire vnto the said Margaret, as to obtaine the said kingdome of Scotland, whervpon we haue deliuered to him the said kingdome of Scotland, and the seizine therof, sauing the right of vs & our heires, when it shall please vs to speake therof. We therefore command you, that you deliuer vp vnto the said Iohn Balioll, or to his attornies, that shall bring with them these our present letters, the seizine of the said castell of Berwike, with all the appurtenances, together with all other things to you by indenture deliuered accordinglie as you did receiue the same, with the custodie of the said castle to you committed: and this without delaie. Witnesse our selfe at Berwike vpon Tweed the nineteenth day of Nouember, in the twentieth yere of our reigne.

In the same forme of words were writs awarded forth, to all and euerie other the keepers of castels and manors belonging to the crowne of Scotland, and being at that time in R. Edwards hands, the names of places and the persons that had them in custodie onelie changed. On the same day also in the castell of Berwike was the scale broken, which had bene appointed to the gouernors, during the time that the realme was vacant of a king. It was broken into 30 foure parts, and put into a purse to be referred in the treasure of the king of England, in further and more full token of his superiourtie and direct supreme dominion ouer the realme of Scotland.

These things were done in presence of the said John Balioll then king of Scotland, John archbishop of Dublin, John bishop of Winchester, Anthonie bishop of Duresme, William bishop of Elic, John bishop of Carleil, William bishop of S. Andrewes, Robert bishop of Glasco, Marke bishop of Man, and Henrie bishop of Aberdene, with diuerse other bishops, besides abbats and priors of both the realmes; Henrie earle of Lincolne, Humfrie earle of Hereford, Roger earle of Norfolk, John earle of Buchquane, Douenald earle of Mar, Gilbert earle of Angus, Patrike earle of March, and Malissus earle of Stratherne; with the foure and fientie auditors of England, and the foure score auditors of Scotland: chapleins also, Henrie de Actmarke beane of Porke, John Lacie chancellour of Chichester, William de Grenefeld canon of Porke, and John Crecutle notarie, and manie other. John Balioll being thus created k. of Scotland, on the twentieth day of Nouember, in the castell of Forham, did fealtie to king Edward for the kingdome of Scotland, in maner as followeth.

The forme of the fealtie of Iohn Balioll king of Scots to the king of England in protestation.

His heare you my lord Edward king of England, souereigne lord of the realme of Scotland, that I John de Balioll king of Scotland, which I hold and claime to hold of you, that I shall be faithfull and loiall, and owe faith and loialtie to you, I shall beare of life and member, and of earthlie honour, against all people, and lawfullie I shall acknowledge and do the seruices which I owe to do to you, for the realme of Scotland aforesaid. So God me helpe and his holie euangelists.

Which also he made letters patents, witnessing that he had thus done fealtie unto king Edward, which letters he sealed and deliuered in presence of William bishop of saint Andrews, Robert bishop of Glasco, John earle of Bouchquane, William earle of Ross, Patrike earle of March, Walter earle of Wenteth, James lord steward of Scotland, Alexander de Ergay, Alexander de Balioll lord of Caures, Patrike de Graham, and William de Saintclere. This done, king Edward appointed Anthontie bishop of Duresme, and the lord John saint John to passe with Balioll into Scotland, and there to put him into the copozall possession of the same realme of Scotland, which they did, and so he was crowned at Scone vpon saint Andrews day, being placed in the marble chaire within the abbeye church there. The solemnitie of which coronation being ended, he returned into England, and comming to Newcastle vpon Tyne, where R. Edward in that yeare kept his Christmasse, he there did homage vpon saint Stephens daie vnto the said king Edward, in forme of words as followeth.

M lord, lord Edward king of England, superior lord of Scotland, I John de Balioll king of Scotland, do acknowledge and recognize me to be your liegeman of the whole realme of Scotland, with all the appurtenances, and whatsoever belongeth thereto, the which kingdome I hold and ought of right and claime to hold by inheritance of you and your heires kings of England, and I shall beare faith and loialtie to you and to your heires kings of England, of life, of member, and earthlie honour, against all men, which may liue and die.

This homage in forme aforesaid bsd king Edward receiue, his owne and others right saued. Then did the king of England without delaie ressoe vnto the said John Balioll the kingdome of Scotland, with all the appurtenances. This yeare, as one Richard Bagley an officer of the shiriffes of London led a prisoner towards the galle, thre persons rescued the said prisoner, and toke him from the officer, the which were pursued and taken, and by iudgement of law then vied, were brought into Westchape, and there had their hands striken off by the wylles. On the 14 daie of Maie fell a wonderfull snow, and therewith blew such an exceeding wind, that great harme was done thereby in sundrie places of England. In the same yeare died frer John Beckham archbishop of Canturburie, and then was Robert of Winchelsie elected archbishop the 48 in number that had ruled that se. About the middle of September following, the earle of Bar a Frenchman, married the ladie Elianor, the kings daughter in the towne of Wyroto. This yeare wheat was sold at London for two shillings a bushell.

This yeare also the war was begun betwene the kings of England and France. For whereas king Edward had furnished forth six ships of warre, and sent them vnto Burdeaur for defense of the coasts thereabouts, two of them, as they sailed alongst the coast of Normandie, and fearing no hurt by enemies, were taken by the Norman fleet, and diuerse of the mariners hanged. The lord Robert Tiptoft that was admerall of the English fleet aduertised thereof, got together a great number of ships, and directed his course with them streight towards Normandie, and finding no ships of the Normans abroad in the seas, vpon a desire to be reuenged, entered the mouth of the riuer of Saine, and set vpon the Norman ships that laie there at anchor, slue manie of the mariners, & toke six ships auaite with him, and so returning to the sea againe, cast anchor not far off from the land, to prouoke the Frenchmen to come forth with their fleet to giue battell. And as he laie at anchor, it chanced that certeine Norman ships fraught with wine came that waies, as they returned out of Gascoigne. The lord Tiptoft setting on them, toke them with little adu, and sleating nere hand the thurd part of all the mariners, sent the ships into England.

The Frenchmen to reuenge this act, prepared a nauie, and furnishing the same with souldiers went forth to the sea, to incounter the Englishmen: but yer they met, messengers were sent to and fro, the Englishmen accusing the Frenchmen of truce-breaking, and the Frenchmen againe requiring restitution of their goods taken from them by violence. And now so much as this businesse had bene moued rashlie betwixt the Englishmen and the Normans, without any commission of their princes, their minds therefore were not so kindled in displeasure, but that there had ben good hope of agreement betwixt them, if Charles earle of Walois the French kings brother (being a man of a hot nature & desirous of reuenge) had not procured his brother to seeke reuengement by force of armes. Wherevpon the French fleet made toward the Englishmen, who minding not to detract the battell, sharplie incountred their enemies in a certeine place betwixt England and Normandie, where they had laid a great emptie ship at anchor, to giue token where they meant to ioine. There were with the Englishmen both Irishmen and Hollanders, and with the Normans there were Frenchmen and Flemings, and certeine vessels of Genouaies.

The fight at the first was doubtfull, and great slaughter made, as in the meeting of two such mighty nauies must needs insue. Yet in the end the victorie fell to the Englishmen, and the French ships put to the chase and scattered abroad. The number of ships lost is not recorded by such writers as make report of this conflict, but they write that the losse was great. King Philip being aduertised of this discomfiture of his fleet was sore displeased, and as though he would proceed against king Edward by order of law, he summoned him as his liegeman to appeare at Paris, to answer what might be objected against him; but withall because he knew that king Edward would not come to make his appearance, he prepared an armie.

In the meane time king Edward sent his brother Edmund earle of Lancaster to be his attornie, and to make answer for him before all such iudges as might haue hearing of the matter: but the iudges meaning nothing lesse than to trie out the truth of the cause, admitted no reasons that the earle could alledge in his brothers behalfe, and so pronounced king Edward a rebell, and decreed by arrest, that he had forfeited all his right vnto the duchie of Guien. These things thus done, he sent priue messengers vnto Burdeaur, to procure the citizens to revolt from the Englishmen, and appointed constable of France the lord Arnold de Beale to follow with an armie, who comming thither easilie brought them of Burdeaur vnder the French dominion, being already inclined to revolt through praifse of those that were lately before sent vnto them from the French king for that purpose. After this, the said constable brought the people nere adjoining vnder subiection, partly moued by the example of the chase and head citie of all the countrie, and partly induced thereto by bybes and large gifts. The Englishmen that were in the countrie, after they perceiued that the people did thus reuolt to the French king, withdrew incontinentlie vnto the towne situate nere to the sea side, but speciallie they fled to a towne called the Rioll, which they fortified with all speed. Thus saith Polydor.

Nicholas Triuet, writing hereof, declareth the beginning of this warre to be on this manner. The English merchants being diuerslie vexed vpon the seas, made complaint to the king for losse of their merchandise. The king sent Henrie Lacie earle of Lincolne vnto the French king, instantlie requiring, that by his assent there might some waie be provided with speed by them and their counsell, for some competent remedie touching such harmes and losses by sea as his people had susteind. In the meane time whilst the earle taried for answer, a nauie of the parts of Fozmanbie containing two hundred ships and aboue, being assembled together, that they might the more boldlie assaile their enemies, and the more valiantlie resist such as should encounter them, failed into Gascoigne, determining to destitute all those of their aduersaries that should come in their waie. But as these Fozmane ships returned backe with wines, glorieng as it were that they had got the rule of the sea onelie to themselves, they were assailed by thre score English ships, which toke them, & brought them into England the Friday before Whitlunday: all the men were either drowned or slaine, those onelie escaped which made shift to escape by boates. The newes hereof being brought into France, did not so much moue the king and the counsell to wonder at the matter, as to take thereof great indignation.

Ambassadors were appointed to go into England which on the behalfe of the French king, might demand of king Edward restitution of those ships and goods thus taken by his subiects, and conueied into his realme, without all delaie, if he minded to haue any fauour in the French court touching his affairs that belonged to his countrie of Gascoigne. The king of England hearing this message, toke therein deliberation to answer, and then sent the bishop of London, accompanied with other wise and discret persons into France, to declare for answer vnto the French king and his counsell as followeth; that is, Whereas the king of England hath his regall court without subiection to any man, if there were there for any persons that found themselves hurt or indamaged by his people, they might come to his court, and vpon declaration of their receiued iniuries, they should haue speedie iustice, and to the end they might thus doe without all danger, whosoever minded to complaine, he would giue vnto them a safe conduct to come and go in safetie thorough his land: but if this waie pleased not the French king, then he was content there should be arbitrators chosen on both sides, who weighing the losses on both parts, might provide how to satisfie the complaints: and the king of England would for his part enter in to bonds by obligation to stand to and abide their order and iudgement herein, so that the French king would likelie be bound for his part, and if any such doubt fortuned to arise, which could not be decided by the said arbitrators, let the same be referred vnto the kings themselves to discusse and determine, and the king of England vpon a sufficient safe conduct had, would come ouer to the French king, if he would come downe vnto any haven towne nere to the sea coast, that by mutuall assent an end might be had in the businesse: but if neither this waie should please the French king nor the other, then let the matter be committed to the order of the pope, to whom it appertained to nourish concord among christian princes, or because the sea was as then boist, let the whole colledge of cardinals or part of them take order therein, as should be thought necessarie, that strife and discord being taken awaie and removed, peace might againe flourish betwixt them and their people, as before time it had done, and bring with it the blessings therevpon depending; namelie, althings that may make an happie & fortunat state, according to the nature of peace, whereof it is said,

Pax est cunctorum mater veneranda bonorum, Fit sub pace forum, fit felix cultus agrorum, Pax pietas mentis, pax est pincerna salutis.

The French counsell weied nothing at all these offers, and would not so much as once bouchsafe to giue an answer to the English ambassadors earnestlie requiring the same. Finallie, the French king sent vnto the citie of Anion, which is knowne to belong vnto the dutchie of Guen, where he there caused the king of England to be cited to make his appearance at Paris, at a certeine daie, to answer to the iniuries and rebellions by him done in the countrie of Gascoigne, at the which daie when he appeared not, the French king sitting in the seat of iudgement in his owne proper person, gaue sentence there against the king of England, for making default, and withall commanded the high constable of France to seize into his hands all the dutchie of Guen, and either to take or to erpell all the king of Englands officers, souldiers, and deputies, which were by him placed within the said dutchie. The king a little before had sent thither a valiant knight, named the lord John saint John, which had furnished all the cities, towne, castels, and places, with men, munition, and vittels, for defense of the same.

In the meane time the king of England, desirous to be at quiet with the Frenchmen, appointed his brother Edmund earle of Lancaster, as then sojourning in France, to go vnto the French kings counsell to procure some agreement, which both might be allowed of the French king, and not be dishonorable vnto him. But when the earle could not preuaile in his sute, he toke his iourne towards England, utterlie despairing to procure any peace. But ver he came to the sea side, he was sent for backe againe by the two quenes of France, Ione wife to king Philip, and Marie his mother in law, which promised to frame some accord betwene the two kings, and so therevpon after diuerse communications by them had in the matter with the said earle of Lancaster, at length it was accorded, that for the sauing of the French kings honour, which seemed to be touched by things done by the king of Englands ministers in Gascoigne, six castels should remaine at the said kings pleasure, as Sandes, Talemond, Turnim, Pomeroll, Penne, and mount Flaunton. Also there should be set a seruant or sergeant in the French kings name, in euerie citie and castell within all the whole dutchie of Guen, except Burdeaux, Balon, and the Rioll. And further, hostages should be deliuered at the French kings pleasure, of all ministers to be placed by the king of England in Gascoigne and other places through all the country. These things done, the French king should reuoke the summons published and pronounced in the court of Paris against the king of England. Also he should restore all the castels (his seruants being removed which he had placed in the same) together with the pledges incontinentlie, at the request of the same quenes, or of either of them. The king of England hauing a safe conduct should come to Amiens, that there meeting with the French king, peace and amitie might be confirmed betwixt them. Then were there writings made and ingrossed touching the foresaid articles of agreement, one part deliuered to the earle, sealed with the scales of the quenes, and other remained with the foresaid quenes sealed with the scale of the earle.

The king of England certified hereof, sent his letters patents, directed unto all his officers and ministers in Gascoigne, commanding them to obey in all things the French kings pleasure. These letters patents were first sent unto the earle of Lancaster, that he might cause them to be conveyed into Gascoigne when he should see time. The earle having received those letters, doubting whether the French king would observe the agreement which the quenes had made and concluded, or not; required of them that he might hear the French king speake the word, that he would stand unto that which they had concluded. Whereupon in the presence of the said earle and his wife Blanch quene of Navar, mother to the French quene, also of the duke of Burgoigne, Hugh were sonne to the earle of Hereford, and of a chaplain called sir John Lacie, the French king promised by the faith of a prince, that he would fulfill the promises of the said quenes, and the covenants by them accorded.

Sir Geoffrey
Langley.

Whereupon a knight of the earles of Lancaster, called sir Geoffrey de Langley, was speedily sent into Gascoigne with letters from the French king, directed to the constable, to call him backe againe from his appointed enterpryse. And the foresaid chaplain sir John Lacie was sent also thither with the letters patents of the king of England, directed unto his officers there, in forme as is above mentioned, whereupon the lord John saint John the king of Englands lieutenant in Gascoigne, understanding the conclusions of the agreement, sold all such provisions as he had made and brought into the cities, townes, and fortresses for the defense of the same, and departing out of Gascoigne, came towards Paris to returne that waie into England.

The French
kings mind
changed.

But behold what followed; suddenly by the envie of peace was the French kings mind quite changed. And where the king of England was come unto Canturburie, and kept his Court there, that immediately upon the receipt of the safe conduct he might transport over the seas, and so come to Amiens, according to the appointment made by the agreement; now not onelie the safe conduct was denied, but also the first letters renocatorie sent unto the constable to call him backe, by other letters sent after were also made void, and he by the latter letters appointed to keepe upon his journey, so that the constable entering into Gascoigne with a power, found no resistance, the captains and officers submitting themselves with the townes and fortresses at his pleasure according to the tenor of the letters patents latelie to them delivered. All the officers and captains of the fortresses were brought to Paris as captives and pledges.

dealing.

Within a few daies after, the earle of Lancaster required the quenes, that they would call upon the king to grant his safe conduct for the king of England, to revoke the citation or summons, to restore the lands taken from him; and to deliver the pledges: but the French king by the mouths of certaine knights sent unto the earle, renounced all such covenants as before had bene concluded. The earle of Lancaster then perceiving that both he and his brother king Edward were mocked thus at the French kings hands, returned into England, and informed the king & his counsell from point to point of all the matter. Whereupon a parlement being called at Westminster, at the which the king of Scotland was present, it was decreed by the states, that those lands which were crassilie taken so from the king should be recovered againe by the sword. And the king herewith sent unto the French king a frier preacher named Hugh of Winchester, and a frier minor called William de Gainsborough, both being wise and discret men, and doctors of divinitie, to declare unto him, that sith he would not observe such agreements as had bene concluded betwixt their ancestors; and further had broken such covenants as were now of late agreed upon betwixt them, by the travail of his brother Edmund earle of Lancaster: there was no cause whie he ought to account him being king of England, and duke of Guien, as his liegeman, neither did he intend or meane further to be bound unto him by reason of his homage.

About the same time did the king of England send the archbishop of Dublin, and the bishop of Duresme into Germanie, about the concluding of a league with Adolph king of Romans, to whom was given a great summe of monie (as was said) upon covenants, that he should aid the king of England against the French king, with all his maine force, and that neither of them should conclude peace with the said French king without consent of the other. About the Ascension tide, king Edward stated the woggles of this land, as well belonging to spirituall men as temporall men, till the merchants had fitted with him for the same, so that there was a subsidy paid for all sarpliers of wolle that went out of the reline, and in semblable wise for felles and hides. He also sent an armie by sea into Gascoigne, under the conduct of his nephew John of Britaine that was earle of Richmond, appointing to him as counsellours, the lord John saint John, and the lord Robert Cypriot; men of great wisdom, and verie expert in warlike enterprises.

He also caused three severall fleets to be prepared, and appointed to them three sundrie admirals, for the better keeping of the seas. To them of Harmonth and other of those parts, he assigned the lord John Botetourt: to them of the cinque ports, William de Leisborne; and to them of the west countrie, and to the Irishmen, he appointed a valiant knight of Ireland as their cheftaine. This yeare in England was a great dearth and scarcitie of coine, so that a quarter of wheat in many places was sold for thirtie shillings: by reason whereof poore people died in many places for lacke of sustenance. About Michaelmas, the English fleet took the sea at Portsmouth, and after some contrarie winds, yet at last they arrived within the river of Garon, and so passing by the same river, won divers townes, as Burge, Blaines, Rions, and others.

The kings coffers by reason of furnishing forth of this armie, and other continuall charges which he had sustained, were now in maner emptie: for remedie whereof, William March one of the kings treasurers, purposed with other mens losses to supplie that want. He knew that in abbeyes and churches was much monie kept in store, the which if he commanded to be taken from thence, he thought that he should not commit any offense, but rather do a good deed, that the monie might come abroad to the use of the people, whereby the soldiers might be satisfied for their wages. Such captains therefore, as he appointed to worke the feat, placing their soldiers in everie quarter through the realme, made search at one time, in Julie, at three of the clocke in the afternoon, for all such monie as was hid and laid up in all hallowed places, and taking the same a waie, brought it unto the king, who dissembling the matter, as he that stood in need, excused the act done by his treasurer so well as he could, to avoid the envie of the people; and not content herewith, he called together shortly after, to wit, on saint Matthews day the apostle, at London, all the archbishops, bishops, deanes, & archdeacons, not in their proper persons, but by two procurators of euerie diocesse. Here when they were once assembled, the king declared unto them the warres which he was dyuen to mainteine against the Frenchmen, & the charges which he was at for the same. He also shewed them, that the earles, barons & knights of the realme, did not onlie aid him with their goods, but put their persons forward to serue him in defense of the land, whereof they were members, even to the shedding of their blood, and oftentimes with losse of their lines. Therefore (saith he) you which may not put your persons in perill by seruice in the warres, it is good reason you should aid us with your goods.

The cleargie hauing no speciall head, by reason that the see of Canturburie was void, wist not well how to gouerne themselves. At length Willielm bishop of Lincolne, required in all their names to haue three daies respite to make answer to the matter, the which time expired, they offered to the king two dismes to be paid within one yeare. The which when the king heard, he toke great dislike therewith, and threatened by some of his men of war to put the cleargie out of his protection, except they would grant to him the halfe of their goods. The cleargie put in feare herewith, and some of them also desirous to win the kings fauour, granted his request, and so the king at that time got the halfe part of euerie spiritual man's living and benefice for one yeares trespit, to be paid in portions within three yeares next ensuing, beginning at twentie marks benefice, & so upward. And the former to induce them hereunto, he promised the bishops to grant some thing that might be beneficiall to the cleargie, if they would demand it.

The bishops taking counsell together, required of him that the statute of Mortmain might be repealed, which they saw to be most prejudiciall to their order. But the king answered them, that without the whole consent of a parlement he could not breake that ordinance, which by authoritie of parlement had bene once established, and therefore he wished that they would not require that thing which laie not in him to grant, and so by that means he shifted them off. The spiritualtie was not onelie charged with this subsidy, but they of the temporaltie were also burthened. For the citizens and burgeses of good townes gaue to the king the first part of their goods, and the residue of the people gaue the tenth part.

Moreover, about the same time, the Wellshmen effronies rebelled against the king, and in diuerse parts made diuerse rulers amongst them. Those of Powyswales which inhabited about Snowdon hills, hauing to their capteine one Spawoc, of the line of their former prince Leolin, burned the towne and castell of Carnarvan, slaing a great multitude of Englishmen, which doubting no such matter, were come thither to the faire. Those of the west part hauing chosen to their ruler one Malgon on the parts of Denbroke and Carmardin shires, did much mischief. And one Sporgan hauing them of Southwales at his commandement, expelled and dyone the earle of Gloucester out of his countrie of Glamorgan, which earle had before time disherited the ancestors of the same Sporgan. The king therefore to repress the Wellshmens attempts, called backe his brother Edmund earle of Lancaster, and the earle of Lincoln, being ready to haue sailed ouer into Gascoigne, the which earles as they approached nere unto the castell of Denbigh upon saint Martins day, the Wellshmen with great force incountred them, and giuing them battell, dyone them backe and discomfited their people. Polydor iudgeth that this ouerthrow happened to the Englishmen, the rather for that the armie was hired with such monie as had bene wrongfullie taken out of the abbies and other holie places, howbeit it is but his opinion onelie.

The king kept his Christmase at Aberconwey in Wales, and hearing that the new archbishop of Canturburie, doctor Robert Winchelsey, being returned from Rome (where, of pope Celestine he had receiued his pall) was comming towards him, he sent one of his chapelaines named John Berwik with a power of souldiers to conduct him safely unto his presence. And after the archbishop had done his fealties to the king, accordingly as of dutie and custome he was bound, he was licenced to returne with great honour shewed unto him at the kings hands. Upon the day of the circumcission of our Lord, was the citie of Balgon rendred unto the lord John saint John, the which the day before had bene taken by the mariners by force of assault. Many of the citizens which were knowne to be cheefe enemies unto the king of England, were apprehended and sent into England. The castell was then besieged, and after eight daies taken. The lord of Aspermont with diuerse others that held it, were committed to prison. There were also taken two gallies, which the French king had caused to be made, and appointed to be remaining there vpon defense of that citie. Shortly after the towne of saint John de Sozdes was deliuered unto the Englishmen, who toan manie other townes and fortresses, some by surrender of their owne accord, and some by force and violence. The English armie greatlie increased within a while, after the decett of the Frenchmen once appeared, for the Gascoignes returned unto the English obedience, in such wise that foure thousand footmen and two hundred horsemen came to aid the English capteins.

In the meane time, the king of England passing ouer the river of Conwey, with part of his armie to go further into Wales towards Snowdon, lost manie carts and other cariages which were taken by the Wellshmen, being laden with the provisions of vittels, so that he with his people indured great penurie, and was constrained to drinke water mist with honte, and eat such course bread and salt fleshy as he could get, till the other part of the armie came unto him. There was a small quantitie of wine amongst them, which they would haue reserued onelie for the king, & therefore refused to tast thereof. But least they should repine at his extraordinary and seuerall fare, and so by conceits of discontentment for not hauing the like, he considered in a sympathie, that, saing, that in time of necessitie all things ought to be common, and all men to be contented with like diet. For as touching him (being the cause and procurer of their want) he would not be preferred before any of them in his meats and drinks. The Wellshmen compassed him about in hope to distresse him, for that the water was so risen, that the residue of his armie could not get to him. But shortly after, when the water fell, they came ouer to his aid, and there with the aduersaries fled.

The earle of Warwike, hearing that a great number of Wellshmen was assembled together, and lodged in a ballie betwixt two woods, he chose out a number of horsemen, with certeine crossbowes and archers, and comming vpon the Wellshmen in the night, compassed them round about, the which pitching the ends of their speares in the ground, and turning the points against their enemies, stood at defense so to keepe off the horsemen. But the earle hauing placed his battell so, that ever betwixt two horsemen there stood a crossbow, a great part of the Wellshmen which stood at defense in manner aforesaid with their speares, were ouerthrowne and broken with the shot of the quarels, and then the earle charged the residue with a troope of horsemen, and bare them

In the meane while, king Edward to restraine the rebellious attempts of those Welshmen, caused the woods of Wales to be cut downe, wherein before time the Welshmen were accustomed to hide themselves in time of danger. He also repaired the castles and holds in that countrie, and builded some new, as the citie and castell of Bewmarke with other, so that the Welshmen constrained through hunger and famine, were enforced within a while to come to the kings peace. Also at length about the feast of saint Laurence, the Welshman Madoc, that took him selfe for prince of Wales was taken prisoner, and being brought to London was committed to perpetual prison. By some writers it should appeare, that Madoc was not taken, but rather after manie adventures & sundrie conflicts, when the Welshmen were brought to an issue of great extremitie; the said Madoc came in and submitted himselfe to the kings peace, and was receiued, upon condition that he should pursue Morgan till he had taken him and brought him to the kings prison, which was done, and so all things in those parts were set in rest and peace, and manie hostages of the chiefe amongst the Welsh nobilitie were deliuered to the king, who sent them to diuerse castles in England where they were safely kept almost to the end of the warres that followed with Scotland.

About the same time Charles de Walois brother to the French king, being sent with an armie into Gascoine, and coming vpon the sudden, found the Englishmen wandering abroad in the countrie out of order, by reason whereof taking them at that advantage, he caused them to leaue their booties behind them, & sue part of them, and chased the residue, the which fled to their ships, or to such haueen townes as were in their possession. The capitaine of the Englishmen, as John de Britaine earle of Richmond, and the lord John saint John, after they had got together their souldiers which had bene thus chased, sent two bands vnto Pontefey to defend that towne against the enemies: also other two bands vnto saint Seuer; and they themselves went to Kion to fortifie that place. Charles de Walois aduertised hereof, thought he would not giue them long respite to make themselves strong by gathering any new power, and therefore appointed the conestable sir Rafe de Beale, (who had wone the citie of Burdeaur from the Englishmen latelie before) to go vnto Pontefey and besiege that towne, whilst he went vnto Kion, which he besieged and fiercely assaulted. But the Englishmen and Gascoins did not onelie defend the towne stoutlie, but also made an issue forth vpon their enemies, though (as it happened) the smaller number was not able to susteine the force of the greater multitude, and so were the Englishmen beaten backe in to the towne againe.

Whilst they tried their manhood thus at Kion, the conestable wone Pontefey or Pontfac vpon Doxdone, and came to ioin with the earles de Walois at Kion, and so enforced both their powers to win that towne. The Englishmen and Gascoins, though they were put in some feare, yet they shewed their approved ballancie in defending the towne, till at length when they saw they could defend it no longer, and were in no hope of succour from any part, they fled out about midnight, and made toward their ships: but diuerse of them were taken by the waie, for the Frenchmen hauing knowledge of their intent, forsaie the passages, and taking some of them that first sought to escape thus by flight, & sue them, but there was not many of those. For all the residue, when they perceived that the Frenchmen had laid betwixt them and their ships, making vertue of necessity, stood still in defense of the towne, till the Frenchmen entred it by force of assault the Friday in Easter weeke.

Some write, that the same night, in which they so ment to flee to their ships, there chanced a great tumult and mutenie betwixt the footmen and horsemen, so that they fought together, or else might the whole number of them haue escaped. The horsemen that got forth left their horses behind them readie bysbeled and saddled, which the Frenchmen vpon entering the towne in the morning took, after they had slaine the most part of the footmen. The Frenchmen hauing got a bloudie victorie, saued onelie the capitaine and gentlemen, and sue the other, aswell Englishmen as Gascoins. There was taken of knights, sir Rafe Tannie, sir Amis de saint Amand, with his brother sir Rafe de Cozges marshall of the armie, sir Roger Lefbozme, sir John Breting, sir James Breting, sir Hen. Boding, sir John Pandeuille, sir John Fulbozme, sir Robert Godfield, sir Thomas Turbert, uile, & sir Walter, with thre & thirtie esquires, which were sent all vnto Paris. Sir Adam Breting was killed, a right valiant knight, by reason of one sir Walter Gifford a knight also, which had dwelled in France manie yeares before as an outlaw.

On the same day was the towne of saint Seuer deliuered vnto the Englishmen, the which Hugh (as Abington saith) Robert Wier, brother to the earle of Orenford took vpon him to keepe as capitaine there with two hundred men of armes. Charles de Walois aduertised thereof, departed from Kion with all speed, to besiege the foresaid towne of saint Seuer, per the Englishmen should haue time to fortifie it. But the foresaid Hugh Wier kept him out the space of thirtene or (as Abington saith) nine weekes, to the great losse of the Frenchmen, no small part of their people dieng in the meane time, both of pestilence and famine. At length, when vittels began to faile within, a truce was taken for fiftene daies, within the which it might be lawfull for them within the towne to send vnto Balon for succour, which if it came not within that tearme, the towne should be yielded vnto the Frenchmen; and so it was vpon these conditions, that the Englishmen and other that would depart, should haue libertie to take with them their armour and goods, and be safely conueied two daies iornie on their waie from the French armie. Also that those which were minded to remaine still in the towne, should not susteine any losse or damage in their booties or goods. The pledges also which aforetime were taken out of that towne by the French kings senehall, should returne in safetie to the towne, and haue their goods restored vnto them. This done, Charles de Walois appointed a garrison of souldiers to remaine there for the keeping of the towne, and then returned backe into France. The Englishmen, which escaped out of those places from the Frenchmens hands, repaired vnto Balon, to defend that towne with their capitaine the foresaid erle earle of Richmond and the lord John de S. John, the which of some are vntreuelie said to haue bene slaine at Kion. Shortly after that Charles de Walois was departed and gone out of the countrie, the towne of saint Seuer was recovered by the Englishmen.

It should appeare by report of some writers, that Hugh Wier (whome they wzonglie name to be earle of Orenford) was sent ouer as then from king Edward to the aid of his capitaine in Gascoine, and at his first coming, recovered the towne of saint Seuer, and afterwards so valiantlie defended it against the Frenchmen, that honorable mention is made of him, both by Nicholas Triuet, and also by some French

French wifters, for his high manhood therein shewed. But whether he were brother or sonne to the earle of Oxford, I can not say; howbeit about the 27 yeare of this king Edwards reigne, we find one Hugh Tier, that was a baron, whom I take to be this man, but earle I thinke he was not. For (as Euerfden saith) one Robert Tier that was earle of Oxford deceased in the yeare next ensuing, and after him succeeded an other earle that bare the same name (as by records it may appeare.) Polydor speaking of the siege of S. Seuer, rehearseth not who was capitaine as then of the towne, but in the yielding of it unto Charles de Valois, after he had laine more than thre moneths before it, he agreeth with other wifters.

In the same yeare Berard bishop of Alba and Simon archbishop of Bourges, two cardinals of the Romane see, were sent unto the kings of England and France, to moue them to conclude a peace. They first came into France, and after into England, but perceiving the minds of the kings nothing inclined to concord, they returned to Rome without any conclusion of their purpose, but not without monie gathered of religious men to beare out their expenses, for they had authoritie by the popes grant to receive in name of procuracies and expenses, six marks of euerie cathedrall and collegiat church thorough the realme, besides diuerse other rewards. And where any poore chapiter of nunnies or religious persons were not able of themselves, the parish churches next adioining were appointed to be contributory with them.

promise to the French king.

At the same time sir Thomas Turberuile a knight, and one of those (as before ye haue heard) which were taken at Rion, to saue his life, and to deliuer himselfe out of captiuitie, though he was neuer proued false before, promised king Philip that if he would suffer him to returne into England, he would so worke with king Edward, that he might be made by him admerall of the seas; which thing brought to passe he would deliuer the English naue into the hands of the said king Philip. Hereupon was he set at libertie, and ouer he came into England. And for as much as he had knowne to be a man of singular and approued ballancie, king Edward receiued him verie courteously, who remembering his promised practise to the French king, fell in hand by procuring of friends to be made admerall of the seas. But king Edward (as God would haue it) denied that suite.

king sendeth forth a fleet against England, Abington.

The French king in the meane time hauing prepared his naue, containing thre hundred saile, that with the gallies and other ships (for he had got diuerse both from Herfelles and Genoa) sent the same forth to the seas, that upon such occasion the king of England might also send forth his fleet. But the French naue comming nere to the coast of England, and lieng at anchor certaine daies, looking for sir Thomas Turberuile; when he came not at the day prefixed, the capitaines of the French fleet appointed one of their vessels to approach nere to the shore, and to set on land certaine persons that knew the countrie, to vnderstand and learne the cause of such staie. They being taken of the Englishmen and examined, could make no direct answer in their owne excuse, and so were put to death. Some write that they sent five gallies towards the shore to suruey the coast, of the which gallies one of them aduancing forth afoze his fellows, arrived at Wyde there to Romney haven, where the Englishmen espied him, to draw the Frenchmen on land, seized vpon him backe into the countrie, but returning suddenly vpon the enemies, they slue the whole number of them; being about two hundred and fiftie persons. They set fire vpon the gallie also and burned him.

The admerall of the French fleet kindled in anger herewith, fasted freight vnto Douer, and there landing with his people, robbed the towne and priorie. The townefolkes being stricken with terror and feare of the sudden landing of their enemies, fled into the countrie, and raised people on euerie side, the which being assembled together in great numbers, towards euening came to Douer, and inuading such Frenchmen as were straited abroad to seeke prizes, slue them vnto in sundrie places. The French admerall which had bene busie all the day in pilfering the towne, hearing the noise of those Frenchmen that came running towards the sea side, freight waies got him to his ships with such pillage as he could take with him. The other Frenchmen, which were gone abroad into the countrie to fetch prizes, and could not come to their ships in time, were laine euerie mothers sonne. Some of them hid themselves in the coyne fields, and were after laine of the countrie people. There was little lesse than eight hundred of them thus laine by one meane and other at that time. There were not manie of the men of Douer laine, for they escaped by swift flight at the first entrie made by the Frenchmen: but of women and children there died a great number, for the enemies spared none. There was also an old monke laine named Thomas, a man of such vertue (as the opinion went) that after his deceasse, manie miracles through him were shewed.

Sir Thomas Turberuile, being troubled in his mind that he could not bying his traitorous purpose to passe, began to assaie another waie, which was to procure John Balliol king of Scotland to iointe in league with the French king, but per any of his practises could be brought about, his treason was reuealed, who being thereof euidentlie conuicted, was put to execution. Nich. Triuet saith, that he had promised the French king to cause Wales to reuolt from king Edward, and that by procurement of the prouost of Paris, he consented to worke such treason. And (as some write) he did not onelie homage vnto the French king, but also left two of his sonnes to pledge for assurance to worke that which he had promised. His secretarie that wrote the letters vnto the French king, conteining his imagined treasons, with other aduertisements touching king Edwards purposes, fearing least the matter by some other means might come to light (as the old proverbe saith, as well to his destruction as his maisters for concealing it, disclosed all to the king. Now he hauing knowledge that he was betrayed by his seruant, fled out of the court, but such diligence was bin in the pursuit of him, that he was taken within two daies after, and brought backe againe to London, where he was conuicted of the treason so by him imagined, and therefore finally put to death. This yeare the cleargie gaue to the king the tenth part of their goods, the citizens a first part, and the commons a twelfth part, or rather (as Euerfden saith) the burgesses of good townes gaue the seventh, and the commons abroad the eleventh penie.

The same yeare died Gilbert de Clare earle of Gloucester, which left issue behind him, begot of his wife the countesse Ione the kings daughter (beside three daughters) one young sonne named also Gilbert to succede him as his heire. The countesse his wife, after his husbands deceasse, married a knight of meane estate, borne in the bishopricke of Hereford, named sir Rafe Gonthiermer, that had serued the earle his first husband in his life time. The king at the first toke displeasure herewith, but at length through the hie ballancie of the knight, oft times shewed and apparantlie approved, the matter was so well taken, that he was instituted earle of Gloucester,

The king of Scots concludeth a league with the French king.
Polydor.

John king of Scotland affianced his sonne Edward Balliol with the daughter of Charles du Wa-lois brother to the French king, and concluded with the said French king a league against the king of England. Nothing moved the Scottish king so much hereto, as the affection which he bare towards his native countrie, for he was a French man borne, and lord of Harecourt in Normandie, which segnorie was after made an earldome by Philip du Wa-lois king of France. The Scottishmen had chosen 12 peres, that is to saie, foure bishops, foure earles, and foure barons, by whose aduise and counsell the king should gouerne the realme, by whome he was induced also to consent unto such accord with the French men, contrarie to his promised faith giuen to king Edward when he did homage to him.

Matth. West.

King Edward not fullie understanding the conclusion of this league, required aid of the Scottish king for the maintenance of his warres against France, and receiving a doubtfull answer, began to suspect the matter: wherupon he required to haue thre castels, as Barwike, Edinburgh, and Rokefburgh, deliuered unto him as gages till the end of the warre, and if the Scottishmen continued faithfull unto him, he would then restore the same castels to them againe when the warres were ended. This to do the Scottishmen utterly denied, alledging that their countrie was free of it selfe, and acquit of all seruitude or bondage, and that they were in no condition bound unto the king of Scotland, and therefore they would receive the merchants of France, of Flanders, or any other countrie without exception, as they thought good.

The dissolall dealing of the Scots.

There were in the haven of Berwike at the same time, certeine English merchants, upon whome the Scots made assault, and wounded some of them, and some of them they slew, and chased the residue, the which returning into England, made complaint, and shewed in what euill manner they had bene dealt with. King Edward hereupon perceiving the purposes of the Scots, determined to make warre by on them with all speed, & to conquer the whole coun-trie, if they could not cleare themselves of such euill dealing as of them was reported and thought to be put in practise. About the conuersion of saint Paule in Januarie, king Edward sent ouer into Gascoine his brother the lord Edmund earle of Lancaster, with the earle of Lincolne and other, to the number of 26 banerets, and 700 men of armes, besides a great multitude of other people. They arrived at Blay, about the midst of Lent, and staid there till towards Easter. In which meane season, a great loy-of Gascoins and other people resorted unto them, so that they were two thousand men of armes.

Upon Cene thursdaie, the castell de Lesparre was deliuered unto the earle of Lancaster, and after that diuers other castels. At his approaching nere unto Burdeaur, upon the thursdaie in Easter weeke, as he rested to refresh himselfe and his armie in a little village called Bekele, an armie of French men issuing out of Burdeaur, went to come on the Englishmen at batuares: but having warning, they prepared themselves to battell, so well as the shortnes of time would permit, and so thereupon encountring with their enemies, and fighting a sore battell, at length constrained the French men to returne unto the citie, and pursuing them as they fled, two English knights being breshzen to sir Peter de Pallott and an other that was a Gascoine, entred the citie with two standard-bearers belonging to the earle of Richmond, & to the lord Alane de la Zouch, whom the Frenchmen took, closing them within the gates.

The other Englishmen being shut out, first fell to the spoil of the suburbs, and then set fire vpon the same.
After this were certeine of the citizens that secre-lie were at a point with the earle of Lancaster, to haue deliuered the citie into his hands, but their practise being espied, they were taken and executed yet they could performe that which they had promised.

Polydor.

When the earle perceiving he should but lose his labo^r to staie any longer there, upon certeine weigh-tie occasions returned unto Baionne, where he thorowly after fell sicke and died. He left behind him thre sonnes, Thomas that succeeded him in the earl-dome of Lancaster, Henrie lord of Monmouth, and John whome he had begot of his wife Blandy, the which before had bene married unto Henrie earle of Champaigne, and king of Nauar, by whome she had but one onelie daughter, that was married vnto the French king Philip de Beau. After this the English armie besieged the citie of Aques, but thorough want of vittels he was constrained to raise thence and bzeake by the siege. The earle of Artois being sent of the French king with an armie into Gascoine, encountred with the Englishmen, and chased them with the slaughter of a great number, and after reconered diuers towones and fortresses in the countrie.

Whose Englishmen that kept the towne of Burg, being compassed about with a siege by Spounseur de Sully, obtained truce for a certeine space, during the which they sent unto Blaines for some relafe of vit-tels, and where other refused to bying by a ship laden with vittels, which was there prepared, the lord Simon de Montague, a right valiant chescaine, and a wise, took upon him the enterpryse, and through the middle of the French gallies, which were placed in the riuer to stop that no ship should passe towards that towne, by helpe of a prosperous wind, he got into the haven of Burg, and so relieved them within of their want of vittels, by meanes whereof, Spoun-seur de Sully brake by his siege, and returned into France.

In the meane time, king Edward not sleeping his business, procured Que earle of Flanders to ioine with him in league against the Frenchmen. This Que was the son of Margaret countesse of Flanders, whom he had by his second husband William lord of Dampire in Burstoine. Also king Edward procured Henrie earle of Bar, to whome (as before ye haue heard) he had giuen his daughter Cleamor in marriage, to make warre upon the Frenchmen, so that at one time the erle of Bar invaded the coun-trie of Champaigne, and the earle of Flanders made incursions vpon those countries of France which ioine unto Flanders. King Philip hereof aduertivsed, sent forth one Walter de Credle with a great armie against the earle of Bar, so that besieging the chefeest towne of Bar, he constrained the said earle to leaue off his enterpryse in Champaigne, and to returne home, for doubt to lose more there than he should win abroad.

But now to touch more at large the circumstances of the occasion that moued the earle of Flanders to make war against the French king. I find (in Iacob Meir) that there was a marriage concluded betwixt the lord Edward the eldest son of king Edward, and the lady Philip daughter to the fore-said Que earle of Flanders, which marriage was concluded by Henrie bishop of Lincolne, and the earle Warren, being sent over as ambassadours by king Edward, unto the said earle Gui for the same purpose. In the yeare following, the said earle of Flanders, together with his wife, comming to visit the French king at Corbeill, were arrested, and sent to Paris, there to remaine as prisoners, because that the earle had affianced his daughter to the French kings aduersarie, without his licence: neither might they be deliuered, till by mediation of the pope (who must needs meddle in the matter by vertue of his peremptorie power, & all christendome must beile the bonnet to his holinesse, or rather abhominableness,

Ille etenim toto seculo inbet orbe colendum, Cui nisi paruerit, crede perire licet) and suertie had upon the promise of Amedie earle of Sauoy, they were set at libertie, with these conditions, that they should deliuer into the French kings hands their daughter, which was so affianced unto him. Edwards sonne, and further covenanted, not to conclude any league with the king of England, but in all points to obserue a certeine peace which was concluded with Ferdinando earle of Flanders, in the yeare 1225. And if earle Gui brake the same peace, then should he be excommunicated, and all his countrie of Flanders interdicted by the archbishop of Reims, and the bishop of Senlis, iudges appointed herein by authoritie of the pope.

The earles daughter being sent for, and brought unto Paris, the earle and his wife were released, and suffered to returne into Flanders, and shortly after, the earle made earnest suit to haue his daughter restored unto him againe, in somuch that he procured pope Boniface to be a meane for him to the French king, but all would not serue, no, though as some say the pope accuseth the French king for retaining hir, answer being made, that matters pertaining to worldlie gouernement, belonged not to the pope to discusse. Finallye, earle Gui, perceiving he could not preuaile in that suit, to haue his daughter againe, upon high displeasure concluded, to ioin in league with king Edward & his confederats. Hereupon, at an assemblee of counsell kept at Gerard-mount, there was a solempne league made and agreed betwixt Adolph the emperor of Almaine, Edward king of England, Gui earle of Flanders, John Duke of Wabant, Henrie earle of Bar, both sonnes in law to king Edward, and Albert duke of Aulrich, against Philip king of France, and John earle of Henault his partaker.

The merchants of Flanders procured the earle to conclude this league with king Edward, as some write, the rather in respect of the great commoditties which rose to their countrie, by reason of the inter- course of merchandize bled betwixt England and Flanders, and for that through aid of the Englishmen, they might the better withstand the malice both of the French and of all other their enemies. This league being proclaimed in England, there were sent ouer into Flanders, the treasurer of the exchequer, and diuerse other noble men, to fetch hostages from thence, and to giue to the earle fiftene thousand pounds of silver, toward the fortifying of his castles and holds. King Philip being hereof aduertised, by counsell of the prelates of his realme, sent two honorable personages, as the capitaine of Mountreil, and the capitaine of Belquerke, which should attack the earle of Flanders by his bodie, and summon him to payd himselfe prisoner at Paris, within the space of fiftene daies next ensuing.

This attachment made, and summons giuen, the earle of Flanders sent his full defiance vnto the French king by the abbats of Cepmblois, and Senefles, unto whome he gaue sufficient letters procra- toize, to authorize them thereto, dated at Pale in the yeare of Grace 1296, after the accounts of the chro- nicles of Flanders, which begin their yere at Easter: and so this chanced in the five and twentieth yeare of king Edwards reigne, the Wednesday next after the feast of the Epiphanie. Hereupon was the earle ac- cursed, & Flanders interdicted by the archbishop of Reims, and the bishop of Senlis comming vnto Teruane for that purpose, about the fiftenth day of June, in the yeare 1297. But the lord Robert the earles sonne appealed from that interdiction to the pope, and so the Flemmings took themselves free & out of danger of the same. Earle Gui also obtained of king Edward, that it might be lawfull for them of Bruges, to buy wools, through England, Scotland and Ireland, as frelie as the Italians might by their priuilege and grant.

But to returne now to the doings of king Edward, who in this meane time, hauing perfect know- ledge of the league concluded betwixt the king of France and the king of Scotland, prepared an ar- mie, and first sent ambassadozs into Scotland, to giue summons to king John to appeare at New- castell within certeine daies, that he might there shew the cause why he had broken the league: and further, to declare vnto him that he was deceiued, if he thought he might serue two maisters, contrarie to the wordes of the gospell, and according to the old saying which selborne neuer faileth in consequence, Defuit ambabus qui vult seruire duobus.

For how much fauour as he purchased at the hands of the French king, so much displeasure might he as- sure himselfe to procure at the hands of the king of England, whome to obeie, it should be most for his aduantage. The ambassadozs that were sent, did their message thoughtlie, but king John was so farre off from answering any thing that might sound to the maintenance of peace, that shortly after he sent let- ters of complaint vnto king Edward, for wrongs which he alledged he had sustained by his means and at his hands. Hereupon king Edward, by aduise of his counsell, determined to set forward with his armie into Scotland.

In the meane time, Robert Ros, capitaine of Marke castell, renolted to the Scottish king, moued thereto through the loue of a Scottish gentlewo- man, whome he meant to marrie, notwithstanding he had sworne fealtie vnto king Edward. Whereupon, on his brother William de Ros giuing knowledge to king Edward, required to haue some aid, whereby he might defend the castell against the Scottishmen. King Edward sent vnto him a thousand soldiers, (Polydor saith an hundred) the which as they lodged one night in a towne called Presten, were slain by the Scottishmen of the garrison of Rocheforrough, that were led and guided by the said Robert Ros: some of them although but few escaped awaie by flight. King Edward aduertised hereof, halsted forth, and came to the said castell, glad of this (as is repo- ted) that the Scottishmen had first begun the warre, meaning, as it should seeme by their proceedings, to follow the same, for upon Good Friday, diuerse Sco- tishmen entring the borders, burnt sundrie villages, and spoiled the abbete of Carham.

Furthermore, whilst king Edward kept his ca- stell at Marke, seauen earles of Scotland, as Bou- chan, Wenteth, Strathern, Lennor, Ros, Atholl, and Mar, with John Comyn the master of Wadenaw, hauing assembled an armie together of five hundred men of armes on horsebacke, and ten thousand foot- men in Annandale, upon monday in Easter weeke entred England, and putting all to fire and sword, approached to Carlisle, and laid siege there vnto on each side, passing the water of Eden by a fowd vnder W- chardson, and did so much preuaile, that they burned the suburbs, and assaulted the gates, at which enterching hold upon the other buildings, a great part of the citie was thereby burned. Yet the men and the

On the same thursdaie, king Edward with his armie passed the river of Tweed, and so entring into Scotland, sent to the burgesles of Berwicke, offerring them peace upon certeine conditions, and straid a whole day for an answer: but when he could haue none that liked him, nor that sounded in anie thing to peace, he approached the towne, and lodged in the monastrie of Caldestreime. His armie consisted as some write of foure thousand men of armes on horse backe, and thirtie thousand footmen, besides five hundred men of armes on horsebacke, and a thousand footmen of the bishopricke of Durham. At the same time, there came foure and twentie English ships, the mariners whereof, beholding where the English armie was placed in battell raie, upon a plaine, the king making there certeine knights, they thought his meaning was to haue giuen forth with an assalt, and so entring the haven, and approaching to the land, began to fight with the towne men, where they lost foure of their ships, and were constrained to withdraw with the residue, with helpe of the falling water. Some haue written, that they lost but three ships which were consumed with fire, and that the mariners and soldiers of one of those ships, after they had defended themselves by great manhood from the first houre of the daie, till eleven of the clocke, escaped awaie, some by the bote of that ship, and some leaping into the water, were saued by the botes of other ships that made in to succour them.

The rumoz of the mariners attempt being byred through the armie, the king passing forward towards the towne, got ouer a ditch, which the Scots had cast to impeach his passage, and so comming to the towne, wan it, not losing any man of renobme, saining sir Richard Cornewall, the which was slaine by a quarell which a Flemming shot out of a crossebowe, being in the red hall, which the merchants of Flanders held in that towne, and had fortified it in manner of a tower: but when they would not yeld, and could not easilie otherwise be wonne, the house towards euening was set on fire, and so they being thirtie in number, were burned to death within it.
Upon the same night, the king lodged in the castell, which was yelded vnto him by them that kept it, their liues and limmes saued, and receiuing an oth, that they should not from thenceforth beare armour against the king of England, they were permitted to depart whither they thought good, their capteine sir William Douglas excepted, whom the king still kept with him, till the end of the warres. Some write that there should be slaine of Scottishmen at this winning of Berwicke, about the number of twentie thousand men, Abington saith 8000, but Richard Southwell saith 15000 at the least one with an other, with small losse of Englishmen, not past eight and twentie of all sorts. We may read more hereof in the Scottish historie.

¶ But before I passe ouer this slaughter, so lamentable and wonderfull, I haue bethought my selfe of a promised apologic for and in the behalfe of Richard Grafton, mentioned before in the reigne of Henrie the second, page 112. col. 1. where I shewed how unadvisedlie and with vnseemelie modestie for a man of learning, George Buchanan the Scot doth shew his bolts at the said Grafton, as now by occasion of the matter conuenientlie occurrent shall be shewed. The said Grafton in his large volume of English chronicles, falling upon the affaires betwene king Edward the first, and John Balioll king of Scotland, among other things there remembred, maketh report that in the said battell of Berwicke, the slaughter was so great, that a mill might well haue bene giuen by the space of two daies, with the streames of bloud which at that time ouerran the ground. At which words George Buchanan giueth a snatch, emboldened so to do, because the said Grafton referreth his recozd to Hector Boetius in his fourteenth booke and second chapter.

¶ Now how the Scot taketh by the Englishman for halting in his allegation, first for the chapter, conuincing him that Hector Boetius diuided not his booke into chapters, and therefore, where is the second chapter, with the whole fourteenth booke is a continued discourse without distinction by chapters: Secondly the said Grafton hath the cheeke, for setting a lie afloat, Buchanan flatlie affirming that Hector Boetius hath no such matter once mentioned in his annales.
Touching the first fault, wherewith the Scot chargeth the Englishman, this is note-worthy, that it should seeme to anie man of meane iudgement, that Buchanan of a prepered malice and purposed wilfulnesse hath sharpened his stile in this nipping fozt against Grafton. For sith it was Graftons meaning to recozd the truth, so farre forth as he was warranted by the auerment of writers; why should he be cast in the teeth with Effraim maledicendi libido, or dishonestie termed Indolus & impudenter mendax?
Which opprobrious epithets, if they were deserued by an untrue report of the authoz; then should Buchanan haue sharpened his tong against Belenden his countryman, the translator of Hector Boetius into their mother tong, from whome Grafton hath deri-ued his words; sense for sense vnmangled (as he found the same written.)

¶ Now how knoweth not that Belenden distinguished Hectors annales into chapters, upon whose au-thoritie Grafton relieng, and citing his authoritie according to the quotation of his diuision, why should he rather than Belenden be barked at, who is the principall in this controuersie? Again, it could not be hidden from Buchanan, that Belenden had distributed Boetius into chapters; considering that they were oxygoyoi, both liuing in the reigne of James the first of that name king of Scots; so that it might haue pleased him to haue tried Grafton by the Sco-tish Boetius, and so to haue bene resolved for the second chapter of the fourteenth booke, according to the archdeacon of Murreis translation.

¶ Now for the matter it selfe, touching the effusion of bloud, wherewith a mill might well haue bene gi-uen for two daies space; Hector Boetius his owne words are these; Rius sanguinis toto oppido adeo fluxere, ut cum esset decurrens minor aqua quam ad molendina cir-cumagenda fuerit, adiuvante aquam sanguine aliqua circum-agi sponte caperint. Which place, Belenden hath interpreted after this manner; So lamentabl slaughter was thow all the parts of the town, that anie mill might haue gane two daies standlie be streamis of bloud. Now examine Graftons words by Belenden, and Belendens by Boetius (besides that, marke what Grafton annexeth to the report of this slaughter, who saith that he will not inforce the credit ther-of upon any man, but counteth it a Scottish lie rather than than a matter of truth) and then conclude according to equitie, that Grafton is altogether excusable and faultlesse, and Buchanans curious & furious challenge reproueable. But admit Grafton had setcht his report from Boetius, as he had it from Bellenden; saymeth it a lie or an unlikelihoode, that the blood gushing out of the bodies of 25000, or (as Hector Boetius saith) 7000, would not increase to a streame sufficient & able to driue a mill or two about, without any water intermingled therewithall: The Latine copie hath ruui sanguinis, rivers of blood, noting by the word the abundance and also the streaming course of the same, which was able with the violent current thereof to beare awate the verie bodies of the slaine. To conclude this matter, & to set our Englishman by the truth, and let the Scot go with his lieng tong, which I would he had had the modestie to haue tempered, & to haue proffered a practise of that which himselfe pa-raphrasically preacheth and teacheth others to ob-serue, saing;

(Linguae obferavi claustra franco. pertinax Obmutui silentio, Ac temere ne quid os mali profunderet, Verbis bonis clausi exitum.)

And now to the storie. In Edward remaind at Ber-wikke 15 daies, & caused a ditch to be cast about the towne of 80 foot in breadth, & of the like in depth. In the meane time, about the beginning of Aprill, the warden and reader of the frier minours of Rochel-borough called Adam Blunt, came vnto him with letters of complaint from king John for the wrongs done and offered vnto him and his realme, as well in claiming an vnjust superiouritie, and confreining him to doe homage by vndue and wrongfull meanes, as also by invading his townes, slaying and robbing his subiects: for the which causes he testified by the same letters, that he renounced all such homage and fealty for him and his subiects, as he, or any of them ought for any lands holden within England. The king hearing the letters red, receiued the resignation of the homage, and commanded his chancelor, that the letter might be registred in perpetuall memorie of the thing.

The earles of Scotland before remembred, being assembled together with their powers at the castell of Jedworth, entred into England the eighth of Aprill, and with fire and sword did much hurt in the countries as they passed. In Kildesdale they besieged the castell of Harbottell by the space of two daies, but when they could not pueasle, they remoued, and passing forth by the east part of the riuer of Tyne, they rough Cokesdale, Kildesdale, and Northumberland, vnto Berham, they did much mischief by burning and harrieng the countries. At Berham they spole the abbete church, and got a great number of the cleargie, as well monks, priests, as scholets, and others, whom they thrust into the scholehouse there, and closing vp the doores, set fire on the schole, and burned all them to ashes that were within it. It is won-derfull to read, what beastlie crueltie the Scots vsed in that road which they made at that time in two seuerall parts. For the earle of Bogham, with thier of Galloway, entred by Cumberland in like manner as the other did in Kildesdale, burning and murdering all that came in their waie. For whereas all those that were of able age and lustie to get awaye, fled, & escaped their hands; the aged & impotent creatures, women in childbed, and yong children that could not shie for themselves, were vnmmercifullie slaine, and thrust vpon speares, and thaken vp in the aire, where they yalded vp their innocent ghostes in most pittifull wise.

Churches were burned, women were forced without respect of order, condition or qualitie, as well the maids, widowes and wiues, as nunnes that were reputed in those daies consecrated to God, and when they had bene so abused, manie of them were after also murdered, and cruellie dispatched out of life. At length, they came to the nurrie of Lamelaie, & burned all the buildings there, faining the church, and then returned backe into Scotland with all their pillage and boties by Lanercost, an house of monks, which they likewise spoiled. So that the cruell & bloudie desolation thereof Lucan speaketh in his second booke of ciuill warres, may aptlie be inferred here, as fit-lie describing the mercilesse murder of all states and sexes without parcialitie vnder the hand of the e-nemie: for saith he,

Nobilitas cum plebe perit, lateque vagatur Ensis, & a nullo reuocatum est pectore ferrum, Stat cruor in templis, multaque rubentia cade Lubrica saxa madent, nulli sua profuit etas, Non senis extremum piguit vergentibus annis Præcipuisse diem, non primo in lumine vite Infantis miseri nacentia rumpere fata.

Watke earle of Dunbar came to the king of England, and submitted himselfe, with all that he had into his hands; but the castell of Dunbar vpon saint Parks day, being assieged of the Scots was ren-ded vnto them, by treason of some that were within it, of whome the countesse (wife to the same erle) was the chiefe; for recouerie whereof king Edward sent John earle of Warren, Surrey and Suffer, & William earle of Marthwicke with a great power, the which laing siege to that castell, a great host of Scotishmen came vpon them to the rescue of them within, so that there was foughten a verie soze and terrible battell. At length, the blazie abode with the Englishmen, and the Scottishmen were put to flight, the Englishmen following them in chase eight mile of that countrie, almost to the forrest of Selkirke: the slightest was great, so that (as was esteemed) there died of the Scottishmen that day, to the number of The morrow after being saturday, which was the eight and twentieth day of Aprill, at the kings com-ming thither the castell was surrendered vnto him.

There were taken in the same castell three earles, genteth, Castells, and Ros; six barons, John Comin the yonger, William Sanchlere, Richard Siward the elder, John Fitz Geoffrey, Alexander de Poz-teigne, Edmund Comin of Hilbiri; with thirtie knights, two clearks, John de Somerville, and William de Sanchlere, and three and thirtie esquires, the which were sent vnto diuerse castles in England, to be kept as prisoners. After the winning of Dunbar the king went to the castell of Rochelborough, which incontinentlie was yielded by the lord Stewart of Scotland, the lues and members of all such as were within it at the time of the surrender.

Rochelbo-
rough yielded.

Then went king Edward vnto Euenburgh; where he planted his siege about the castell, and raised engines, which cast stones against and ouer the walles, soe beating and busing the buildings within. But as it chanced, the king writing letters, to aduertise his counceill at home of his proceedings, and concerning other businesse, deliuered that packet vnto a Welshman named Leuin, commanding him to go with the same to London in all hast possible, for he knew him to be a verie speedie messenger and a truste also (as he toke it.) But hauing the letter thus deliuered him, together with monie to beare his charges, he got him to a tauerne, where Woloulie co-suming the monie (which he had so receiued) in plaie, & making good chere, in the morning he caused one of brought some displeasure to them within with his crossbow, which he took with him for that purpose, so that coming unto the castle gates, he called to the warders on the walles to call doone to him a cord, that they might plucke him vp to them therewith, for that he had somewhat to say to their capteine touching the secrets of the king of England.

They fulfilling his desire, when he came in, and was brought afore the capteine sitting then at breakfast, he said unto him: Behold sir, here ye may perceive the king of Englands secrets, and withall raught to him a box, wherein the packet of the kings letters were inclosed, and appoint me (saith he) to some corner of the wall, and trie whether I can handle a crossbow or not, to defend it against your aduersaries. Here then others would haue opened the box, and haue read the letters, the capteine would in no wise consent thereto, but going into a turret, called to the Englishmen below, and willed them to signifie to the king, that one of his seruants being fled to him, sought to betraie his secrets, whereunto he would by no means agree, and therefore meant to restore both the tractors and the letters. Hereupon, the lord John Spenser, coming to heare what the matter might meane, the capteine caused Lewin to be let doone to him, together with the letters safe, and not touched by him at all.

When the king vnderstood this, he much commended the honest respect of the capteine, and whereas he had caused engines to be raised to annoy them within (as ye haue heard) he commanded the same to cease, and withall, vpon their capteins suit, he granted them libertie to send vnto their king John Balliol, to giue him to vnderstand in what sort they stood. As touching the Welshman, he was diuine and hanged on a paire of high galowes, prepared for him of purpose, as he had well deserved. A notable example of a traitorous villaine, so to offer the secrets of his souereigne to be known to his enemies: and no lesse excellent a president of an honest and faithfull harted foe, that would not himselfe nor let anie other haue a sight of the contents therein written; a rare point of god meaning and vpright dealing in a souldier, and speciallie in an enemie; but

castell left void

Now while the messengers were on their waie to Forfar, where the Scottish king then late, king Edward with a part of his armie went vnto Striueling, where he found the castell gates set open, and the keyes hanging on a naile, so that he entred there without any resistance, for they that had this castle in gard, were fled out of it for feare before his coming. The messengers that were sent from them within Edenburgh castell, coming to their king, declared to him in what case they stood that were besieged, king John, for that he was not able to succor them by any manner of means at that present, sent them word, to take the best waie they could for their owne safetie, with which answer the messengers returning, the castell was immediately deliuered vnto the lord John Spenser, that was left in charge with the siege, at the kings departure towards Striueling, with the like conditions as the castell of Rochester had yielded a little before.

Edenburgh
castell deliue-red to the king of England.

Thus was that strong castell of Edenburgh surrendered by force of siege, to the king of Englands use, on the 15 date, after he had first laid his siege about it. A place of such strength by the height of the ground whereon it stood, that it was thought impregnable, and had not bene wone by force at any time, since the first building thereof, before that present, so farre as anie remembrance either by writing or otherwise could be had thereof.

Here at Edenburgh, or rather at Rochester (as Abington saith) a great number of Welshmen came vnto the king, who sent home the like number of English souldiers, of those that seemed most wearie. Moreover, at Striueling, there came to the king the earle of Ulster, with a great number of Irishmen. Then passing ouer the riuer of Forth, the king came vnto Saint Johns towne about Midsummer, and there tarried certeine daies. While these things were a doing, John king of Scotland, perceiving that he was not of power to resist king Edward, sent ambassadoys vnto him to sue for peace; king Edward was content to heare them, and thereupon appointed, that king John should resort vnto the castell of Brechin, there to commen with such of his counsell as he would send thither within fixtene daies next ensuing, to treat of an agreement. King Edward sent thither Anthonie bishop of Durham, with full commission to conclude all things in his name. And within the appointed time came king John, and diuers of his nobles vnto him, the which after many sundrie treaties holden betwixt them and the said bishop, at length they submitted themselves and the realme of Scotland, simple and pure, into the hands of the king of England, for the which submission to be firme kept and obserued, king John deliuered his son in hostage, and made letters thereof, written in French as followeth,

*E*han per la grace de Dieu, roy de Escote, a tous ceulx que cestes presentes lettres verront ou orront, salut, &c.

John by the grace of GOD king of Scotland, to all those that these present letters shall see or heare, sendeth greeting. Bicause that we through euill counsell and our owne simplicitie, haue greivoullie offended our souereigne lord, Edward by the grace of God king of England, lord of Ireland, and duke of Aquitaine, in many things; that is to saie, in that, whereas we beeing and abiding vnder his faith and homage, haue bound our selues vnto the king of France which then was his enemie and yet is, procuring a mariage with the daughter of his brother Charles du Valois, and that we might greue our said lord, and aid the king of France with all our power by warre and other means, we haue at length by aduise of our peruerse counsell defied our said lord the K. of England, and haue put our selues out of his allegiance and homage, & sent our people into England, to burne houses, to take spoiles, to commit murther, with many other damages, and also in fortifying the kingdome of Scotland, which is of his fee, putting and establishing armed men in towres, castles, and other places, to defend the land against him, to deforce him of his fee, for the which transgressions our said souereigne lord the king, entering into the realme of Scotland with his power, hath conquered and taken the same, notwithstanding al that we could do against him, as by right he may do, as a lord of his fee, bicause that we did render vnto him our homage, and made the foresaid rebellion. We therefore as yet being in our full power and free will, doo render vnto him the land.

land of Scotland, and all the people therof with the homages. In witnesse whereof, we haue caused these letters patents to be made. Yeuen at Brechin the tenth day of Iulie, in the fourth yeare of our reigne, sealed with the common seale of the kingdome of Scotland.

After this, king Edward went forward to see the mountaine countries of Scotland, the bishop of Durham euer keeping a daies iournie afore him. At length, when he had passed through Surrey land, and was come to Elghin, perceiuing all things to be in quiet, he returned towards Berwikke, and coming to the abbeie of Scone, he took from thence the marble stone, whereupon the kings of Scotland were accustomed to sit as in a chaire, at the time of their coronation, which king Edward caused now to be transferred to Westminster and there placed, to serue for a chaire for the priest to sit in at the altar.

the bishop of Durham, the king of Scotland submit themselves to the king.

The king coming to Berwtike, called thither vnto a parlement all the nobles of Scotland, and there receiued of them their homages, the which in perpetuall witness of the thing, made letters patents thereof, written in French, and sealed with their seales, as the tenor here followeth.

The instrument of the homages of the lords of Scotland to K. Edward.

A Tous ceux que cestes lettres verront ou orront, &c. To all those that these present letters shall see or heare, we John Comin of Badenaw, &c. Because that we at the faith and will of the most noble prince, and our dearest lord, Edward by the grace of God king of England, lord of Ireland, and duke of Aquitaine, doo vow and promise for vs and our heires, vpon paine of bodie and goods, and of all that we may haue, that we shall serue him well and trulie against all men, which may liue and die, at all times when we shall be required or warned by our said lord the king of England or his heires, and that we shall not know of any hurt to be doone to them, but the same we shall let and impeach with all our power, and giue them warning thereof: and those things to hold and keepe, we bind vs, our heires, and all our goods, and further, receiue an oth thereof vpon the holie euangelists: and after all, we and euerie of vs haue done homage vnto our souereigne lord the king of England in words as followeth; I become your liegeman of life, members, and earthlie honour, against all men which may liue and die. And the same our souereigne lord the king receiued this homage vnder this forme of words; We receiue it for the land of the which you be now seized, the right of vs, or other faued, and except the lands which John Balioll sometime king of Scotland granted vnto vs, after that we did deliuer vnto him the kingdome of Scotland, if happilie he hath giuen to you any such lands.

The forme of their homage.

The words of K. Edward accepting it.

Moreover, all we, and euerie of vs by himselfe haue done fealtie to our said souereigne lord the king in these words; I as a faithfull & liege man, shall keepe faith and loialtie vnto Edward king of England, and to his heires, of life, member and earthlie honor, against all men which may liue and die, and shall neuer for any person beare armour, nor shall be of counsell nor in aid with any person against him, or his heires in any case that may chance, but shall faithfully acknowledge, and doo the seruice that belongeth to the tenements the which I claime to hold of him, as God me helpe and all his saints. In witnesse whereof, these letters patents are made and signed with our seales. Yeuen at Warke the foure and twentieth of March, in the 24 yeare of the reigne of our said lord the king of England.

Then was John Warren earle of Surrey and Sussex made by king Edward warden of Scotland, Hugh Cressingham treasurer, and William de Melbie high iustice, whome the king commanded, that he should call all those before him which held any lands of the crowne, and to receiue of them in his name their homages and fealties. John Balioll the late king of Scotland was sent to London, and had a conuenient companie of seruants appointed to attend him, having licence to go any whither abroad, so that he kept himselfe within the circuit of twentie miles nere to London. John Comin of Badenaw, and John Comin of Lowan, and diuerse nobles of Scotland were brought into England on the south side of Trent, being warned vpon paine of death not to returne into Scotland, till the king had made an end of his wars with France. After this, at his request, king Edward held a parlement at saint Edmundsburie, which began the morrow after the feast of All saints, in which the citizens & burgesses of god towne granted vnto him an eighth part of their goods, and of the residue of the people a twelfth part.

John Balioll sent to London.

A parlement at saint Edmundsburie.

A subsidie granted.

The cleargie by reason of a constitution ordeined and constituted the same yeare by pope Boniface, prohibiting vpon paine of excommunication, that no salages nor other exactions should be leuied or exacted of the cleargie in any manner of wise by secular princes, or to be paid to them of things that pertained to the church, bitterly refused to grant any manner of aid to the king, towards the maintenance of his wars. Whereupon the king, to the intent they should haue time to studie for a better answer, deferred the matter to an other parlement to be holden on the morrow after the feast of saint Hilarie.

The pretence of excommunication, that no salages nor other exactions should be leuied or exacted of the cleargie.

This yeare after the feast of the Epiphantie, Elizabeth the kings daughter was married vnto king John earle of Holland. Humfrey de Bohun earle of Hereford and Essex was sent to conueie them into Holland, there to take possession of the earldome, as then descended vnto the said John, by the death of his father latelie before slaine by his owne subjects, because he would haue disherited this John, and made a bastard sonne which he had to be his heire. The day appointed for the parlement to be holden at London being come, and the cleargie continuing in their deniall to grant any subsidie, the king excluded them out of his protection, for the redeeming whereof, manie by themselves, and manie by mediators, did afterwards giue vnto the king a fifth part of all their goods. The archbishop of Canturburie being found stricke in the matter, the king seized all his lands, and commanded all such debts as were found of his in the rolles of the exchequer, to be leuied with all speed of his goods and cattell. Some write, that when the archbishop of Canturburie in name of all the residue, had declared to them whom the king had appointed commissioners to receiue the answer, that where as they of the cleargie had two souereigne lords and gouernours, the one in spirituall matters and the other in tempozall, yet they ought rather to obey their spirituall gouernour than their tempozall. Neuertheless, to satisfie the kings pleasure, they would

of their owne charges send to the pope, that by his licence and permission, they might grant the king some aid, or else receiue some answer from him, what to do therein: for (saith the archbishop) we beleue that the king feareth the sentence of excommunication, and would be as glad to auoid it as we.

When the commissioners heard this answer, they required that they would appoint some of their owne companie to beare this message vnto the king, for they durst not report it to him: which being done as the commissioners had required, the king in his furie proceeded against them, in such rigorous manner as ye haue heard, in somuch that the lord chiefe iustice sitting vpon the bench, spake openlie these words; You sit that be attorneys of my lords the archbishops, bishops, abbats, priors, and all other the cleargie, declare vnto your masters, and tell them, that from henceforth there shall no iustice be done vnto them in the kings court for any manner of thing, although neuer so heinous wrong be done vnto them: but iustice shall be had against them, to euerie one that will complaine and require to haue it.

The cleargie handling of the matter by the archb. of York his suffragans.

Henrie de Newarke the elect bishop of York, with the bishops of Durham, Ely and Salisbury; with certeine other, fearing the kings indignation thus kindled against them, ordeined to laie downe in the churches, a fift part as ye haue heard, of all their goods, towards the defense of the realme, and maintenance of the kings warres in such time of great necessitie, and so the king receiuing it, they were restored to the kings protection againe. The friends of the bishop of Lincoln found means, that the shiriffe of the shire lenied and toke the fift part of all his goods, and restored to him againe his lands and possessions. Also, all the monasteries within his diocese, and within the whole prouince of Canturburie, were seized into the kings hands, and wardens appointed, which onelie ministered necessarie finding vnto the monks and other religious persons, and conuerted the ouerplus vnto the kings vse. Whereupon the abbats and priors were glad to followe the court, and sued to redeeme, not their sins, but their goods, with giuing a fourth part thereof. The cleargie suffered manie iniuries in that season, for religious men were spoiled and robbed in the kings high waie, and could not haue any restitution nor remedie against them that thus euill intreated them, till they had redeemed the kings protection. Persons and vicars, and other of the cleargie, when they rode forth any whither, were glad to apparell themselves in laie mens garments, so to passe through the countrie in safetie.

The miserie of churchmen.

The archb. of Canturburie his goods confiscate.

The obdurate manner of the archbishop of Canturburie.

The archbishop of Canturburie lost all the goods that he had, for he would neither agree to giue any thing, nor to laie any thing downe in the church, that the king might receiue it. Whereupon he was brought to such extreme miserie, that all his seruants went from him, & commandement was giuen forth, that no man should receiue him, neither within monasterie nor without, and so not hauing any one place of all his bishopricke where to laie his head, he remained in the house of a poore person, onelie with one priest and one cleark: yet he stiffelie stood in the matter, affirming certeinlie, that all those which granted any thing, either to the king, or to any other temporall person without the popes leaue, ran without doubt into the danger of the sentence pronounced in the canon.

A parliament at Salisbury

About the feast of S. Pathe in Februarie, the king called a parlement of his nobles (not admitting thereto any of the cleargie) at Salisbury, and there required certeine of his nobles to passe other into Gascoigne, but euerie of them seemed to excuse himselfe, whereat the king being moued, threatened that they should either go, or he would giue their lands to other that would go, with which words manie of them were grauously offended, in so much that the earles of Hereford and Warshall, Humfrie Bohun, and Roger Bigod, declared that they would be ready to go with the king if he went himselfe, or else not. And when the earle Warshall was estones required to go, he answered, I will willingly go with the king, and march before him in the fore ward, as by right of inheritance I am bound. Yea (saith the king) and you shall go with other though I go not. I am not so bound (saith the earle) neither do I purpose to take the iourne in hand with you.

The king then in a great chafe burst out & swore, By God sir earle, either thou shalt go or hang. And I swear (saith the earle) the same oth, that I will neither go nor hang: and so he departed from the king without leaue taking. Immediatlie hereupon those two earles assembled manie noble men, and other of their friends together to the number of thirtie banerets and aboue, so that in all they were found to be fiftene hundred men of armes appointed and ready for battell, and herewith they withdrew into their countries, and kept such sir there, that they would not permit the kings officers to take neither tools, leather, nor any thing against the owners will, but forbade them on paine of losing their heads to come within their comes, and withall prepared themselves to resist if need were.

In this meane time the warre was prosecuted in Gascoigne. The thursdate before the Purification of our ladie, Henrie earle of Lincoln, and the lord John saint John departing from Balon towards Bellegard, a place besieged as then by the earle of Arthois, to succour them within the same with vitells (whereof they had in need) as they approached to a wood distant from the fortreffe thre miles, they diuided themselves into two seuerall battells, the lord John saint John leading the first, and the earle of Lincoln the second. The lord saint John therefore hauing passed the wood with his battell, and entring into the plaine fields, was encountered by the earle of Arthois, who carried there for him with a great power, where immediatlie at the first joining of the battells, the earle of Lincoln retired backe: so that the lord John saint John and his companie ouerset with preesse of enemies were vanquished: and the said lord saint John with sir William de Spoxtime, sir William Burmengham and other to the number of eight knights, and diuerse esquires were taken, the which were sent to Paris as prisoners.

Other wrote somewhat otherwile of this battell, as that vpon the first encounter the Englishmen dyone backe one regiment of the earle of Arthois his men of armes, whom he diuided into foure parts: but when they once ioined with the second regiment, to the which they were beaten backe, forward they came againe, and so charging the Englishmen, with helpe of their third squadron, which was now come to them also, they easilie put the Englishmen oppressed with multitude vnto flight, & followed them in chafe. After this came the Englishmen which were in the rearward, and encountering with the fourth squadron or regiment of the Frenchmen, straightwaies brake the same. Herewith was the night come vpon them, so that one could not knowe another, a fens from an enemy, and so both the Englishmen and Frenchmen were dispersed till the mone rose, and the Frenchmen withdrew to their fortresses, and amongst them certein Englishmen were mingled, which being discovered were taken prisoners, as the lord John saint John, and others.

The slaughter was not great, for there were no footmen on either part, to spoile or kill the men of armes that were stationed beside their hostes: for the English

English footmen remained in the wood, or were with-drawne backe, as before ye have heard, without attempting any exploit worthy of praise. Anded some laie the blame in the Gascoine footmen for the losse of this battell, because that they withdrew backe, and left the English horsemen in danger of the enemies which had compassed them about on euery side. Thre hundred of the men of armes came through to the towne of Bellegard, but because it was night, so that they could not be discerned whether they were friends or foes, they within the towne would not suffer them to enter: whereupon they departed, and went to S.
Seuere foure leagues off. Yet further in the night, other of the Englishmen were receiued into Belle-gard, which came thither after the other, and so in the morning they of the garison with their assistance issued forth, and coming to the place where the battell had bene, gathered the spoile of the field, and conueied into their towne such prouision of vittells as they found there.

The earle of Lincolne with a great manie of other waorded a great part of the night and knew not whither to go. At length about thre of the clocke in the morning he came to Perforate, where he had lodged with his armie the night before, & there found a great number of his people right glad of his conuening and happie escape out of danger. From thence he returned vnto Baion with the earle of Richmond sir John de Witaine and all his companie that were left. And such was the hap of this iourne. In Lent following, those that were disperfed here and there abroad, resorted to the earle of Lincolne, so iourning at Baion, and in the summer season made a iourne towards Tholouse, spoiling and wasting the countries of Tholouse and other thereabouts, and remoued also the siege which those of Tholouse had laid vnto a fortresse called S. Riferne, in chasing them from the same siege: and towards Michaelmasse they returned to Baion, and there laie all the winter till after Christmasse, and then by reason of the truce concluded, as after appeareth, betwixt the two kings of England & France, they returned home into England.

In the same yeare the king raised the custome of wooll to an higher rate than had bene paid at any time before: for he took note fortie shillings of a sacke or sarpler, where before there was paid but half a marke. Whereouer he commanded, that against his iourne which he meant to make ouer into France, there should be two thousand quarters of wheat, and as much of oates taken by the shiriffe in euery coun-tie within the realme to be conueied to the sea side, except where they had no store of corne, and there should beuenes and bakons be taken to a certeine number. In the meane time the earle of Flanders was foreuered by war which the French king made against him, being entred into Flanders with an armie of thre scoze thousand men, as some authours haue recorded.

About the feast of the natiuitie of S. John Baptist, he laid siege to Lille, and shortly after came the earle of Arthois, being returned out of Gascoine with his power vnto that siege, and was sent forth to keepe the Flemings and others occupied, which laie at Furneis, and in other places thereabouts in low Flanders, with whome he fought and got the victorie.
King Edward therefore, to succour his friends prepared to go ouer into Flanders, and thereupon summoned all those that owght him any seruice, & such also as held lands to the value of twentie pounds and aboue, to be readie with horse and harnesse at London about Lammas to passe ouer with him in that iourne.

In the meane time about the moneth of Aprile, there began a rebellion in Scotland by the setting on of William Maleis: for the king of Englands suffice William Dymbie, accordinglie as he had in commission, confined and put to outlawrie a great sort of such Scottishmen, as refused to do fealtie and homage vnto the king of England, the which Scotishmen being thus condemned as outlawes, elected the foresaid William Maleis for their capteine, with whome William Douglas being once associated, the number of them increased hugelie. The earle of Surrey and the treasurer being in England, those outlawes purposed to haue taken the iustice at Scone: but he being warned though almost too late, escaped himselfe with much adoe, leaving the most part of his people as a spoile to the enemies. For William Maleis and his companie killed as manie Englishmen as fell into his hands, and taking certeine religious men, he bound their hands behind them, and constrained them to leape into the river, taking pleasure to behold how they plunged.

The king sent the bishop of Durham into Scotland, to vnderstand the certainte of this rebellion, who returning from thence, informed him of the truth. The king not minding to breake his iourne which he had purposed to make into Flanders, appointed that the earle of Surrey should haue the leading of all such men of warre as might be leued beyond Trent, to repress the Scottish rebels, and also wrote vnto John Comin earle of Boughan, that re-membryng their faith and promise, they should returne into Scotland, and do their best to quiet the countrie: they according to his commandement, went into Scotland, but shewed themselves slow enough to procure those things that pertained to peace and quietnesse.

In the meane time, whilst these things were a doing, the bishop of Carleill, and other which laie there vpon the gard of that citie and castell, hauing some mistrust of the loialtie in Robert Bruce the younger, that was earle of Carrike by his mother, they sent him word to come vnto them at a certeine date, because they had to talke with him of matters touching the kings affairs. He durst not disobey but came to Carleill together with the bishop of Gallowaie, & there receiued a corpozall oth vpon the holie and sacred mysteries, and vpon the sword of Thomas Becket, to be true to the king of England, and to aid him and his against their enemies in all that he might:
and further to withstand that the said king receiued no hurt nor damage so far as in him might lie.

This done, he returned againe into Scotland, and for a colour entred into the lands of William Douglas, and burnt part of them, bringing the wife and children of the same William backe with him into Annandale: but shortly after, he conspired with the Scottish rebels, and ioined himselfe with them, not making his father priue to the matter, who in the meane while remained in the south parts of England.
He would haue persuaded such knights, gentlemen and other as held their lands of his father in Annan-dale, to haue gone with him, but they would not breake their faith giuen to the king of England, and so left him. The earle of Surrey assembling together his power in Wokeshire, sent his nephew the lord Henrie Percie with the souldiers of the countrie of Carleill before into Scotland, who passing forth to the towne of Aire, went about to induce them of Gallowaie into peace, and hearing that an armie of Scottishmen was gathered together at a place about four miles from thence called Irwin, he made this therward, and coming nere to the Scottish host, might behold where the same was lodged beyond a certeine lake. In that armie were capteins, the bishop of Glasco, Andrew de Harreie steward of Scotland, and William Maleis which (as it should sue for peace.

(same) were not all of one mind.

There was in the same armie a knight named sir Richard Lundie, which neuer yet had don homage to the king of England, but now fleeing from his companie, he came to the English armie, and submitted himselfe with his retinue vnto the king of England, sauing that he went not to serue amongst them any longer that could not agree together. The residue of the Scottishmen sued for peace, vpon condition to haue liues, members, goods, cattels and lands saued, with a pardon of all offenses past. The lord Percie vpon pledges & writings herof deliuered, was contented to grant their requests, so that the king his maister would be therewith pleased, who being hereof certified, because he would not gladlie be staied of his iourne into Flanders, granted vnto all things that were thus required.

Then after that the earle of Surrie was come to the English campe, because William Maleis ceased not in the meane time to assemble more people, the Englishmen doubting some treason, resolved to glue battell, but whilst they were in mind thus to do, the bishop of Glasco and William Douglas to auoid the note of disloyaltie and treason, came and submitted themselves: and so the bishop was committed to ward within the castell of Rokeshough, and William Douglas in the castell of Werwikke. It is to be noted, that euen in the verie time that the traitie was in hand betwixt the lord Percie and the Scottish captains, the Scots of Galloway and other set vpon that part of the English campe, where the trasse and baggage laye, which they spoiled and ransacked; slaying aboue five hundred persons, what of men, women and children, but the alarum being raised, the Englishmen came to the rescue, and chasing the Scots, slue aboue a thousand of them; and recovered the most part of their owne goods, with more which they toke from their enemies.

In this meane time king Edward at the feast of Lammas held a councill at London, where he receiued the archbishop of Canturburie againe into his fauor, restoring vnto him all his goods and lands. He appointed him and the lord Reinold Grey to haue his eldest sonne prince Edward in keeping, till his returne out of Flanders. But Nicholas Triuer wisteth, that the said prince Edward being appointed to remaine at home, as lieutenant to his father, there were appointed vnto him as counsellors, Richard bishop of London, William earle of Warwikke, and the forenamed lord Reinold Grey, with the lord John Gifford, and the lord Alane Blokenet, men of high wisdom, grauitie and discretion, without making mention of the archbishop of Canturburie in that place. The two earles Marshall and Hereford being commanded to attend the king into Flanders, refused, excusing themselves by messenger.

Sir Rafe
released.

After this, the king caused sir Rafe Sponthermer (whom his daughter the countesse of Gloucester, in his widowhood had taken to husband without knowledge of his father) to be deliuered out of the castell of Bristow, wherein he had bene kept prisoner a certaine time vpon displeasure for the marriage: but now he was not onlie set at libertie, but also restored to his wife, and to all the lands pertaining to the earldome of Gloucester, appointing him to find 50 men at armes to serue in that iourne into Flanders. He also deliuered the earles of Cassels and Spenteth, John Cornu, and diuers other Scottishmen, appointing them also to go with him into Flanders. Finally hauing assembled his armie, ouer the which he made the lord Thomas Berkeley constable, and Gesteuy Jenuille marshall, he went to Winchelsey, and whilst he laye there before he toke the sea, there was presented vnto him from the earles a writ-ting, which contained the causes of the grēfe of all the archbishops, bishops, abbats, earles, lords, barons, and of all the communalitie, as well for summoning them to serue by an vndue meane, as also for the unreasonable taxes, subsidies, impositions & payements which they daily sustained, and namelie the impost augmented vpon the custome of wooll seemed to them verie grēuous. For whereas for euerie sacke of whole wooll there was fortye shillings paid, and for euerie sacke of broken wooll one marke: it was well knowne, that the wooll of England was almost in value esteemed to be twofold halfe the riches of the realme, and so the custome thereof paid, would ascend to a fifth part of all the substance of the land.

The kings answer thereto was, that he could not alter any thing, without the aduise of his council, of the which part were already passed ouer into Flanders, and part were at London; and therefore he required the said earles, that if they would not attend him in that iourne into Flanders, they would yet in his absence do nothing that might be prejudiciall to the realme: for he trusted by Gods fauour to returne againe in safetie, and set all things in good order. At length, about the 21 date of August, the king toke the sea, and landed in Flanders nere to Sluice, about the 27 day of the same month. He was no sooner on land, but that through old enuie and malice depending betwene the mariners of the cinque ports, and them of Permouth and other quarters, a quarell was picked, so that they fell together, and fought on the water in such earnest sort, notwithstanding the kings commandement sent to the contrary, that there were 25 ships burnt and destroyed of theirs of Permouth, and other their partakers: also three of their greatest ships, part of the kings treasure being in one of them, were tolled forth into the high sea, and quite conueied afloate.

The king from Sluice first went to Bruges, and after to Gaunt, finding the countrie in euill state, by reason that the good towne were not all of one mind: for diuers of them misliked with the doings of the earle, in that he had alied himselfe with the French kings aduersaries. About the beginning of September was Lille yelded vnto the French king, and after that they of Doway, Curtray, and Bruges, did likewise submit themselves to the same king. Then was Charles earle of Malois sent to Bruges to fortifie that towne, and to take the English name that laye at anchor in the haven of Dam: but the Englishmen hauing warning thereof, got forth with their vessels into the sea, and so the earle of Malois being disappointed of that preie, set in hand to fortifie Bruges and Dam. But the earle of Aulrich, & Robert de Beuers son to earle Guy, being sent with a power of Englishmen, Flemings, and other soldiers vnto Dam, fought with the Frenchmen, slue foure hundred of them, besides diuers that were taken, and recovered the towne. They might also haue recovered Bruges, as was thought, if the Englishmen and Flemings had not fallen at strife, & fought together about diuiding of the preie.

Finally, after this, the French king came to Bruges, and then the king of England and the earle of Flanders had long looked and all in vaine for the emperor Adulfe, who had promised to come to their aid with a great armie; for the charges and wages wherof he had receiued great summes of monie both of the king of England, and also of the earle of Flanders: they concluded in the end (when they perceived he would not come) to make some agreement with the French king: and so first was a truce taken, from the middell of October, vnto the calends of December, and after by mediation of Charles (sumamed Claudius) king of Sicill, the same truce was prolonged.

In this meane while, to wit, about the end of August, the earle of Surrey, when he saw that the Scotishmen would not performe promise touching the delivrie of the pledges, and that William Maleis still moued the people to rebellion, he assembled his armie, & with the same entring Scotland, came unto Striueling. Then the lord steward of Scotland, and also the earle of Lenox came unto him, requiring him to staie till they might haue leasure to see if they could bring the people of Scotland unto the kings peace. But when they could not do it, they returned on the tenth day of September, promising to bring to the aid of the earle of Surrey on the morrow after fortye horsemen, upon the which day two friars of the order of preachers were sent unto William Maleis, and to the other Scottishmen lieng beyond the hill about the monastirie of Scambelkin, to moue them to the kings peace. But their answer was, that they were not come to haue peace, but to trie the matter by battell.

The English armie without good aduise, thorough the presumptuous pride of the lord Hugh Cressling-ham, preased to the bridge, and halting to passe the same, the Scottishmen came vpon them per the one halfe could get ouer, and so fiercelie assailed them, that the Englishmen were beaten backe and slaine downe. For the Scots, after they saw so manie of the Englishmen to haue passed the bridge, as they thought themselves able to distresse, they made downe to the bridge foot, and with a number of their spearmen on foot, closed it vp, that no more should come ouer to the aid of their fellows, nor those that were already passed, should returne againe: yet one sir Parmaduke Whewng a right valiant knight, which was one of the first among the men of armes that came ouer, after that he and his compaignie had giuen downe one wing of their aduersaries, & had followed them in chase a good waie, as purposing to haue gotten the conquest against them, at length perceiving the compaignie behind distressed by the Scots, he returned with those few that were about him, and purposing to repasse the bridge, rushed in among the Scots that stood before him with such violence, that he passed thorough them, making waie for himselfe and his folks by great manhood, slaying one of his nephews also which was set on foot & wounded, after his horse had bene killed under him.

At length the discomfiture was such, and the Scots preased so earnestlie to win the bridge also of those Englishmen, which were not yet passed, that at length the earle of Surrey commanded to breake that end of the bridge, where they stood at defense to kepe backe the Scots, for else had there few of the Englishmen escaped. There were slaine (as some haue written) to the number of six thousand men, and amongst other was slaine sir Hugh Cresslingham, whose skin (as hath bene reported) the Scots stripped off his dead carcasie, for the malice which they bare toward him. This discomfiture chanced on the 11 day of September. The earle of Surrey, leauing in the castell of Striueling the said sir Parmaduke Whewng, promised him to come to his aid at all times when need should be, without teni weekes space, and here with taking his horse, rode in such hast to Berwike, that after his coming thither, his dead being set vp in the table of the friers minours, neuer after tasted meat, but died: after this, the said earle making no long aboad in Berwike, rode vp to London unto prince Edward, and left the towne of Berwike as a prele to the Scottishmen: but those yet that had the castell in keeping, defended it manfully against the Scots, the which assembled together in campe under the leading of Alexander earle of Arur-rey: and their capteine William Maleis came to Berwike, and finding the towne void of all defense, entered it, but they could not win the castell by any meanes.

The Northumberland men conueied their wiues, their children, their cattell, & other goods, which might be remoued, out of the countrie for feare of the enimies inuasion: but when the Scots lingered time, and entered not within the English borders for a season, they brought their goods againe, in hope that the Scots would not come forth of their owne marches at that time. But the Scots hauing aduertisement thereof, about the feast of S. Luke entered the English borders, and did much hurt within the countrie of Northumberland, so that to auoid the danger, all the religious men fled out of the monasteries situat betwixt Bewcastle vpon Tyne, and Carleill. The Scots spoiled, harried, and burnt vp the countrie, till the feast of saint Martine, and in the octaues of the same feast they drew together, and went towards Carleill, which towne they summoned, as you shall heare.

They sent a preest to them that kept it, commanding them to yeld: but receiuing a froward answer, they fell to and wasted all that countrie, passing through the foreest of Inglewood, Cumberland, and Allerdale, till they came unto Derwent and Cokermouth, not sparing either church nor chappell. Their meaning was to haue gone into the bishoprike of Durham, but what through fore weathier of haile, snow and frost, & what through vaine feare of wrong information giuen by their spials, that the countrie was well provided of men of warre for defense, they broke off that iournie, and yet there were not past a hundred men of armes, and three thousand footmen in that countrie, which were then also disperfed through irksomenesse of long staing for the enimies.
The Scots therefore drew unto Berham, and there lodged, not without bering the canons, although they had granted letters of protection vnto the prior and couent of the same house, to indure for one whole yeare: and likewise letters of safe conduit to passe and repasse for one canon, one squire, and two ser-uants, when soeuer they should send to them, during that terme: which letters were giuen forth vnder the name of the said earle of Surrey, and William Maleis. From thence they went towards Bewcastell, and burnt the towne of Riton. Finally, perceiuing they could not preuaile in attempting to win the towne of Bewcastle, they diuided their spoiles and returned home.

About the same time, to wit, a little before Christ-masse, the lord Robert Cliford, with the power of the cttie of Carleill, entered Annandale, committing all to the spoile of the footmen, of whome there was a great number. The men of armes on horsebacke, being not past an hundred in all, kept together, and finding their enimies assembled nere to Annankirke, gaue a charge vpon them, and chased them into a marish, within the which they kept them, till the footmen came in, and assailing them, slew 308 persons, and took diuerse of them prisoners, and returning agaue to their market, burnt ten villages, and on Christmasse euen returned with their preie and bot-ties vnto Carleill. In the beginning of Lent they made an other rode, in the which they burnt the church of Annan.

Whilste these things were in hand, prince Edward the kings eldest son, and other, which had the rule of the realme in the kings absence, sought meanes to pacifie the earles Marshall and Hereford: but they would not agree, but vpon such conditions as pleased themselves to prescribe, which were, that the king should confirme the ggeat charter, and the charter of forreſſes, with certeine new articles to be included in the ſame great charter, and that from thenceforth the king ſhould not charge his ſubiects ſo ſtriſſe at his pleaſure as before time he had done, without conſent of the ſtates of parlement, and that he ſhould pardon his diſpleaſure and malice conceiued againſt them for denieng to go with him into Flanders. The which were all ſent ouer into Flanders to the king, that he might perule them, and declare whether he would agree or diſagree to the ſame. He as one being diuinen to the wall, thought good to yield vnto the malice and iniquitie of the time, to reconcile the offended minds of the peres and barons of his realme, and granted vnto all the ſaid articles, confirming the ſame with his charter vnder his great ſeale. In conſideration whereof, the nobles of the realme and commons granted to the king the ninth penie of all their goods: the archbiſhop of Canturburie, with the cleargie of his prouince, the tenth penie; and the elect of Poſke and thoſe of his prouince, granted the fiſt penie; towards the maintenance of the war againſt the Scots, becauſe they were next vnto the danger.

Debate betweene the king and the Cantners.

The king alſo by his ſpeciall letters required the nobles of the realme, that if they continued in their due obedience to him, as they promiſed at his departure out of the realme to do, that then they ſhould reſort and appeare at his parlement, to begin at Poſke the morrow after the feaſt of ſaint Hilarie, without all excuſe or delaie: for otherwiſe he would accompliſh them as enimies to the commonwelth of the realme. At which day appeared the earles of Warren and Gloceſter, with the counteſſe of Gloceſter his wiſe daughter to the king, the earles Marſhall, Hereford, and Arundell, Guiſe ſonne to the earle of Warwike in his fathers come: and of barons, the lord Henrie Percie, the lord John Wake, and the lord John Seigne, with manie of the nobilitie, the which being aſſembled together, would that it ſhould to all men be notified, in what manner the king had confirmed the great charter, and the charter of forreſſes: whereupon the ſame being read with the articles therevnto added, and put in, the biſhop of Carleill, adorned in pontificalibus, did pronounce all them accuſed, that went about to violate and breake the ſame. And becauſe the Scottiſh lords appeared not, being ſummoned to be there, it was decreed that the armie ſhould come together at Newcaſſell vpon Tyne, in the octaues of the feaſt of ſaint Hilarie next inſuing, ſo that the generall muſters might then and there be taken.

The king laie the moſt part of this winter at Gaunt, in the which meane time there chanced ſedition betwene the Engliſhmen & the Cantners, inſomuch that the Welſhmen had ſet fire on the towne, if the king had not ſtraied the matter. But the Flemiſh writers ſaie, the Engliſhmen ſet fire in ſoure parts of the towne indeed, that they might the more freely haue robbed in other parts thereof, whileſt the townemen had gone about to quench the fire. But the townemen bent on reuenge, aſſembled together in great numbers, and falling on the Engliſhmen ſue thirtie of their horſemen, and of their footmen to the number of ſeuen hundred, or thereabouts. They had alſo ſlaine the king, if a knight of Flanders had not made ſhift to ſaue him. ¶ In deed (as ſhould appeare by the ſame writers) the Engliſh footmen had done much hurt in the countrie, and namelie one day they ſpoiled the towne of Dam, and ſue two hundred worthie perſonages, who had yielded themſelues to the king at his firſt comming into the countrie.

And although the king cauſed certeine of thoſe that had done this outrage to be hanged: yet the Flemings bare this & other iniuries in their minds, & meant to be reuenged thereof, before the Engliſhmen departed out of their countrie, and therefore there dzeu out of ſundrie parts into the cite of Gaunt by ſmall companies, to the number of ſoure thousand men of armes, beſides a great multitude of footmen, and when they perceiued themſelues ſtrong enough (as they toke the matter) at the day amongſt them appointed, and conſidered in their minds, that

unita potentior eſt vis Quilibet, at partes in plures ſeſa peribit, they cluſtered together, and vnder the leading of the earles ſonnes, William and Robert, they did firſt ſet vpon the Engliſhmen that were in their lodgings, of whom they ſue diuerſe, and after comming forth into the ſtreets, they went to haue made ſlaughter of all the reſidue: but by the noiſe that was raiſed, the king had warning in what ſtate the matter ſtood, and therewith getting him to armour, came ſorth of his lodging, and ſtreightwaies his people ſtood about him. And furthermore, the footmen which were lodged in the ſuburbes, hearing of this tumult, got them to armour, & approaching the gates, found them ſhut: but with fire which they kindled with ſtraw, wood, butter and tallow, and other ſuch things, they burnt by the ſame gates and ſo got in, loſing not paſſ ſix perſons that were ſlaine at the firſt entring.

Herewith the earle of Flanders came to the king, and beſought him to ſaue his people from committing further outrage: but the king as he had reaſon ſo to do, blamed him for the outrageous attempt of his people, and bad him go to appeaſe them, or he would take paine with them himſelfe to his owne ſuertie, though not greatlie to their eaſe. The earle went, and preuailed ſo much, that at length he quieted them, and then was order giuen for reſtitution of ſuch things as had been taken from any man wrongfully, according to the order and direction preſcribed by certeine diſcret perſons appointed as commiſſioners in that behalfe. The king perceiuing himſelfe in ſome danger, and that without the fauour of the Flemings he might hardlie eſcape out of their countrie, bare manie things, and ſpake courteouſlie, making partlie amends for the harms done by his people, as well abroad in the countries as in the towne. And ſinnallie about Midlent he returned into England, as after ye ſhall heare.

In this meane time, by the kings appointment, the earle of Surrey lord warren of Scotland, with other earles and noble men to him aſſociat, about the feaſt of ſaint Hilarie, had aſſembled an armie at Poſke, hauing firſt ſummoned the lords of Scotland to appeare there at the ſame day, who yet came not, but contrarilie had beſieged the caſtell of Rochefborough. Whereupon the earle of Surrey haſted thitherwards, ſo that William Waleis and other of the Scottiſhmen which laie there at ſiege, raiſed the ſame, and departed from thence. The earle of Surrey comming to Rochefborough, and relieving them that kept it with ſuch things as they wanted, paſſed forth to Holloſe, and came afterwards to the towne of Bertwike; which the Scottiſhmen had left voſt. Here came letters vnto them from king Edward, ſignifieng that he had taken truce with the French king, and that he meant thortlie to returne into England, and therefore commanded them not to make any further enterpriſe than the defending of the frontiers, and the recouerie of Bertwike, till his coming ouer. Whereupon was a great part of the armie diſcharged, and ſuch onelie remained in Bertwike as might ſuffice for deſenſe thereof.

King Edward hauing made an end of his buſineſſe in Flanders, as before ye haue heard, returned home.

into towards England, and came to a towne called Ardenburge, where the most part of such Scottishmen as he had brought with him into Flanders slipped from him, and went into Paris. The king being returned into England, ransomed the barons of the exchequer, and the knights of the bench into Poike, calling a parlement together, and gave summonses unto the lords of Scotland to come to the same, but making default in their appearance, he sent forth his commission and letters to warne his subjects to be readie with horse and battelle at Rochesterburgh in the feast of the Nativite of St. John Baptist next incoming. They obeying his commandement, assembled there at the day appointed.

Where were in this armie now assembled at Roc-kelesborough together with those of the bishoppeke, about thre thousand men of armes mounted on barbed horses, besides four thousand other armed men on horsebacke without barbs. There were also a great number of footmen, and yet none but such as came upon their owne god willes, the which were almost all Welshmen or Irishmen. There came also afterwards five hundred men of armes well apparelled, furnished and mounted out of Galcoine, of the which a certaine number were sent to Berwike by the king: where after the battell fought with the Scots, they remained in garison. The earle of Hereford, and the earle of Marthall were present with their retinues amongst other in this armie here assembled at Rochesterburgh, the which upon suspition conceived of that they had heard, thought it not sufficient to have the kings letters patents touching the confirmation of the two charters, and other the articles about mentioned, signed by him, whilist he was out of the realme, and therefore required that he would now within his owne land confirme the same againe. Here the bishop of Durham, John earle of Surrey, William earle of Marthall, and Rafe earle of Glocester, undertooke for the king, that after he had subdued his enemies, and should be againe returned into the realme, he should satisfie them in that behalf, and confirme the same articles.

This done, the king marching forth with his armie, came to Temple Biston, and sent forth the bishop of Durham to take certaine castels therabouts, as Wynton or (as some copies have) Wynton, and other two, which enterprise the bishop speedilie accomplished. The English fleet that should have come from Berwike, and kept alongst the coast to have furnished the armie with victuals, was strated and holden backe with contrarie winds, so that the armie began to be in great necessitie of victuals. The Scotishmen were advertised hereof, and supposing that the Englishmen by reason of such want of victuals, had not bene able through feeblesse to make anie great resistance, assembled their powers together, and came towards the place where the king with his armie was lodged.

At the same time two of the English ships arri-ued there with victuals, the which being bestowed amongst the souldiours, relieved them greatlie of their hunger. Amongest other the Welshmen had two turnes of wine delivered to them for their share, the which they tasted so greedilie, that overcome therewith they fell to quarrelling with the Englishmen, and begun a fraie, in the which they slew eightene, and hurt diuerse. The English horsemen herewith being kindled with displeasure, got them to armor, and setting upon the Welshmen, slew of them to the number of fourescore, and put the other to flight: whereupon the next morning it was said that the Welshmen upon wrath conceived hereof meant to depart to the Scots: but yet when the campe remoued, they followed the armie though a farre off, and a part by themselves, insomuch that manie doubted least if the Englishmen had chanced to have had the worste at the Scottishmens hands, they would have joined with them against the Englishmen. This bloodie battell sprang of intemperance, and surfeiting drunkenness, which is worthe to be thus disclaimed, animæ lethum, et victorum

Nurix, ac felerum, quid dæmonia cogit

Pelloræ? quid per te non audent? Iurgialiter,

The king notwithstanding that the Scots were com-ming towards him, raised his field, and went forth to meet them, lodging the next night in a faire plaine. In the morning vertie earlie, a great alarme was raised, so that manie man got him to armour, supposing the Scots to be at hand. The horse appointed for the kings saddle that day, as the king should have got upon him, frightened with some noise, started aside, and threw the king downe with such violence, that he brake two of his ribbes, as the report went.
Other while, that his horse trod on him in the night, as he and his people rested them, keeping their horse still bridled, to be readie the sooner upon occasion of any necessitie: but howsoever he came by his hurt, he staid not to passe forward in his purposed iourne, but mounting upon an other horse, went forth with his armie till he came to a place called Foukirke, where both the armies of England and Scotland met and fought.

The Scots were divided in foure schiltrons, as they termed them, or as we may saie, round battels, in forme of a circle, in the which stood their people that carried long staves or speares, which they crossed to intlie together one within another, betwixt which schiltrons or round batels were certaine spaces left, the which were filled with their archers and bowmen, and behind all these were their horsemen placed.
They had chosen a strong ground, somewhat sloeing on the side of a hill. The earles of Marthall, Hereford, & Lincolne, which led the fore ward of the Englishmen, at the first made directlie towards the Scots, but they were strated, by reason they found a marsh, or an euill fauoured moles betwixt their enemies and them, so that they were constrained to fetch a compasse towards the west side of the field. The bishop of Durham ruling in the second battell of the Englishmen, consisting of six and thirtie standards or banners, knowing the let of that moles or marsh toward the east side, hastied forth to be the first that should giue the onlet: but yet when they approached nere to the enemies, the bishop commanded his people to staid till the third battell, which the king led, might approach. But that valiant knight the lord Rafe Bassett of Wynton said to him: My lord bishop, you may go and say masse, which better becommeth you, than to teach us what we haue to do, for we will do that which belongeth to the order and custome of warre.

Herewith they passed forth on that side to charge the first schiltron of the Scots, and the earles with their battell on the otherside, and enen upon the first bunt the Scottish horsemen fled, a few onelie excepted, which staid to keepe the footmen in order. And amongst other was the brother of the lord steward of Scotland, who as he was about to set in order the bowmen of Selkirke, by chance was unhorsed, and slaine there amongst the same bowmen, and manie a tall mans bodie with him. The Scottish archers thus being slaine, the Englishmen assailed the spearemen, but keeping themselves close together, and standing at defense with their speares like a thicke wood, they kept out the English horsemen for a while, & fought manfullie, though they were fore beaten with shot of arrows.

attroies by the English archers on foot so at length galled with shot; and assailed by the fortification on the; they began to disorder and shrike from one side to another, and betwixt the fortification and the amongst them, and so they were slain and beaten down in manner all the whole number of them.

Some saie there died of the Scots that date (being the two & twentieth of Julie, and the feast of Marie Magdalene) above twenty thousand. Other write that there were slain at the least to the number of 15 thousand. The Scottish writers alledge that this battel was lost by treachery of the Cornish and other, as in the Scottish historie ye may more plainly perceive, with more matter touching the same battell: after this was the towne of saint Andrews destruyed, no man being within to make resistance. And from thence the English army came through Selkirk forest unto the castell of Aire, which they found sold; and after they came by the towne of Amman, and took the castell of Lochmaben, and so returned into England by the west marches, and came to Carleill.

About the same time certeine Irish lords, and amongst other as chiefe, one Thomas Wislet landed in the Ile of Araigne, the inhabitants whereof yielded themselves unto the same Thomas, who as was subgeynerant to have aided the Scots: but now hearing of the victorie which king Edward had gotten in a fight field, he sent unto him to give him to understand that he was come in his aid, & had won the said Ile of Araigne, and therefore besought him that it might please him to grant it unto him and his heires for ever. Which request the king granted: whereof when the earles Sparshall and Hereford were advised, they thought this a rash part of the king, considering that he had promised to do nothing anew without their consents and counsel.

Therefore the king being (as ye have heard) returned to Carleill, they got licence to depart home with their people, leaving the king still at Carleill, where he remained a time, and held a parliament there, in the which he granted unto manie of his nobles, the lands and livings of divers noble men of the Scots, as to the earles earldomes, to the barons baronies; but Galloway and Annandale, with certeine other counties, he assigned to none, reserving the same (as was thought) unto the foresaid two earles, least they should thinke themselves evill dealt with, if they had no part bestowed on them amongst the residue.

The king after this went to Durham, and from thence thought to have returned straight towards London, but hearing that the Scots meant to make some invasion, he went to Linmouth, and remained there till towards Christmasse. Now when the king had laine a certeine time at Linmouth, he departed from thence, and dyed southward, and comming to Cottingham, a little from Beverlie, held his Christ-masse there, and after dyed towards London, where in the beginning of Lent, he held a parliament, at the which he was required to keepe promise for the confirmation of the two charters and articles concluded with the earles of Hereford and Sparshall. The king was nothing contented that this matter should be so earnestlie called upon, for loth he was to grant their full requests; and againe to denie them, he stood in doubt how it might be taken: he therefore prolonged time, & would make no answer either to or fro.
But when the lords urged him so sore to give them an answer, he got him out of the citie, not making them pryncie of his departure, and when they followed him, and seemed not well contented that he should so dissemble with them, he excused himselfe by blaming the aire of the citie to be against his health, and therefore bare them in hand, that he onelie sought to refresh himselfe in some better aire in the countie more agreeable to his sickness; and as for answer to their requests, he would leave to repaire againe to the citie, and they should have answer by that coun-rely, as farre as should stand with reason and content them. They returned as he wished them; and had the chartes confirmed according to their request, saving that this addition was put in: the latter end of the same, in the name of the king. With which addition the lords were contented, and returned home to their houses in the great displeasure towards the king as before. in the name of the king in the name of the king

The countess mounting some seditions stir to assise hereof amongst the people, delivered the charters (so sealed and signed as they were) unto the shiriffes of London, that the same might be read openly before the people, which was done in Pauls churchyard in presence of a great assemble there, come together and gathered for that purpose. The people (than whom the sea in ebbing and flowing is not more inconstant, nor in judgment more rash, heddie, sudden, and unadvised, as one saith verie well, & to purpose,

Indignum vulgi insulsum, imbecillaque mens est, Quandopidem inuisa et vulgo sapientia, &c.) at the first before they heard the addition, gave manie blessings to the king for those grants: but when they heard with what words he concluded, they cursed as fast as before they had blessed. Before this parliament was dissolved, the lords had warning to returne & gaine hostile after Easter; and then they had all things granted and performed as they could wish or desire. The perambulations of forrestes were appointed unto three bishops, three earles, and three barons.

About the latter end of June there came over a bishop sent from pope Boniface as his Nuncio, and diverse other with him, to declare the order which the pope as arbitrator indifferentlye chosen betwixt the kings of England and France, for the deciding of all controuersies depending betwixt them, had gi-uen forth & decreed, which was in effect as followeth.

1 First that king Edward being then a widower should marrie the French kings sister named Margaret, notwithstanding the degrees of consanguinitie, for the which the pope would dispense.

2 That the lord Edward the kings eldest sonne should at convenient time take to wife the ladie Isbell the French kings daughter.

3 That the king of England should make satisfaction for the French ships which his men had taken at the beginning of the war, and that sundrie townes in Gascoigne should be put into the popes hands, till it might be understood unto whome the right appertei-ned. But those two last articles took small effect, the French king refusing to deliver any of those townes which he had gotten in possession. Moreover, these messengers in the popes behalfe required the king that he would set John Balioll, sometime king of Scotland at libertie, and restore those lands unto his sonne Edward Balioll, which he ought to hold within the realme of England, promising and undertaking in the popes behalfe to preserve and save the realme harmlesse from all hurt and damage that might insue by the delivrie of the said John Balioll.

King Edward understanding that there was great danger in setting him at libertie, was contented to deliver him unto the pope, but he refused to make restitution unto Balioll of the lands which he demanded. The popes ambassadours receiving John Balioll at king Edwards hands, took him over with him into France, and there left him in the custodie of the bishop of Cambriz, the popes deputie in that behalfe, where shortly after he died. After this, accord-ding to the covenants of agreement made betwixt the two kings of England and France, the captives upon either part were delivered. In the feast of the nativite of our Ladie, the king married the ladie Margaret sister to the French king at Canturburie with great solemnitie. About the feast of S. Martine in winter the king held a parliament at York, meaning to have gone from thence into Scotland, to have rescued the castell of Striveling, which the Scottismen had besieged, and had it surrendered unto them, yet the king could not set forward to come to raise the siege. The same yeare died Henrie Be-warie archbishop of York, and Thomas Corbridge a doctor in divinitie succeeded him.

In the eight and twentieth yeare of his reigne, in the Christmase season king Edward set forth a proclamation, forbidding and prohibiting all foreign coins to be received and paid as sterling monie within his dominion, commanding by the same proclamation, that two peeces of them should go for one sterling, untill the feast of Easter. There were diverse monies in those daies current within this realme, as pollards, crocards, faldings, eagles, leonines, slappings, and all these were white monies, artificiallie made of silver, copper, and sulphur, so that it was an ill time for base monies, & much chopping and changing was used in buying and selling of things.

At Easter following the king utterly forbade that any of those monies should be current at all, and held his exchange in sundrie places, and to be rid of them, men gave five or six of them for one sterling, not caring for them, because of their baseness, and yet within a yeare after that men had learned the skill by proofe how to trie mettall with melted lead in the fire, they found that two peeces of those base monies were in value worth one sterling, and many became rich by the exchange, which had bought good store of them, when they were so smallie esteemed: but the king caused inquirie to be made of them that used such exchange without his licence, and put them to their fines.

At a parliament holden at London in Lent this yeare, the king renewed the confirmation of the charters, and made certeine new statutes concerning fines and goale deliveries, verie profitable to the common-wealth. About the feast of saint John Baptist, king Edward went with an armie into Scotland, and there granted a truce to the Scots that inhabited the mountaine countiees to indure for eleven moneths, that is to saie, till Whitson-tide next ensuing. As the king was upon his journey towards in the north parts, his late married wife queene Margaret was delivered of hir first sonne at Brotherton, a place in Yorkeshire not farre from Pontefract; he was named Thomas, and took the surname of Brotherton, of the place where he was borne.

Whereupon pope Boniface at the sute of the Scots wrote his letters unto king Edward, commanding him by the same and by the archbishop of Canturburie, whom he appointed to deliver the same letters by other letters to him directed, that he should not onelie releafe and set at libertie all such Scots as he had in prison, but also give over his warres which he made against the realme of Scotland: and if he meant to make any claime to the same, then to send his procurators unto the court of Rome, and there to shew what evidence he could for his right thereto, where the matter as he maintained was to be heard, decided, and iudged; and not elsewhere. The archbishop, according to the popes commandment, did the message, and presented the popes letters unto the king, who deferred the answer unto the assemble of the estates in parlement, and hereof the archbishop advertised the pope accordingly, as in the letters to him directed he was commanded; which he durst not but satisfie, because he was persuaded the popes authority to have bene so ample and peremptorie, that there was no resisting or gaine-saying of him, with,

Anish, Christ. & Anichrist. pag. 24.

This yeare also on saint Kenigins daie, which is the first of October, died Edmund earle of Cornewall, the sonne of earle Richard, that was also king of Almaine; and because he left no issue behind him to inherit that earldome, the same returned to the crowne. In the 29 yeare of king Edwards reigne, on saint Oswalds day, or (as some have written) the Friday after the feast of Peter Ad Vincula, his wife queene Margaret was delivered of hir second sonne, that had to name Edmund of Woodstocke, surnamed so of the place where he was borne. The king also this yeare after Christmase held a parliament at Lincoln, to the which the earls and barons of the realme came in armour, to the end (as it is said) that they might procure of the king the more speedie execution of the charter of foresters, which by him had hitherto bene delayed, but now that he perceived their earnestnesse and importunate suit, he condescended to their willes in all things.

Pope Boniface being solicited by the instant suit of the Scottismen, and offended also that the lands in England, which belonged unto Edward Balioll sonne of John Balioll, were not to the same Edward restored, he wrote letters to king Edward; forbidding him from thence forth any further to ber the Scots by wars, because that the kingdome of Scotland was surrendered already into his hands by the generall consent of the Scottismen themselves, and therefore was it in his power to bestow and take away the same to whom or from whom soever it should please him.

There were reasons alledged why the king of England seemed to do wrong in challenging as then the kingdome of Scotland: and amongst other, one was, that such homage as had bene done of ancient time to the kings of England, by the kings of the Scots, was onelie meant for Lindale, Berreth, and such other lands as the Scottish kings held within England, and not for the realme of Scotland. And whereas the kings of Scotland had aided the kings of England in their warres against the rebels of the realme of England, and bene present at their coronation, the same was done of speciall favour, and not of dutie. B. Edward having received the popes prescript, and well considered the whole contents thereof, sent in writing his answer at large, pointing by evident reasons that the right of proprietie in the kingdome of Scotland, did most iustlie appertaine unto him, and that the allegations were not true, but forged, which had bene by furnished information presented against him.

Beside the kings letters, which he wrote in his owne behalfe, there was an other letter devised and written by all the lords temporall of the land, assembled in parlement at Lincoln, in which letter they answered in name of all the estates there gathered, unto that point wherein the pope pretended a right to be iudge for the title of the realme of Scotland, protesting flatlie, that they would not consent that their king should do any thing that might tend to the inheriting of the right of the crowne of England, and plaine overthrow of the state of the same realme, and

than the kings of England, and the kings of England haue answered or ought to answer for their rights in the foresaid reime, or for anie his temporalities before anie iudge ecclesiasticall or secular, by reason of fre preheminnence of the state of his roiall dignitie and custome kept without breach at all times. Wherefore, after treatie had, and diligent deliberation of the contents in your foresaid letters, this was the common agrement & consent with one mind, and shall be without faile in time to come by Gods grace, that our foresaid lord the king ought by no meanes to answer in iudgement in any case, or should bring his foresaid rights into doubt, nor ought not to send any proctors or messengers to your presence, speciallie seeing that the premises tend manifestlie to the disheriting of the right of the crowne of England, and the plaine ouerthrowe of the state of the said realme, and also hurt of the liberties, customes and lawes of our fathers, for the keeping & defense of which we are bound by the duetie of the oth made, and we will mainteine them with all power, and will defend them (by Gods helpe) with all strength, and furthermore, will not suffer our foresaid lord the king to do or by anie means attempt the premises being so accustomed, without, and not hard of afoze. Wherefore we reuerentlie and humbly besech your holinesse, that ye would suffer the same our lord king of England (who among other princes of the world sheweth himselfe catholike and deuout to the Romish church) quietlie to enjoy his rights, liberties, customes, and lawes aforesaid: without all impairing and trouble, and let them continue vntouched. In witnesse whereof, we haue set our seales to these presents, as well for vs, as for the whole communalte of the foresaid reime of England. Dated at Lincolne the twelfth of Februarye, in the yeare of our Lord 1301, Et anno Edwardi primi 29.

The pope when he heard and deliberatelle pondered the kings answer, with this letter directed to him from the English barons, waxed cold in the matter, and followed it no further. The truce betwixt the king and the Scots being once expired, the king assembled his armie, and went into Scotland, about the feast of saint John Baptist, and tarling there all the summer and winter following, his soldiers lost manie of their great horses for lacke of forrage, which could not be gotten in the cold winter season. He kept his Christmas at Lithquo, and at length at the request and sute of his brother in law the French king, he granted effones a truce to the Scottishmen, untill the feast of All saints next ensuing.

Then hauing ordered his businesse for that time in Scotland, he returned into England, and about midlent called a parlement at London. Also this yere pope Boniface vpon displeasure conceiued against the French king, sent vnto king Edward, exhorting him to make warres against the same French king, and to persuaade him the more easilie thereunto, he promised him great aid: but the king of England hauing proued the said pope, not the surest man in friendship towards him, forbore to attempt anie forceable exploit against the French king, trusting by some other meanes to recouer his right.

This yere Humfrey Bohun earle of Hereford departed out of this life, after whome succeeded his sonne Humfrey, who afterwards married the kings daughter, Elizabeth countesse of Holland, after that his first husband was dead. Tourneys, iustices, barriers, and other warlike exercises, which yong lords and gentlemen had appointed to exercise for their pastime in diuerse parts of the realme, were forbidden by the kings proclamations sent downe to be published by the shirifs in euerie countie abroad in the realme: the tesse of the writ was from Westminster the sixteenth of Iulie. ¶ The citizens of Burdeaur could not beare the yoke of the French bondage, and therefore this yere about Christmaste expelled them out of their citie. ¶ Shortly after the French king doubting least the king of England, by the setting on of the pope, should make warres against him for wrongfull detaining of Gascoine, to purchase his fauor, restored to him all that which he held in Gascoine, and so then they of Burdeaur also submitted themselves to the king of England of their owne accord.

Now after that the truce with the Scots was expired, which took end at the feast of All saints last past, the king sent the lord John Segraue, a right valiant knight (but not so circumspect in his gouernment as was necessarie) with a great armie into Scotland, to haue the rule of the land as lord warden of the same: with him was ioined also Rafe Confreie, treasurer of the armie. These two capitains comming to the borders, and hearing that the Scottishmen already were in armes, they entered into Scotland, and in order of battell passed forth to Edinburgh, and hearing nothing of their enemies which kept them still in the mountains, they deuised their armie into three seuerall battels, two of the which came behind the fore ward vnder the leading of the said Rafe Confreie, the third (that is to say) the fore ward, the lord Segraue led himselfe, in such order that there was the distance of foure miles betwixt their lodgings. This they did to be the more plentifully serued of vittels.

But the Scots vnderstanding this order of their enemies, became the more hardie, and thereupon hauing knowledge where the lord Segraue was lodged with his companie, a good way off from the other two parts of the armie, they hasted forwards in the night season, and came nere vnto the place where the same lord Segraue was encamped, a little before daie, making themselves readie to assaile the Englishmen in their campe. But the lord Segraue hauing knowlege of their comming, though he was counsellled by some of them that were about him, either to withdraw vnto the other battels, or else to send vnto them to come to his aid, he would follow neither of both the waies; but like a capteine more hardie than wise in this point, disposed his companies which he had there in order to fight, and encouraging them to plaie the men, immediatlie vpon the rising of the sunne, and that his enemies approached, he caused the trumpets to sound to the battell, and gaue therewith the onset.

The fight was sore and doubtfull for a while, till the Englishmen overcome with the multitude of their enemies began to be slaine on eche side, so that few escaped by flight. To the number of thientie worthie knights were taken, with their capteine the said lord Segraue being sore wounded, but he was by chance rescued and deliuered out of the enemies hands, by certeine horsemen, which vnder the leading of the lord lord Robert Peuell a right ballant knight (vpon hearing the noife of them that fled) came on the furs out of the next campe to the succour of their fellows. Rafe Confric after this mishap (as Polydor faith) brought backe the residue of the armie into Eng- land, not thinking it necessarie to attempt any fur- ther enterprife at that time against the enimies, our- matching him both in strength and number. This in- counter chanced on the first Iundaie in Lent. ¶ I re- member the Scottis chronicles containe much more of this enterprife greatlie to their glorie, and more (haplie) than is true, as by conferring the place where they intreat of it, with this that I haue here exem- plified out of our writers it may well appeare. The earle Marthall hauing spent largelie whilft he stood in contention against the king, who was now ear- nestlie called vpon to repaie such summes of monie as he had borrowed of his brother John Bigod, who was verie rich by reason of such benefices and spiri- tuall livings as he had in his hands, the earle bicause he had no children, to whom he might leaue his lands, meant to haue left them vnto his said brother: but when he saw him so importunate in calling for the debts which he owght him; he toke such displeasure therewith, that to obtaine the kings fauour, and to disappoint his brother of the inheritance, he gaue vnto the king all his possessions, vpon conditi- on that the king adding thereto other lands in value worth a thousand markes by yeare, should restore them to him againe to inioy during his life, the re- mainder after his decesse to come vnto the king, and further, the king should paie and discharge him of all his debts.

King Edward being aduertised of the losse which his men had sustained in Scotland, freightwaies called a parlement, wherein by assent of the states a subsidie was granted, towards the maintenance of his warres, and then the same being leued by assen- bled his people, and shortly after about Whitsuntide entred into Scotland to reuenge the death of his men. The Scots hearing of the kings coming, fled into the mountins, moles, and marish grounds, not once shewing any countenance to fight any set battell with the English host, so that the king in manner without resistance passed through the coun- trie euen vnto Cathnes, which is the furthest part of all Scotland. ¶ Some of the Scots perceiving their lacke of power to resist the English puissance, came to king Edward, and submitted themselves, with condition that they should inioy their lands which he had giuen auaie to his lords, they redeming the same with convenient fines, which was granted.

But Will. Waleis with certeine other, keeping themselves in places where no armie could come to pursue them, would neuer giue eare to any conditi- ons of agreement: so that neither with feare, neither with offer of rewards could this Waleis be induced to follow: behold the English R. ruling the realme of Scotland, King Edward returning backe, came to the castell of Striueling (which the Scottis men held against him) and besieged it. The king himsele laie at Dunferling the most part of the winter: and whilft he laie there, the queene which had lien a long time at Linmouth came to him, and when the win- ter was once past, the king himsele came to the siege, and caused certeine engins of wood to be raised by against the castell, which shot off stones of two or three hundred weight: but yet would not they with- in once talke of any surrender. And where the En- glishmen filled the ditches with wood and boughs of trees, they set the same on fire, and burnt them to ashes: at length the ditches were filled with stones and carth, so that then the Scots within perceiving themselves in euident perill to lose the castell, on saint Margarets daie they yielded themselves sim- ple into the kings hands, as the English writers as- firme, though the Scottis writers record the con- trarie.

Finallie, when the king had ordered all his busi- nesse in Scotland at his pleasure, he returned into England, leauing in Scotland for warden the lord John Segraue, or (as other writers haue) sir Aimer de Valence earle of Penbroke. At his coming to Poike he caused the iustices of his bench, and the ba- rons of the exchequer to remoue with their courts, and all their clerks and officers, together with the lord chancellor and his court to London, that the termes might be kept there, as in times past they had bene, whereas now the same had remained at Poike a- boue the space of six yeares, vpon this consideration, that the king and his counsell might be nere vnto Scotland to prouide for the defense thereof, as occa- sion from time to time should require. ¶ From Poike he came to Lincoln, and there remained all the win- ter, holding a counsell, in the which he estones confir- med the articles of Magna charta, touching the liber- ties, priuileges and immunities of his subjects, the which to declare their thankfull minds towards him for the same, granted to him for the space of one yere the fifteenth part of all their reuenues. Others write that the king had in this yeare of citizens and of the burgeses of god townes, the first penie according to the valued rate of their goods.

About the same time, Thomas Coleburgh or Co- bridge archbishop of Poike departed this life, and one William Cranesfield doctour of both the lawes suc- ceeded him. ¶ There died about the same time that valiant knight the lord W. Latimer. ¶ Also John Warren earle of Surrey and Sussex died this yere e was buried at Welles. His nephew by his son (na- med also John) succeeded him, obtaining to wife the kings nece by his daughter Elianor that was mar- ried to the earle of Bar, as before ye haue heard. Likewise Robert Bruce earle of Carrike, the fift of that name died this yeare, who was father to that Robert Bruce that was after R. of Scots. ¶ More- over, about this season the king ordeined certeine commissioners of iudiciaries, to make inquisitions through the realme, by the verdict of substantiall iu- ries vpon all officers, as maiors, shiriffes, balliffes, exchetois, and other that had misused themselves in their offices, either by extortion, by berie, or other- wise, to the greiuanee of the people, contrarie to that they rightlie might do and iustifie by vertue of their offices: by means of which inquisitions manie were accused and found culpable, and therevpon put to greuous fines.

Also the iustices, which were assigned to take these inquisitions, extended the same according to their commission against such as had made intrusions in- to other mens lands, and for doubt to be impleaded for the same had made alienations ouer into the hands of great men; also against such barretois as vied to take monie to beat any man, and againe would not sticke to take monie of him whom they had so beaten, to beat him that first hired them to beat the other. The malice of such maner people was now restrained by force of these inquisitions: for such as were found culpable, were twofolde punished, some by death, and some by ransoms: diuerse also for feare to come to their answers fled the realme: also forfeits against the crowne were freightlie looked vnto, found out, and leuied; by reason whereof great summes of monie came to the kings coffers, which holpe well towards the maintenance and charges of his warres. This kind of inquisition was named commonlie Traile baston, which signifieth, Traile or draw the staffe. And forsomuch as the proceeding in this nicle of Abington is found expressed, and heere for brecefenesse omitted.

In the thre and thirtieth yeare of his reigne, King Edward put his sonne prince Edward in priso, bi-cause that he had riotoullie broken the parkes of Walter Langton bishop of Chester; and because the prince had done this deed by the procurement of a lewed and wanton person, one Peers Gascoigne, an esquire of Gascoigne, the king banished him the realme, least the prince, who delighted much in his companye, might by his euill and wanton counsell fall to euill and naughtie rule. Moreover, the same yeare, William Malets was taken, and deliuered vnto king Edward, who caused him to be brought to London, where on St. Bartholmewes euen, he was conueied through the streets vnto Westminster, and there arreigned of his treason, and condemned, and thereupon hanged, by a stone and quartered, his head was set ouer London brdge, his right side ouer the brdge at Newcastle vpon Tyne, his left side was sent to Bertholme and there set by, his right leg was sent to St. Johns towne; and his left vnto Aberden, in which places the same were set by for an example of terroz to others.

Also, about the same time, the king of France required the king of England by messengers and letters sent vnto him, that he would banish all the Flem-mings out of his realme, in like manner as at his instance he had latelie before banished all the Scotishmen out of France. The king of England was contented so to do, and by that means were all the Flemmings anoided out of this land at that season, but shortlie after, they returned againe. King Edward accused Robert archbishop of Canturburie vnto the pope, for that he should go about to trouble the quiet state of the realme, and to defend and succour rebellious persons, whereupon the said archbishop being cited to the popes consistorie, was suspended from executing his office, till he should purge himselfe by order of law, of such crimes as were laid and objected against him. The king also obtined an absolution of the pope, of the oath which against his will he had taken, for the obseruing of the liberties erected by force of him, by the earls and barons of his realme, name-lie, touching disforrestings to be made.

This yeare, Robert Wince, contriuing waies how to make himselfe king of Scotland, the nine & thientith day of Januarie, slew the lord John Comin at Dunfrice, whilste the kings iustices were sitting in iudgement within the castell there, and vpon the day of the Annunciation of our ladie, caused himselfe to be crowned king of Scotland at Scone, where the countesse of Boughan, that was secretlie departed from hir husband the earle of Boughan, and had taken with hir all his great horses, was readie to set the crowne vpon R. Bruces head, in absence of hir brother the earle of Jife, to whom (being in England) sojourning at his manor of Whitwike in Leicestershire, that office of right appertained. This countesse being afterwards taken the same yeare by the Englishmen, where other would haue had hir put to death, the king would not grant therunto, but commanded that she should be put in a cage made of wood, which was set vpon the walles of the castell of Berwike, that all such as passed by might behold hir; to render a punishment for so great an offense. But the king counted it no honour to be seuer against that for whom nature tendereth, though malefactors, and therefore was content with a mild correction tending rather to some shame than smart, to recompense hir offense, whereby she procured against hir selfe no lesse reproch than she sustained, agreeable to the old saying,

Sape sum proprium fecit puer ipse flagellum.

There were present at his coronation foure bishops, five earles, and a great multitude of people of the land. Immediately vpon the newes brought to the king of Bruces coronation, he sent forth a power of men, vnder the conduct of the earle of Penbrooke, and of the lord Henrie Percie, the lord Robert Clifford, and others, to resist the attempts of the Scots, now readie to worke some mischief, though the encouragement of the new king. Edward prince of Wales was made knight this yeare at London vpon Whitsondaie, & a great number of other young bachelors with him (297 as Abington writeth) the which were sent freightwaies with the said prince towards Scotland, to ioine with the earle of Penbrooke, to resist the attempts of the new king Robert le Bruce and his complices. King Edward himselfe followed. The generall assemble of the armie was appointed at Carleill, fiftene daies after the feast of saint John Baptist, from thence to march forth vnder the guiding of the prince into Scotland.

In the meane time, Robert le Bruce went abroad in the countries of Scotland, receiued the homages of manie Scottishmen, and got together an armie of men, with the which he approached nere to saint Johns towne, into the which the earle of Penbrooke was a little before entred to defend it, with three hundred men of armes, beside footmen. Then R. Bruce sent to the earle to come out and giue battell, the earle sent unto him word againe, that he would not fight that daie being sondaie, but vpon the next morow he would satisfie his request. Robert Bruce here vpon withdrew a mile backe from the towne, determining to rest himselfe and his people that night. About euening tide came the earle forth of the towne with his people in order of battell, and assailing his enemies vpon a sudden, slue diuerse yer they could get their armour on their backs. Robert Bruce and others that had some space to arme themselves made some resistance for a while, but at length the Englishmen put them to the worse, so that they were constrained to flee.

The earle following the chase, pursued them euen into Kentish, not resting till he vnderstood that a great number of them were gotten into a castell, which he besieged, in hope to haue found Robert Bruce within it, but he was fled further into the countrie. Howbeit, his wife and his brother Jfigell or Beall, with diuerse other were taken in this castell, and sent in safetie unto Berwike. Also shortly after, the earle of Atholl was taken, being fled out of the same castell. ¶ But some write, that this earle was taken in the battell last remembred, after long fight and great slaughter of Scots, to the number of seven thousand, and also that in the chase, the lord Simon de Friseill was taken, with the bishops of saint Andrew and Glasco, the abbat of Scone, and the said earle of Atholl, named sir John Chambres. The bishops and abbat, king Edward sent unto pope Innocent, with report of their perjurie: but others write, that the foresaid bishops and abbat being taken indeed the same yeare, were brought into England, and there kept as prisoners within sundrie castles.

The wife of Robert le Bruce being daughter to the earle of Ulster, was sent unto the manour of Whitwike, and there honorablie used, hauing a conuenient number of seruants appointed to wait on hir. The earle of Ulster hir father, in the beginning of these last wars, sent unto king Edward two of his owne sonnes to remaine with him, in such wise as he should thinke conuenient, to assure himselfe of him, that he would attempt nothing against the English subjects. Also it was said, that the ladie hir selfe, the same daie hir husband and she should be crowned, said, that she feared they should proue but as a summer king and queene, such as in countrie townes the young folks chole for sport to dance about maipoles. For these causes was she the more courteously used at the kings hands, as reason no lesse required.

It should appeare by Robert Fabian, that the king was present himselfe at this battell: but other asseme, that prince Edward was there as generall and not his father, and that the battell was fought at Dunchell vpon the river of Tay. But neither the Scottish chronicles nor Nicholas Triuet (whom in the hystorie of this king Edward the first, we haue most followed) make any mention, that either the king or prince should be at the foresaid battell, but that the earle of Penbrooke with Robert lord Clifford, and Henrie lord Percie were sent before (as ye haue already heard) with an armie, by whom as appeareth this victorie was obtained, at a place called Methen. After this was the castell of Lochdore taken, and within it Christopher Setton, that had married the sister of Robert le Bruce; and because he was no Scot but an Englishman borne, the king commanded that he should be led unto Dunferme, where he had killed one of the kings knights, and there to be hanged, drawn and quartered.

The wife of this Christopher Setton, he appointed to be kept in the monastrie of Athrell in Lindsey; and the daughter of Robert le Bruce, which was also taken about the same time, was sent to the monastrie of Winton. Moreover, the manour of Setton in Whitebessford he gaue unto the lord Edmund de Spaulley, and those other lands that belonged unto the said Christopher Setton in Northumberland he gaue unto the lord William Latimer. The lands that belonged to the new Scottish king he bestowed in this wise, to Henrie Bohun earle of Hereford, which had married one of king Edwards daughters, he gaue the lordships of Annandale, Hert & Hertines he gaue unto the lord Robert Clifford, sauing alwaies the right yet that belonged to the church of Durham, Totenham, and Totenhamshire; and the maner of Wrothell in the south parts he gaue to other noble men; and the earldome of Carrke which R. Bruce had holden, as by inheritance from his mother, the king gaue to the lord Henrie Percie, the earldome of Atholl he gaue to Rafe de Spontmer earle of Gloucester, who had also married (as before ye haue heard) another of the kings daughters, after the decease of hir first husband Gilbert de Clare earle of Gloucester.

king Robert le Bruce returned south of the fies (into the which he had fled) with manie Irishmen and Scots in his companie, and remained a certeine time in Kentire, he sent certeine of his officers, to leuie and gather up the rents of the fermes due at the feast of saint Martine for such lands and possessions as they held in that countrie, wherof the lord Percie being aduertised, hasted thither; but the new king comming vpon him, slew certeine of his men, toke his horses and plate, with other things, and droue him into a castell, within the which he besieged him, till at length by a power sent from king Edward, Bruce was constrained to depart. The king in this meane time was come to Lauercoft nere to Carleill, and there remained a long time. From thence he sent his iustices vnto Berwik, where they late in iudgement vpon Pigell Bruce, and the other priuoners taken with him, which were condemned to die, and so they were hanged, drowen and quartered. The earle of Atholl was conuied to London, and although he sued for pardon in respect of that he was of kin to the king, yet was he hanged vpon a gibbet higher than all the residue, his bodie burned vnder the same gibbet, and his head first cut off, was set vpon a pole ouer London brdge for example sake that traitors should loke for no pardon.

The elect archbishop of Yorke William Grænefeld was confirmed this yeare by pope Clement the first, at the citie of Lions in France, where the same pope was crowned about the same time, and held his court there, liuing cheslie by the monie which he got of bishops that came to him for their confirmations: he had of the said archbishop of Yorke within one yeare, nine thousand and 500 markes, besides the expences which he was at whilst he late there, and so when this archbishop was returned into England, through pouertie he was driuen to gather monie of the persons, prests, and religious men within his prouince at two sundrie times in one yeare, as first, in name of a courtesie and gracious beneuolence, and the second time by waie of an aid.

Moreouer, pope Clement ordeined Anthonie bishop of Durham, patriarch of Jerusalem, dispensing with him, so as he held still the bishopricke of Durham, notwithstanding his other promotion; and this was, because the bishop was rich, and the pope poore. For this bishop might dispend in yearelie revenues by purchases & inheritances, besides that belonged to his miter, about five thousand marks, and he gaue great rewards to the pope; and to his cardinals, by means whereof he obtained in suit against the priour of Durham, so that he had the charge and oversight of the monastirie of Durham, both the spirituall gouernement and temporall, through informing the pope, that the priour was not able in discretion to rule the house. At his returning home, he caused a crosse of silver and gilt, adorned with an image of the crucifix, to be borne afore him.

But where he appointed certeine persons as his deputies to enter into the priorie of Durham, and to take charge thereof in place of the priour, the monks shut the gates against them, appealing to the pope, and pretending the kings protection, which they had purchased. But those that thus came in the bishops name, accused the monks, & so departed. The king herewith was highlie offended, so that he caused them to answer the matter afore the iustices of his bench, and for their presumption in pronouncing the curse, without making the king priuie to their doings, they were put to their fines. And whereas the bishop was summoned to appeare before the king in person at a certeine daie, he made default, and departing out of the realme, got backe againe to the pope, contrarie to the kings prohibition: whereupon the liberties of the see of Durham were seized into the kings hands, and the king placed his iustices and chancelor there, and in the yeare next ensuing, he executed of the tenants of the archbishopricke, the thirtieth partie of their goods, and otherwise beyed them with sundrie talages.

The conclusion of this matter was this, that the priour was cited by the pope, to appeare at his consistorie, whither he went, hauing the kings letters in his fauour directed to the pope; whereupon, when the pope had examined the matter, and heard the priour speake in his owne person, he perceiued him to be otherwise than he was informed (a sober and discret man) and therefore restored him againe to the gouernment of his house; but he remained in the popes court, till after the kings death, and finally died there himselfe in the yeare 1307. But now to returne to other doings of king Edward. We find, that whilst he lay still at Lauercoft, he gaue to the earle of Marwik Bernards castell, the which he had by escheat, through forfeiture thereof made by John Balioll late king of Scotland. He also toke and seized into his hands Penreth with the appurtenances.

In the octaues of S. Hilarie, the king held a parliament at Carleill, in the which, by the paires of the realme, great complaint was made of the oppressions done to churches, abbeies, and monasteries, by reason of payments latelie raised and tared by one maister William or Guillelmo Tessa the popes chapleine. Commandement therefore was giuen to the same chapleine, that from thenceforth he should not leaue anie such payments; and for further remedie, messengers were made south vnto the pope, to declare vnto him the inconuenience thereof. This Tessa was sent from pope Clement into England with bulles, in the contents whereof it appeared, that the pope had reserved to himselfe the first fruits of one yeares revenues of euerie benefice that fell void by anie manner of meanes within the realme of England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, and likewise of all abbeies, priories, and monasteries; so that it may well be said of him & his retinue, according to the proceesse of all their actions, as it was said of old,

But the king and lords of the land thought it against reason, that the pope should take and receiue the profits of those abbeies and monasteries, which had bene founded by their predecessors for the seruice of God, and the maintenance of almesdeuses, and good hospitalitie to be kept: and so the pope changed his purpose, touching abbeies, but granting to the tenth of the English churches for two yeares, he obtained the first fruits of the same churches for himselfe, as before he required. In the same parliament were statutes made concerning religious men, which had their head and chiefe houses in foreign regions.

There came also at the same time, a cardinall from the pope, named Petrus Hispanus, to procure the consummation of the marriage, betwixt the prince of Wales, and the French kings daughter; for the same was delayed, by reason that all couenants were not kept on the French kings behalfe, touching the deliuerie of the towne in Gascoine. For whereas in times past, the French king had giuen one of those towne that were taken from the Englishmen, named Gauleon, vnto a French knight; he kept the same still, and would not deliuer it now at the French kings commandement, where-through (as was said) the marriage had bene hitherto deferred. The same cardinall by vertue of his bull, would haue had of euerie cathedrall church, college, abbeie, and priorie, twelue marks of sterling monie; and of euerie person of parish churches eight pence of euerie ric marke of his reuenues. But the English clea-gie appealed from this cracion, so that by the king and his counsell it was ordeined, that he should haue no more than in times past cardinall Othobon did receiue, that is to saie, the halfe of his demand. More-ouer, this cardinall being at Carleill, and hauing made a sermon in praise of peace, vpon the conclusion of marriage betwixt the prince of Wales and the French kings daughter, in the end he reuelled himselfe and the other bishops which were present, and then with candels light, and causing the bells to be rung, they accurset in terrible wise Robert Bruce the blasper of the crowne of Scotland, with all his partakers, aiders and maintainers.

After the lesse, Robert Bruce in this meane while slept not his businesse, but ranging abroad in the countrie, sue manie that would not obeye him, and sent forth his two brethren, Thomas that was a knight, and Alexander that was a priest, with part of his armie into an other quarter of the countrie, to al-lure the people vnto his obedience, partlie with gen-tlenesse, and partlie with menaces. But the English men came vpon them in the night and took them both, so that being brought before the iustices they were condemned, and there vpon hanged, broken and quartered. ¶ Some write, that Duncan Pagdoill, a man of great power in Galloway, took these two brethren prisoners, together with Reginald Crawford (being the principall) on the ninth daie of Februarie, as they with certeine other capteins and men of war came by sea, and landed in his coun-trie, vpon whome being seuen hundred men, he with three hundred or few about that number boldlie gaue the onfet, and not onelie took the said three persons prisoners, sore wounded as they were, with diuerse other, but also sue Malcolme Makale a lord of Renfrew, and two Irish lords, whose heads, and the speciall prisoners, he presented vnto king Edward, who caused Thomas Bruce to be hanged, broken and quartered, but the other two were onelie hanged and quartered at Carleill, where their heads were set vp aloft on the castell and gates of the citie.

After Easter their brother Robert Bruce, calling himselfe king of Scotland, and hauing now augmented his armie with manie souldiers of the out-fles, fought with the earle of Denbroke and put him to flight, and sue some of his men though not manie.
Within a few daies after, he chased also the earle of Glocester, into the castell of Aire, and besieged him within the same, till an armie was sent from king Edward to the rescue: for then the said Robert was constrained to fle, and the Englishmen followed, till he got into the woods and marshes, where they might come nere him without manifest danger, so call themselves abwaie. ¶ The king of England, min-ding to make a full conquest of the Scots, and not to leave off untill he had wholie subdued them, sent his commissions into England, commanding all those that ought him seruite, to be redie at Carleill within three weekes after Midsummer. He sent his sonne Edward into England, that vpon knowledge had that the French king did touching the agreement, he might accordingly proceed in the marriage to be made with his daughter.

After the prince was departed from the campe, his father king Edward was taken with sore sick-nesse, yet he remoued from Carleill, where the same sicknesse first took him, vnto Burrough vpon Sand, and there the daie after being the seuenth daie of Julie, he ended his life, after he had reigned 34 yeares, six moneths and one and twentie daies. He liued 68 yeares and twentie daies. His bodie was conueied to London, and in the church of Westminster lieth buried. He had issue by his first wife queene Elianor, four sons, John, Henrie, Alfonso, & Edward which succeeded him, the other died long before their father.

Also five daughters; Elianor, Ione, Margaret, and Elizabeth, were betroved in marriage as before in this booke is expresse: the fifth named Marie became a nunne. By his second wife queene Margaret, he had two sonnes, Thomas of Brotherton, and Edmund of Woodstocke, with one daughter named Margaret after his mother.

He was tall of stature, some what blacke of colour, strong of bodie, and leane, auoiding grolenesse, with continual exercise, of comelie fauour, and iettie eyes, the which when he was angry, would suddenlie become reddish, and same as though they sparkled with fire. The haire of his head, was blacke and curled, he continued for the most part in good health of bodie, and was of a stout stomack, which neuer failed him in time of aduersitie. Moreover, he had an excellent god wit, for to whatsoener he applied his stu-die, he easilie attained to the vnderstanding thereof: wise he was and vertuous, an earnest enemie of the high and presumptuous insolence of priests, the which he iudged to proceed cheslie of too much wealth and riches: and therefore, he deuised to establish the statute of Mortmaine, to be a bzidle to their inopi-nate lusts and riotous excesses. He built the abbey of the vale rofall in Cheshyre, he was a constant friend, but if he once took displeasure or hatred against any person, he would not easilie receiue him into fauour again: whilst he had any vacant time from weigh-tie affaires, he spent lightlie the same in hunting.

Towards the maintenance of his warres and other charges, besides the subsidies which he leuied of his people, and other reuenues comming to his coffers, he had great helpe, by reason of the siluer mines which in his daies were found in Denonshire, and occupied greatlie to his profit, as in the records remaining in the exchequer, concerning the accompts and allowances about the same it doth and may ap-peare. For in the accompts of master William de Williamsham, it is recorded, that betwixt the twelfth daie of August, and the last of October, in the 22 yeare of this king Edwards reigne, there was tried and fined out at Martineston in Denonshire by times, so much of fined siluer, as amounted to the summe of 370 pounds weight, which being brought to London, was there refined by certeine men, that plate might be forged thereof, for the lady Elianor duches of Bar, and daughter to the said king, married in the yeare then last past to the duke of Bar, as he fore ye haue heard.

In the 23 yeare of his reigne, there was fined at the place aforesaid 321 pounds 4 ten shillings weight of siluer by times, which was also brought to London. In the 24 yeare of his reigne, there were taken by 337 miners, within the wapentake of the Beake in Darbithyre, and brought into Denonshire, to work there in those siluer mines, as appears by the allowances demanded by the said master William de Williamsham in his roll of accounts, deliuered that yeare into the exchequer: and there was brought from thence to London the same yeare of siluer fined and cast in wedges 700 four poundes, three shillings, one penie weight. In the 25 yeare of his reigne, there were three hundred and fourtie eight miners brought again out of the Beake into Denonshire, and out of Wales there were brought also 25 miners, which all were occupied about those siluer mines, besides others of the selfe countrie of Denonshire, and other places. Also Wil. de Aulton cleark, keeper of the kings mines in Denonshire and Cornewall, was accountant of the siluer and profits of the kings mines there, from the fourth of March, Anno 26. of his reigne, till the eighteenth of Apill, Anno 27. and yielded by his account, both of the silver and lead.

But now to conclude with this noble prince king Edward the first, he was sure not onely valiant but also politike, labouring to bring this divided Ile, into one entier monarchy, which he went verie nere to haue atchiued, for whereas he was fullie bent to make a conquest of Scotland, in like case as he had already done of Wales, if he had liued any longer time to haue dispatched Robert le Bruce, that onely stood in his waie, it was verie likelie that he should haue found none other to haue raised banner against him about the quarrell or title to the claime of that realme. For as he was a right warlike prince of himselfe, so was he furnished with capitains and souldiers answerable to his desire, who being able to lead and command them of himselfe, had them at length obedient inough to serue him, although (as partlie ye haue heard) some of the peres thelved themselves at times disobedient and stubborne, whom yet in the end he tamed well inough, as the earles of Hereford and Southfolke, the which in the thirtieth yeare of his reigne resigned their castels and manours into his hands, as by the records of the towne it further may appeare.

Now to follow, as in other kings I haue done heretofore for learned men, these I find to haue flourished in this kings daies, Henrie de Henna a Carmelite frier, Godwine the chantor of the church of Salisburie, Adam de Marisco or Maris bozne in Summersethire an excellent diuine as he was reputed in those daies, Gregorie Huntington a monke of Kanesey verie expert in the tonges; Senall archbishop of Poike a man singularly learned and stout in defending the cause of his cleargie against the pope, Haimo de Fenertham, Peter Swanington, Helias Trickingham, Helias de Cuesham, Radulfe Boeking bozne in Suffex, Alfrede surnamed Anglicus, James Cisterciensis, William of Ware, Robert Drenford, Thomas Docking, John surnamed Grammaticus, Robert Dodeford; but the more part of these are rather to be ascribed vnto the time of Henrie the third, the father of this king Edward, where these that follow are thought to flourish in the time of king Edwards reigne, after the deceasse of his father king Henrie, Thomas Spot a chonographer, Peter de Ickeham a Kentishman bozne as Bale thinketh, John Beckton a doctor of both the lawes, William Hanaberge a Carmelite frier, prouinciall gouernour of his order here in England; Robert Kilwarbie bishop of Canturburie, and after made a cardinall and bishop of Portua; Gilbert surnamed Maginus, a monke of the Cisterciur order; Helias Ros, Walter Recluse, Hugh le Cuesham, John Cnerden a writer of annales, whom I haue partlie followed in this kings life; William Bagham, Henrie Clesborne, John de Haida, Roger Bacon a Franciscane frier, an excellent philosopher, and likewise a mathematician, John Derlington a dominike frier, John Chelmeiston, Thomas Worsfale a Southfolke man bozne, Gregorie Cairugent a monke of Glocester a writer of annales, Gregorie de Bedlington, Thomas Bungey a frier minor bozne in Southfolke, an excellent mathematician, prouinciall ruler of his order here in England, he flourished in the daies of king Edward the first, although there were another of the same name that liued in the time of king Edward the third, Hugh de Marchester a Dominike frier, & prouinciall gouernour of his order here in England, Richard Knapwell a Dominike frier, John Beckham bozne in the dioces of Chichester, a Franciscane frier, excellently learned, as by his workes it appeareth, he was advanced by pope Bonozius the third, to the archbishops see of Canturburie; Thomas de Illey a Southfolke man bozne, and a white or Carmelite frier in the house of Cipestolch, Michaele surnamed Scot, but bozne in the bishopricke of Durham (as Leland saith) an excellent physician, and likewise verie expert in the mathematical; Hugh de Newcastell a frier minor, professed in the same towne, Thomas Sutton a blacke frier, that is of the order of S. Dominike, John Kead an historiographer, William de la Mare a frier minor, Thomas Wicke a chanon of Wney in Drenford, Simon de Gaunt, William Hothun, prouinciall of the friers Dominiks in England, John de Hyde a monke of Winchester, Robert Crouch, a corbellier, or a Franciscane frier, Richard Adleton a frier minor, Thomas Spirman a blacke frier, William Adlington a doctor of diuinitie, and a Carmelite frier in Stanford, John Fiberte or Beuer, a monke of Westminster, William Spakelesfeld bozne in Cheshire, in a market towne, whereof he beareth the name, a blacke frier by profession, and an excellent philosopher.

Thus farre Edward the first, surnamed Longshanks.

Caueson.

Edward, the second of that name, the sonne of Edward the first, bozne at Carnaruan in Wales, began his reigne ouer England the seauenth day of Iulie, in the yeare of our Lord 1307, of the world 5273, of the comming of the Barons 847, after the conquest 241, about the tenth yeare of Albert emperor of Rome, and the two and twentieth of the fourth Philip, surnamed Le Beau, as then king of France, and in the third yeare after that Robert le Bruce had taken upon him the crowne and gouernement of Scotland. His fathers corpse was conueied from Burgh upon Sands, unto the abbete of Waltham, there to remaine, till things were readie for the buriall, which was appointed at Westminster.

Within three daies after, when the lord treasurer Walter de Langton bishop of Conventrie and Lichfeld (thorough whose complaint Piers de Caueson had bene banished the land) was going towards Westminister, to make preparation for the saue buriall, he was upon commandement from the new king arrested, committed to prison, and after deliuered to the hands of the said Piers, being then returned againe into the realme, who sent him from castell to castell as a prisoner. His lands and tenements were seized to the kings vse, but his moorables were giuen to the foresaid Piers. Walter Keig-nold that had bene the kings tutor in his childhood, was then made lord treasurer, and after when the see of Worcester was void, at the kings instance he was by the pope to that bishopricke preferred. Also, Rafe bishop of London was deposed from the office of lord Chancellour, and John Langton bishop of Chichester was thereto restored. Likewise, the barons of the exchequer were removed, and other put in their places. And Amerie de Valence earle of Penbroke was discharged of the wardenship of Scotland, and John de Britaine placed in that office, whom he also made earle of Richmond.

But now concerning the demeanour of this new king, whose disordered manners brought himselfe and manie others unto destruction; we find that in the beginning of his gouernement, though he was of nature giuen to lightnesse, yet being restrained with the prudent aduertisements of certeine of his counsellors, to the end he might shew some likelihood of good prouise, he counterfeited a kind of grauitie, betwee and modestie; but yet he could not thoroughlie be so briddled, but that forthwith he began to plaie diuers wanton and light parts, at the first indeed not outrageouslie, but by little and little, and that couertlie. For hauing reuoked againe into England his old mate the said Piers de Caueson, he receiued him into most high fauour, creating him earle of Cornuall, and lord of Span, his principall secretarie, and lord chamberlaine of the realme, thorough whose companie and societie he was suddenly so corrupted, that he burst out into most heinous vices; for then using the said Piers as a procurer of his disordered doings, he began to haue his nobles in no regard, to set nothing by their instructions, and to take small heed vnto the good gouernement of the commonwealth, so that within a while, he gaue himselfe to wantonnes, passing his time in voluptuous pleasure, and riotous excesse: and to helpe them forward in that kind of life, the foresaid Piers, who (as it may be thought, he had sworn to make the king to forget himselfe, and the state, to the which he was called) furnished his court with companies of iesters, ruffians, flattering parasites, musicians, and other vile and naughty ribalds, that the king might spend both daies and nights in iesting, plaieing, banqueting, and in such other filthie and dishonorable exercises: and moreover, desirous to aduance those that were like to him selfe, he procured for them honorable offices, all which notable preferments and dignities, sith they were ill bestowed, were rather to be accounted dishonorable than other wise, both to the giuer and the receiuer, sith

About the thirteenth day of October, a parliament was holden at Westhampton, in the which it was ordeined by the kings appointment, that the coine of his father king Edward should be still currant, notwithstanding the basenesse thereof, as some reputed it, and therefore it was moued in the parliament to haue it disallowed. Also, order was taken for the buriall of his fathers corpse, which was solemnlie conueied from Waltham, and brought to Westminister the seauen and twentieth day of October following, where with all funerall pompe it was interred. Moreover, at the same parliament, a marriage was concluded betwixt the earle of Cornuall Piers de Caueson, and the daughter of Gilbert de Clare earle of Gloucester, which he had by his wife the countesse Joane de Acres the kings sister, which marriage was solemnized on All halloves day next ensuing.

About the two and twentieth of Januarie, the king sailed ouer into France, and at Wallongne in Picardie on the four and twentieth day of Januarie, he did homage to the French king for his lands of Calcoine and Pontieu, and on the morrow after, married Isabell the French kings daughter, and on the twentieth of Februarie he returned with her into England, and comming to London, was iustitie receiued of the citizens, and on the five and twentieth daie of Februarye, being Shrouelundate in the leape yeare, they were solemnly crowned by the bishop of Winchester, because that Robert the archbishop of Canturburie was not as then within the realme.

There was such ptease and throng of people at this coronation, that a knight called Sir John Bakewell alias Blackwell, was thrust or crowded to death. On the day of the circumcision this yeare, a great tempest of thunder and lightning began about euenlong time, that continued the most part of the night following.

On Wednesday after the Epiphanie, the knights templers in England were apprehended all in one day by the kings commandement, upon suspicion of hainous crimes & great enormities by them practised, contrarie to the articles of the christian faith. The order of their apprehension was on this wise. The king directed his writs vnto all and euerye the shirriffes of counties within the realme, that they should giue summons to a certeine number of substantiall persons, knights or other men of god accompt, to be afore them at certeine places within their gouernements, named in the same writs, on the Sunday the morrow after the Epiphanie then next insuing, and that the said shirriffes shoulde not be there the same day in their owne persons, to execute that which in other writs to them directed, and after to be sent, should be contained. The date of this writ was the fiftenth of December.

The second writ was sent by certeine chapleins, in which the shirriffes were commanded upon the opening of the same, forthwith to receiue an oth in presence of the said chapleins, to put in execution all that was therein contained, and not to disclose the contents to any man, till they had executed the same with all expedition, and therewith to take the like oth of those persons, whom by vertue of the first writ they had summoned to appeare afore them. An other writ there was also framed & sent by the same chapleins, by the which the said shirriffes were commanded to attach by their bodies, all the templers within the precinct of their gouernements, and to seise all their lands and goods into the kings hands, together with their writings, charters, deeds, and miniments, and to make thereof a true inuentarie and indenture, in presence of the warden of the place, whether he were brother of that order, or any other, & in presence of honest men being neighbors; of which indenture, one part to remaine in the custodie of the said warden, and the other with the shirriffe, vnder his seale that should so make seisure of the said goods: and further, that the said goods and chattels should be put in safe custodie, and that the quicke goods and cattell should be kept and found of the premisses as should seeme most expedient, and that their lands and possessions should be manured and tilled to the uttermost con-uinitie.

Further, that the persons of the said templers being attached, in manner as before is said, should be safely kept in some competent place out of their owne houses, but not in streight prison, but in such order, as the shirriffes might be sure of them to bring them forth when he should be commanded, to be found in the meane time according to their estate of their owne goods so seised, and hereof to make a true certificat vnto the treasurer and barons of the exchequer, what they had done concerning the premisses, declaring how manye of the said templers they had attached, with their names, and what lands and goods they had seised by vertue of this precept. The date of these two last writs was from Wistec, the 20 of December, and the returne thereof to be made vnto the exchequer, was the morrow after the Purification.
There were writs also directed into Ireland, as we haue there made mention, and likewise vnto John de Wittaine earle of Richmond the lord warden of Scotland, & to Eustace de Cotesbach chamberclene of Scotland, to Walter de Pederton iustice of Westwales, and to Hugh Aldighle alias Audle iustice of Northwales, to Robert Holland iustice of Chester, vnder like forme and maner as in Ireland we haue exprested.

The malice which the lords had conceiued against the earle of Cornewall still increased, the more increased through the high bearing of him, being now aduanced to honour. For being a goodlie gentleman and a stout, he would not once yeeld an inch to any of them, which worthilie procured him great enuie amongst the chiefeest peeres of all the realme, as Sir Henrie Lacie earle of Lincoln, Sir Oue earle of Warwike, and Sir Almer de Valence earle of Den-broke, the earles of Glocester, Hereford, Arundell, and others, which upon such wrath and displeasure as they had conceiued against him, thought it not conuenient to suffer the same any longer, in hope that the kings mind might hapilie be altered into a better purpose, being not altogether conuerted into a benignous disposition, but so that it might be cured, if the corrupter thereof were once banished from him.

Whereupon they assembled together in the parlement time, at the new temple, on Saturday next before the feast of Saint Dunstan, and there ordeined that the said Peers should abiure the realme, and depart the same on the morrow after the Natinitie of Saint John Baptist at the furthest, and not to returne into the same againe at any time then after to come.
To this ordinance the king (albeit against his will) because he saw himselfe and the realme in danger, gaue his consent, and made his letters patents to the said earles and lords, to witnesse the same.

nostri primo.

These letters were read heard, and allowed in the presence of all the noble men of this land, the day and yeare abovesaid. The archbishop of Canturburie, being lately returned from Rome, where he had remained in exile in the late deceased kings daies for a certeine time, did pronounce the said Peers accursed, if he taried within the realme longer than the appointed time, and likewise all those that should aid, helpe, or mainteine him, as also if he should at any time hereafter returne againe into the land. To conclude, this matter was so followed, that at length he was constrained to withdraue himselfe to Bristow, and so by sea as a banished man to saile into Ireland.

The king being sore offended herewith, as he that fauoured the earle more than that he could be without his companie, the atned the lords to be renewed for this displeasure, and ceased not to send into Ireland unto Piers, comforting him both with friend-lie messages, and rich presents, and as it were to the w that he meant to retaine him still in his favour, he made him ruler of Ireland as his deputie there. A wonderfull matter that the king should be so incan-ted with the said earle, and so addia himselfe, or rather fix his hart vpon a man of such a corrupt humoz, against whome the heads of the noblest houses in the land were bent to deuise his overthrow: but the lesse maruell it is that the king bare him such a feruent affection, and set his hart vpon him, considering that vetus auctorum sententia, mores

The lords perceiving the kings affection, and that the treasure was spent as lawleslie as before, thought with themselves that it might be that the king would both amend his passed trade of life, and that Piers being restored home, would rather aduise him thereto, than follow his old maners, considering that it might be well perceived, that if he continued in the incouraging of the king to lewdnesse, as in times past he had done, he could not thinke but that the lords would be readie to correct him, as by pofse he had now tried their meanings to be no lesse. Here-vpon to retaine amitie, as was thought on both sides, Piers by consent of the lords was restored home again (the king meeting him at Chester) to his great comfort and reioysing for the time, although the malice of the lords was such, that such ioy lasted not long.

In the fourth yeare of king Edward was a coun-cell holden at London against the templers, the which counsell induced from the beginning of Aprill, till June. In this counsell they confessed the same, but not the fact of the crimes laid to their charge, except two or thre ribalds that were amongst them: but because they could not cleare themselves, they were adiudged vnto perpetuall penance within certaine monasteries. The king this yeare fearing the enute of the lords against Piers de Caueson, placed him for his more safetie in Wambourgh castell, bearing the prelates and lords in hand, that he had committed him there to prison for their pleasures.

This yeare also there were ordinances made for the state and gouernement of the realme, by the prelates, earles, and barons, which were confirmed with the sentence of excommunication against all them that should go about to breake the same. The king neither allowed of them nor observed them, although he had confirmed them with his seale, and sent them to all cathedrall churches and counties, to be registered in perpetuall memorie thereof. The king indeed was lewdisle led, for after that the earle of Cornwall was returned into England, he shewed himselfe no changeling (as writers do affirme) but through support of the kings favour, bare himselfe so high in his doings, which were without all good order, that he re-med to disdaine all the peeres & barons of the realme.
Also after the old sort he provided the king to all naughtie rule and riotous demeanour, and having the custodie of the kings iewels and treasure, he toke out of the iewel-house a table, & a paire of tresels of gold, which he deliuered vnto a merchant called Aimerie de Fricobald, commanding him to conueie them over the sea into Gascoine. This table was iudged of the common people, to belong sometime vnto king Arthur, and therefore men grudged the more that the same should thus be sent out of the realme.

The king this yeare raised a great power to go into Scotland. And about the feast of the Assumption of our ladie, hauing with him Piers de Caueson earle of Cornwall, and the earles of Gloucester and Warren, he came to Berwik, which towne he caufed to be fortified with a strong wall, and a mightie deepe ditch, and although the other earles would not come to serue him in that vofage, by reason of a new variance risen amongst them, yet he marched forth into Scotland, to seeke his aduersarie Robert le Bruce: but Robert refusing the battell, kept him forth of the waie, so that the king was driuen to returne to Berwik againe, without meeting with his enemie. And he was no sooner come backe, but the said Robert and his people entred into Louthian, for-molesting such as were yeldded to the king of England. The king aduertised therof, followed them, but could doo no good, & so returned. The earle of Cornewall laie at Rockeshourgh, and the earle of Glocester at Roxham to defend those parts. After Can-demasse, the king sent the earle of Cornwall, with two hundred men of armes to St. Johns towne, beyond the Scottish sea, who receiued to the kings peace all those that inhabited beyond that sea vnto the mounteins. The king laie still at Berwik, but the earles of Gloucester and Warren, after the beginning of Lent, rode into the forest of Solkirke, and receiued the foresters & other the inhabitants there to the kings peace. ¶ In this fifth yeare of the kings reigne, but somewhat before this present, in the yeare 1310, Henrie Lacie earle of Lincolne gouernour of England in the kings absence departed this life, in whose place the earle of Gloucester was chosen gounour, and therefore he returned now into England.

This erle of Lincolne was buried in the new worke at Paules. Lieng on his death bed, he requested (as was reported) Thomas earle of Lancaster, who had married his daughter, that in any wise he should stand with the other lords in defense of the commonweith, and to mainteine his quartell against the earle of Cornwall, which request earle Thomas faithfulie accomplished: for by the perswade of him, and of the earle of Warwick cheefle, the said earle of Cornewall was at length taken and beheaded (as after shall appeare.) Some write that king Edward the first vpon his death bed, charged the earles of Lin-colne, Warwick, and Penbrooke, to seeke that the foresaid Piers returned not againe into England, least by his euill example he might induce his sonne the prince to lewdnesse, as before he had alreadie done.

Thomas earle of Lancaster came toward Berwik, to do homage to the king for the earldome of Lincolne fallen to him in right of his wife, now after the deceasse of his father the late earle of Lin-colne. But he was counsellled not to go forth of the realme to the king, so that therevpon rose no small displeasure, and great doubt least there would haue followed civil waies about it. Nevertheless, at length the king was perswaded to come ouer the water vnto Hagerston, foure miles distant from Berwik, and there receiued homage of the earle, and so they continued friends, and for that time departed a-lunder in loving matter. The lords perceiving the mischiefe that dailie followed and increased by that naughtie man (as they took it) the earle of Cornewall, assembled at Lincolne, and there toke counsell together, and concluded estates to banish him out of the realme: and so therevpon shortly after, about Christmasse (as some write) or rather, as other haue, within the quindene of saint Michael, he was criled into Flanders, for against the kings will and pleasure, who made such account of him, that (as appeared) he could not be quiet in mind without his com-panie, & therefore about Canlemasse he estates returned

in Ireland.

Whilomdate at the coronation of Philip sonne to the French king, created that day king of Navarre. John de Wokenford bishop of Bath and Wells was appointed warden of the realme till the kings returne. In Julie the king returned backe from his iourne into France, and landed at Sandwich the mondaie before the feast of S. Margaret, hauing patched his businesse with the French king in good and honorable manner, for his lands and countrie of Gascoigne. About this season Maurice fitz Thomas, and Thomas fitz John married two sisters that were daughters to Richard earle of Gloucester. In this meane time, Robert Bruce recovered the most part of all Scotland, winning out of the English mens hands such castles as they held within Scotland, chasing all the soldiers which late there in garri- son, out of the countrie, and subduing such of the Scots as held on the English part.

King Edward to be reuenged herof, with a mightie armie brauelie furnished, and gorgeously apparel- led, more seemelie for a triumph, than meet to incoun- ter with the cruell enimie in the field, entered Scot- land, in purpose speciallie to rescue the castell of Sterling, as then besieged by the Scottishmen. But at his approaching nere to the same, Robert Bruce was readie with his power to giue him battell. At the which king Edward nothing doubtfull of losse, had he vnto selfe ordered his people, and confounded their ranks, that euen at the first joining, they were not onlie beaten downe and ouerthrowne, by those that coped with them at hand, but also were wound- ed with shot a farre off, by those their enimies which stood behind to succour their fellows when need re- quired, so that in the end the Englishmen fled to saue their liues, and were chased and slaine by the Scots in great number.

The king escaped with a feio about him, in great danger to haue bene either taken or slaine. Many were drowned in a little river called Banockburne, nere to the which the battell was foughten. There were slaine of noble men, Gilbert earle of Gloucester, Robert lord Clifford, the lord Giles Argentine, the lord Ihuane Tiptoth, the lord William Spallhall, the lord Reginald Daincourt, the lord Edmund of Spaulpey the kings stepson, with other lords and barons to the number of 42, and of knights and bar- nets to the number of 67. There were slaine of all sorts vpon the English part that date about ten thou- sand men, ouer and beside the prisoners that were tak- en. Amongst the which were accounted 22 men of name, as the earle of Hereford, the lord John Be- grave, William lord Latimer, Maurice lord Berkeley, and others. He that listeth to heare more of this discomfite may read thereof further at large in the Scottish historie.

The king of England hauing escaped from this battell, which was fought on the summer day in the here aforesaid, came to York, where he held a coun- cell of his lords, to haue their advice by what meane he might best redoe his auaire, and reuenge the losse, which he had susteyned at the hand of his enimie Ro- bert Bruce. And shortly after was Sir Peter Spalding sent into Berwick, with a crew of soldiers to de- fend the towne against the said Bruce, who intended thortie to laie siege to that towne, as the king had certeyne vnderstanding. Also the Scottishmen ad- uanced highlie in their minds for the late gotten vic- torie, passed ouer into Ireland, vnder the conduct of Edward Bruce, the brother of Robert Bruce, lea- uing that countrie, by spoile, rape, and fire, the villages were robbed, the towne and castles which they wane sacked, and after fired, so utterlie to deface them.

assembled togither, and ioined themselves with such Englishmen as late there in garri- sons, curt the which the lord John Bermingham as deputie had the these charge. Thus being ioined togither, they made earnest resistance against the attempts of their en- mies in defence of the countrie. And so by that means they warred and fought one against another, with great slaughter on both sides, the Scottishmen on their part doing their best to obtayne the gouerne- ment of the countrie, hauing already obtained no small portion thereof, and created Edward Bruce king there, and the Irishmen on the other part, in- forcing their whole induer to beat the enimie backe, and to rid him out of the countrie. But at length the inuincible obstinacie of the Irishmen prevailed, through aid of the Englishmen, (as after shall ap- peare.) Presently in the meane while, as some English chronicles make mention, there died of the Scots in these warres to the number of thirtie thou- sand, and aboue fiftene thousand Irishmen.

The Scots not onlie thus invaded Ireland, but also continued their rage against England. For the same yeare about the feast of Peter and Paule, they entered into the bishoppe of Durham, & spo- led the countrie vnto Hartlepole, which towne they robbed of all the goods which they there found, the in- habitants being fled with their ships to the sea. About the ende of the following, the king of Scots entered England with a mightie armie on the west borders, and comming to Carlisle besieged the citie, remain- ing before it ten daies, but they within so valiantlie defended themselves and their walls, that the Scots lost more than they wane, saving that during their abode at this siege, they robbed and wasted the coun- tries of Alledale, Copeland, and Westmerland. The 11 day after their comming thither, when they had assailed all their force and pollicie to win the citie, and saw themselves nothing toperuail, but to lose their men and trauell, they dashed their field, and re- turned into Scotland with dishonour, leaving behind them all their engines of warre, so that besides the dishonour which he sustained by the repulse, in lieu of lurre he suffered losse, and therefore this lesson by ex- emplification would be learned and practised, that

As he who spee generis hinc in inde ferunt Pole as they went their waie, certaine Englishmen following them, took John de Spurre, who in the battell of Redbourn had for his part 13 English knights prisoners, beside squires and others. They took also with him one Robert Berdolf a great enemy of the Englishmen.

This yeare there fell a great great raine and abundance of snow, in the moneths of Julie and Au- gust, that the husbandmen of the countrie could not get in that small crop which then stood on the ground, and that which they sowed, yielded not the hoped quantitie, as when it came to the springing well ap- peared. On the day of the Assumption of our lau- die, John the kings second sonne was borne at Chatham. A knight of Lancashire called Sir Adam Banister raised war in this yeare of king Edward as trigne against his lord the earle of Lancaster, but about the feast of saint Martine he was taken and beheaded. Also this yeare Edward de Bruce bro- ther to the king of Scots, entered into the north parts of Alchester with a great armie, vpon the day of S. Augustine in Maie, and afterwards burnt Dun- dolke, and a great part of Shropshire. The Irishmen so burnt the church of S. Mary in the battell of Conneran in Alchester, Richard earle of Gloucester fled, and Sir Richard Bourgh, Sir John Spandeville, and Sir Alan Fitz Warren were taken prisoners. The castell of Northburgh was also taken, & at Berlis in South the lord Roger Mortimer was discomfited by the foresaid Edward Bruce, and manie of the said

Also in the ninth years of king Edwards reigne, before Whissnalle, a blasing starre or comet appeared in the north part of the element, by the space of a mo-neth together, and after followed dearth and death (as after shall appeare.) Guie earle of Warwike, a man of great counsell and skilfull prouidence, departed this life this yeare, and was buried at the abbey of Woddestre. About Spibsummer the Scots estones entred into England, doing much mischief with fire and sword, in like sort as they had bled to do before time, not sparing (as some write) so much as those houses wherein women late in childbed. At their coming to Richmond, the gentlemen of the countrie that were got into the castell to defend it, compounded with the enemies for a great summe of monie, to spare the towne and countrie about it, without doing further damage thereto at that tountrie.

The Scots hauing received the monie, turned their march toward the west parts, and iournieng threcoze miles, came to Jfourneis, burning all the countrie thereabouts, and toke abwaie with them all the goods and prisoners, both men and women which they might laie hands on, and so returned, retolling most of such iron as they had got in that iournie, for they had great want in Scotland of that kind of me-tall in those daies. The dearth by reason of the unseasonable weather in the summer and harvest last past still increased, for that which with much adoe was in-ned, after when it came to the profe, yielded nothing to the value of that which in thease it seemed to conteine, so that wheat and other graine which was at a lowe price before, now was enhanced to a farre higher rate, the scarcitie thereof being so great, that a quarter of wheat was sold for forty shillings, which was a great price, if we shall consider the allaie of monie then current. Also by reason of the murther that fell among cattell, hedes and muttons were unresolnable prices.

About this season, the lord Henrie Beaumont a man of high valiance and noble courage, hauing gotten together a power of men, entred into Scotland, and after he had taken great booties and spoiles in the countrie, he being intrapped by Sir James Douglas, lost the most part of his men, together with the prey which they had gotten. The displeasure of these mishaps was increased with the naughtyie and bold presumption of Sir Gilbert Spibleton knight, who being offended that maister Lewes Beaumont was preferred unto the bishops see of Durham, and Henrie Stamford put from it, that was first elected and after displaced by the kings suit made unto the pope, toke the said Lewes Beaumont and his brother Henrie on Wingleston more nere unto Darlington, leading the bishop to Spar-path, and his brother the lord Beaumont into the castell of Spibford, and so deteined them as prisoners, till they had redemed their libertie with great sums of monie. Here with the said Sir Gilbert being advanced in pride, proclaimed himselfe duke of York thumberland, and joining in friendship with Robert Bruce the Scottish king, cruelly distressed the coun-tie of Richmond with such traitorous parts. While aim frilton, and Thomas Petre being not a little frighted, first went by force the castell of Spibford, and after apprehended Sir Gilbert Spibleton, with his companion Walter Selbie, and sent them up to London, where shortly after they were againe hanged and quartered.

Some write that the said Sir Gilbert was put to death for robbing two cardinals, to wit, Warwike the popes chancellore, and Lucas de Wylton, that were sent from pope John the thownd twentieth, to consecrate the foresaid Lewes Beaumont bishop of Durham, and to intreat a peace betwixt the realms of England and Scotland, and also to make an agreement betwixt the king and the earle of Lancaster. The which being met with upon Wingleston more in Yorkshire by the said Gilbert, were robbed of such stuffe & treasure as they brought with them, but yet escaped themselves and came to Durham, and from thence sent messengers to Robert Bruce, to perswade him to some agreement. But whereas he would not condescend to any reasonable conditions of peace at that time, they determined to go into Scotland to talke with him themselves: but before they came to the borders, king Robert, who iudged it not to stand with his profit to haue any peace in that season, sent certeine of his people to forbid the cardinals the entrie of his realme. The cardinals being thus inturionable handled, pronounced the Scots by their legantine power accursed; and interdicted their whole realme. And because they saw nothing lesse than any hope to do good with king Robert touching any composition or agreement to be had, they returned againe to the pope, without any conclusion of that for the which they were sent.

After that Edward Bruce had atchined such enterprises in other parts of Ireland, as in the last yere we haue heard, he went unto Ffenath, and to Skeres in Leinster, and there the lord cheefe iustice Edmund Butler rose against him, with the lord John fitz Thomas, that was after erle of Kildare, Sir Arnold Butler, and diuerse other, with a great armie.
But by reason of discord that chanced amongst them, they scaled their armie, and departed out of the field on the 26 date of February. Edward Bruce then burned the castell of Leis, and after returning into Ulmeffer, he besieged the castell of Knockfergus, and due Thomas Spandensle, and his brother John, at a place called Dowon, as they came thither out of England. After this the foresaid Edward returned into Scotland.

In this season vittels were so scant and deere, and wheat and other graine brought to so high a price, that the poore people were constrained thorough famine to eat the flesh of horses, dogs, and other ville beasts, which is wonderfull to beleue, and yet for default there died a great multitude of people in di-uers places of the land. Fourre pence in bread of the countie of York would not suffice one man a daie. Wheat was sold at London for foure marks the quarter and aboue. When after this dearth and scarcitie of vittels insued a great death and mortallitie of people, so that that by warre of the Scots, and that by this mortallitie and death, the people of the land were wonderfullie waied and consumed. A pittifull depopulation!

Edward Bruce before the feast of Easter returned againe into Ireland, with the earle of Murray and other noble men of Scotland, hauing with them a great armie, and besieged the castell of Knockfer-gus, and after they went to another castell where they took a Baron prisoner: & there Edward Bruce late for a season. Also Richard earle of Ulmeffer lay in saint Patricks abbey by Dublin, where the maior and commonaltie of the cite toke him, and put him in prison within the castell of Dublin. They also dne his men, and spoiled the abbey. After this the foresaid Edward Bruce went to Lincolne, after the feast of saint Patthe the apostle, and there sojourned till Easter was past.

In the meane while Roger de Mortimer the kings deputie herked at Waterford with a great armie, by reason wherof Edward Bruce for feare departed, and got him into the uttermost parts of Ulme-ffer, and John fitz Thomas was made earle of Kildare.

dare. Also Decore of Conneigh, and manie other Irishmen of Cor nagh and Meth were slaine nere to Arie by the Englishmen of those parts. There was a great slaughter also made of the Irishmen nere unto Whiffildermote, by the lord Edmund Butler, and an other also at Balteham of Dmoyth by the same Edmund. The lord deputie deliuered the earle of Wlnester out of prison, and after Whiffuntide banished out of Meth sir Walter Lacie, and sir Hugh Lacie, giuing their lands awaie from them unto his knights, and they went ouer into Scotland with Edward Bruce, who returned thither about that time.
The death still increased as by some writers it should appeare.

In the elcuenth yeare of king Edward the second his reigne, upon the saturday night before Midlent sundaye, the towne of Berwtike was betrayed to the Scots, through the treason of Peter Spalding. The castell held good tache a while, till for want of vittels they within were constrained to deliuer it into the Scotishmens hands, who wan also the same time the castell of Harbottell, Wlcker, and Medford, so that they possessed the more part of all Northumberland, euen unto Newcastle upon Tyne, sauing that certaine other castles were defended against them. In Maye they entred with an armie further into the land, burning all the countrie before them, till they came to Alton, which towne they spoiled, and tarieng there thre daies, they receiued a thousand marks of those that were got into the church, and defended it against them, for that they should spare the towne, and not put it to the fire, as they had already done the townes of Northalerton and Bourghbridge as they came forwarde. In their going backe they burnt Barnesburgh, and Skipton in Crauen, which they had first sacked, and so passing through the midst of the countrie, burning and spoiling all before them, they returned into Scotland with a marvellous great multitude of cattell, beside prisoners, men and women, and no small number of poore people, which they toke with them to helpe to dyne the cattell.

In the 12 yeare of Edward the seconds reigne, in August, the king and the earle of Lancaster came to talke together in a plaine beside Leicester, where they were made friends to the outward shew, so that in the yeare next following, the said earle went with the king to the siege of Berwtike. About the feast of the Ascension of our ladie, the two cardinals, which were yet remaining in England, sent forth com-mandements unto all the prelates and priests within the realme, that thre times in euery solemne masse, they should renounce Robert Bruce that called himselfe king of Scotland accursed, with all his counsellors and fauours, and on the behalfe of the pope, they deposed him by denunciation of all honour, and put all his lands vnder interdiction, disabling all their children [to the second degree] that held with him, as hypochrite & usit to receiue, or take vpon them any ecclesiasticall function. They denounced also all the prelates of Scotland, and men of religion, exempt, and not exempt, excommunicate and accursed.

The lord Roger, Mortimer returned againe into England, and Alexander, King of Scots, was made there knight of Ireland. The said Edward Bruce, with sir Walter and sir Hugh Lacie, bringing with them a great armie, returned out of Scotland, and arrived at Dundalk, on the day of saint Calixt the pope.
But nere to the same place sir John Bellingham, Richard Lute, and Giles of Winton, with a power of 1200 men incountred them, and slay the said Edward Bruce, and about the number of 100 men, or (as other haue) but 70. The said sir John Bellingham brought the head of Edward Bruce ouer into England, and presented it to the king.

Whereupon the king in recompense of his seruice, gaue vnto him the earldome of Aouth, to hold to him and his heires males, and the baronie of Athird to him and his heires generally.

About this season, or somewhat before, about the summer (as Southwell saith) a naughtie fellow called John Woidas, or (as some books haue) Ponderham, a tanners son of Cresser comming to Drford, and there thrusting himselfe into the kings hall that stood without the wals, gaue forth that he was sonne and right heire of king Edward the first, and that by means of a false nurse he was stolne out of his craddle, and this Edward the second being a carter son was brought in and laid in his place, so that he by reason thereof was afterwards hardlie fostered and brought vp in the north part of Wales. At length being laid for, he fled to the church of the white friers in Drford, trusting there to be safe through the immuni-tie of the place, because king Edward the first was their founder. But when he could not keepe his tong, but still fondlie uttered his follie, and stood in his opinion, so that great rumour thereof was raised, he was at length taken out of that church, & caried to North-hampton, where he was there arraigned, condemned, and had forth to a place in the countrie called the copped oke, where he was drawne, hanged, and as a traitour botvelled. At the houre of his death he confessed, that in his house he had a spirit in likenesse of a cat, which amongst other things assured him that he should be king of England.

In this season, to wit, in the yeare 1219, a great murder and death of cattell chanced through the whole realme, spreading from place to place, but spe-ciallie this yeare it reigned most in the north, where as in the yeares before it began in the south parts.
The king desirous to be reuenged of the Scots, made preparation to leue a nightie armit, and for want of sufficient numbers of men in other places towards the north parts, the king caused much people to come vnto him out of the south and east parts of the realme, amongst the which the citie of London was constrained to send at their costs and charges two hundred men, sending them to Poike, where the generall assemble of the armie was made. From thence, after he had receiued his men from sundrie countries and good townes of his realme, he went to Berwtike, & laid siege to the towne. In which meane time the Scots being assembled, came to the boy-ders, passed by the English host, and entering into England, came in secret wise to the north into the marshes of Pockesfure, and there slay the people, and robed them in most cruel wise.

Wherefore the archbishop of York, meaning in time of such necessitie to do his endeour in defense of his countrie, assembled such power as he could get together, of clerkes, monks, canons, and other spirituall men of the church, with husbandmen and such other brabst people for the warres, and thus with a great number of men, and with warlike or discreet chefe men, he together with the bishop of Elie, as then lord chamberlaine, came forth against the Scots, and incountred them at a place called Spittot byon Swale, the thirteenth day of October. Here as the Englishmen compassed about the head of Swale, the Scots setting upon certaine Englishmen, the smoke where of was so thicke, that the Englishmen might not perceiue the Scots. And when the Englishmen were once got ouer the water, the Scots came upon them with a living in god order of battell, first charging the Englishmen with their long speares, then with the bowes, and lastly with the swordes, and great resistance was that there, many slaine to the number

dare. Also Drconer of Conneigh, and manie other Irishmen of Cor nagh and Besh were slaine nere to Aurie by the Englishmen of those parts. There was a great slaughter also made of the Irishmen nere unto Whilidermote, by the lord Edmund Butler, and an other also at Balteham of Dmogh by the same Edmund. The lord deputie deliuered the earle of Wlneffer out of prison, and after Whitsuntide banished out of Besh sir Walter Lacie, and sir Hugh Lacie, giuing their lands awaie from them unto his knights, and they went ouer into Scotland with Edward Bruce, who returned thither about that time. The death still increased as by some writers it should appear.

In the eleuenth peare of king Edward the second his reigne, upon the saturday night before Wholent funde, the towne of Berwike was betrayed to the Scots, through the treason of Peter Spalding. The castell held good tache a while, till for want of vittels they within were constrained to deliuer it into the Scottishmens hands, who wan also the same time the castell of Harbottell, Wlker, and Medford, so that they possessed the moze part of all Northumberland, euen unto Newcastell upon Tyne, sauing that certeine other castels were defended against them. In Maye they entred with an armie further into the land, burning all the countrie before them, till they came to Alpon, which towne they spoiled, and tarieng there thre daies, they receiued a thousand marks of those that were got into the church, and defended it against them, so that they should spare the towne, and not put it to the fire, as they had already done the townes of Northalerton and Bourghbridge as they came forwards. In their going backe they burnt Linarshourgh, and Skipton in Crauen, which they had first sacked, and so passing through the middle of the countrie, burning and spoiling all before them, they returned into Scotland with a marvellous great multitude of cattell, beside prisoners, men and women, and no small number of poze people, which they toke with them to helpe to drue the cattell.

In the 12 peare of Edward the seconds reigne, in August, the king and the earle of Lancaster came to talke together in a plaine beside Leicester, where they were made friends to the outward shew, so that in the peare next following, the said earle went with the king to the siege of Berwike. About the feast of the Ascension of our ladie, the two cardinals, which were yet remaining in England, sent forth com mandements unto all the prelates and priests with in the realme, that thre times in euery solemne masse, they should denounce Robert Bruce that called himselfe king of Scotland accursed, with all his counsellors and fauours, and on the behalfe of the pope, they depriued him by denunciation of all honours, and put all his lands under interdictiō, disabling all their children [to the second degree] that held with him, as being this & built to receiue. As take upon them any ecclesiasticall function, they denounced also all the prelates of Scotland, and men of religion, exempt, and not exempt, excommunicate and accursed.

The lord Roger Mortimer returned againe into England, and Alexander, his son, was made chiefe of Ire land. At this Edward Bruce, with sir Walter and sir Hugh Lacie, bringing with them a great armie, returned out of Scotland and arrived at Dundalk, on the day of saint Calixtus the pope. But nere to the same place sir John Belingham, Richard Cote, and Miles of Winton, with a power of 1200 men encountered them, and slue the said Edward Bruce, and shew the number of his men, or (as other haue) but 800. The said sir John Belingham brought the head of Edward Bruce ouer into England, and presented it to the king. Whereupon the king in recompense of his seruice, gaue unto him the earledome of Louth, to hold to him and his heires males, and the baronie of Athird to him and his heires generall.

About this season, or some what before, about the summer (as Southwell saith) a naughtie fellow called John Doidras, or (as some books haue) Dunderham, a tanners son of Wycoffer comming to Drford, and there thrusting himselfe into the kings hall that stood without the wals, gaue forth that he was sonne and right heire of king Edward the first, and that by means of a false nurse he was stolne out of his cradle, and this Edward the second being a carters son was brought in and laid in his place, so that he by reason thereof was afterwards hardlie fastened and brought by in the north part of Wales. At length being laid for, he fled to the church of the white friers in Drford, trusting there to be safe through the immunity of the place, because king Edward the first was their founder. But when he could not keepe his tongue, but still fondlie uttered his follie, and stood in his opinion, so that great rumour thereof was raised, he was at length taken out of that church, & caried to Northampton, where he was there arreigned, condemned, and had forth to a place in the countrie called the copped oke, where he was dratone, hanged, and as a traitour bowelled. At the houre of his death he confessed, that in his house he had a spirit in likenesse of a cat, which amongst other things assured him that he should be king of England.

In this season, to wit, in the peare 1319, a great murdaine and death of cattell chanced through the whole realme, spreading from place to place, but especially this peare it reigned most in the north, where as in the yeares before it began in the south parts. The king desirous to be reuenged of the Scots, made preparation to leue a mightie armie, and for want of sufficient numbers of men in other places towards the north parts, the king caused much people to come unto him out of the south and east parts of the realme, amongst the which the citie of London was constrained to find at their costs and charges two hundred men, sending them to Poike, where the generall assemble of the armie was made. From thence, after he had receiued his men from sundrie countreies and good townes of his realme, he went to Berwike, & laid siege to the towne. In which meane time the Scots being assembled, came to the borders, passed by the English host, and entring into England, came in secret wise to the marches of Pokeshire, and there slue the people, and robbed them in most cruel wise.

Wherefore the archbishop of Poike, meaning in time of such necessity to do his indubitable in defence of his countie, assembled such power as he could get together, of clerkes, monks, canons, and other spiritual men of the church, with husbandmen and such other trust people for the warres, and thus with a great number of men, and with warlike or discreet chiefe men, he together with the bishop of Ely, as then lord chancellor, came forth against the Scots, and encountered them at a place called Spittell upon Dunbar, the thirtieth day of October. Here as the Englishmen passed dur the river of Swale, the Scots set on upon them with such hate, the noble knights of the king, that the Englishmen might not stirre the Scots, and when the Englishmen were once got ouer the river, the Scots came upon them with a wing in god order of battell, in which they were slaine, and all the king's entrees, who for lack of good government, were easily betrayed, and thus discomfited, without the wing and great resistance, so that there were slaine to the number number of two thousand and the residue shamefullie put to flight.

The archbishop, the lord chancellor, and the abbat of Selbie, with helpe of their swift hories escaped, and diuerse other. The maior of Poike named Nicholas Fleming was slaine, & sir William Dremyn preest taken prisoner. Manie were drowned, by reason that the Scots had gotten betwixt the Englishmen and the bridge, so that the Englishmen fled betwixt that wing of the Scots and their maine battell, which had compassed the Englishmen about on the one side, as the wing did vpon the other. And because so manie spirituall men died in this battell, it was after named of manie writers The white battell. The king of England informed of this overthrow giuen by the Scots to the Boztherne men, he brake vp his siege incontinentlie, and returned to Poike.

Thus all the kings exploits by one means or other quailed, and came but to euill successe, so that the English nation began to grow in contempt by the infortunate government of the prince, the which as one out of the right waie, rashlie and with no good aduise ment ordered his doings, which thing so greued the noblemen of the realme, that they studied day and night by what means they might procure him to loke better to his office and dutie; which they iudged might well be brought to passe, his nature being not altogether euill, if they might find shift to remove from him the two Spenfers, Hugh the father, and Hugh the sonne, who were gotten into such fauour with him, that they onelie did all things, and without them nothing was done, so that they were now had in as great hatred and indignation (sith linor non deerit iniquum

Dulcibus et letis, qui se confundat amarum) both of the lords and commons, as euer in times past was Peters de Cauxton the late earle of Cornuall. But the lords minded not so much the destruction of these Spenfers, but that the king ment as much their advancement; so that Hugh the sonne was made high chamberleine of England, contrarie to the mind of all the noblemen, by reason whereof he bare himselfe so haucie and proud, that no lord within the land might gainsaie that which in his conceit seemed good.

In this thirteenth yeare of his reigne, in June king Edward went ouer into France, where at Amiens he found the French king, of whome he received the countie of Pontieu, which the said French king vpon his coming to the crowne had seized into his hands, because the king of England had not done to him his homage due for the same. Also this yeare the pope granted to the king of England the tenth of ecclesiasticall reuenues for one yeare, as before that time he had likewise done. About this season, pope John, being informed of the great destruction and vnnecessfull warre which the Scots made vpon the Englishmen, and namelie for that they spared neither church nor chapel, abbey nor priory, he sent a generall sentence vnder his bulles of lead vnto the archbishop of Cantuarburie and Poike, appointing them that if Robert le Bruce the Scottish king would not recompense king Edward for all such harmes as the realme of England had by him suffered, and also make restitution of the goods that had bene taken out of churches and monasteries, they should pronounce the same sentence against him and his accomplices.

Wherevpon when the Scots toke no regard to the popes admonition, the archbishop proceeded to the pronouncing of the foresaid sentence, so that Robert Bruce, James Douglas, and Thomas Randolph earle of Murray, and all other that kept him company, or them in any wise maintained, were accursed throughout England euerie day at masse three times. Notwithstanding this nothing holpe the matter, but put the king and the realme to great cost and charge, and in the meane season the commons of the realme were sore oppressed by sundrie waies and means, diuerse of them lost their goods and possessions, being taken from them vpon surmised and feined quarrels, so that manie were vtterlie vndone, and a few singular and misordered persons were aduanced.

After the Epiphanie, when the truce failed betwixt the two realmes of England and Scotland, an armie of Scots entred England, and came into the bishoprike of Durham. The earle of Murray staid at Darlington, but James Douglas and the steward of Scotland went forth to waste the countie, the one towards Hartlepole and Cleueland, and the other towards Richmond: but they of the countie of Richmond (as before they had done) gaue a great summe of monie to saue their countie from inuasion. The Scots at that time remained within England by the space of fiftene daies or more. The knights and gentlemen of the north parts did come vnto the earle of Lancaster that laie the same time at Donstret, offering to go forth with him to glue the enemies battell, if he would assist them: but the earle seemed that he had no lust to fight in defense of his prince, that sought to oppresse him wrongfullie (as he toke it) and therefore he dissembled the matter, and so the Scots returned at their pleasure without encounter.

About this season, the lord William de Bruce that in the marches of Wales enioied diuerse faire possessions to him descended from his ancestors, but through want of good gouernement was run behind hand, offered to sell a certeine portion of his lands called Gowers land lieng in the marches there, vnto diuerse noble men that had their lands adjoining to the same, as to the earle of Hereford, and to the two lords Spottimers, the uncle & nephue, albeit the lord Spottimaie that had married the onelie daughter and heire of the lord Bruce, thought verelie in the end to haue had it, as due to his wife by right of inheritance. But at length (as vnhap would) Hugh Spenfer the yonger lord chamberleine, coueting that land (because it lay nere on each side to other lands that he had in those parts) found such means through the kings furtherance and helpe, that he went awaie with the purchase, to the great displeasure of the other lords that had bene in hand to buie it.

Hereby such hart burning rose against the Spenfers, that vpon complaint made by the erle of Hereford vnto the earle of Lancaster, of their presumptuous dealing, by ruling all things about the king as seemed best to their likings, it was thought expedient by the said earles that some remedie in time (if it were possible) should be prouided. Wherevpon the said earles of Lancaster and Hereford, with the lords Roger Luchet, Roger Clifford, Jocelin Deieuille, Roger Bernfield, the two Spottimers, Roger the uncle and Roger the nephue, William de Soulie, William de Elmbrige, John Clifford of Barmesfield, and Henrie Cleis, all barons; the which with diuerse other lords and knights, and men of name, assembling together at Shierborne in Elmcdone, swore each of them to stand by other, till they had amended the state of the realme: But yet notwithstanding this their oath, the most part of them afterwards forsaking the enterprise, submitted themselves to the king.

Nevertheless, whether for that the king by a proclamation set forth the sixteenth of March, had commanded (as some write) that the lords Spottimaie, Clifford,

Clifford, and De la Zouche for disobeysing to make their personall appearance before him, should avoide the land within ten daies next ensuing, or for that they meant with all speed to put their enterprise in execution, we find that the earle of Hereford, the lords Spontimer, the uncle and nephew, the lord Roger Damorie, the lord John Spoltwraie, the lord Hugh Audelie, and his sonne named also Hugh, the lord Clifford, the lord John Gifford of Wymsheld, the lord Spozice Berkely, the lord Henrie Ties, the lord John Patrauers, with manie other that were alied together, having the consent also of the earle of Lancaster, on the Wednesday next after the feast of the Invention of the crosse, having with them to the number of eight hundred men of armes, five hundred hoblers, and ten thousand men on foot, came with the kings banner spread unto Melport in Wensloks lands, where they toke the castell that belonged unto the lord chamberleine Hugh Spenser the younger.

The lords take armes upon them against the Spensers.

They invade the Spensers lands.

They also toke Kaerdie, Kerillie, Lantrellane, Caluan, Lambethian, Benesegis, Speoth, Wuslelan, and Diuenoz; part of his men which in the foresaid places they found, they slew, as sir John Swain, and sir Mattheu de Gorges knights, with 15 other of his men that were Welshmen: part they toke and put them in prison, as sir Rafe or Rantulle de Gorges being sore wounded, sir Philip Joice, sir John de Frisingfield, sir John de Dunsfable, William de Dunsfable, and manie other, of the which the most part were put to their ransom. They toke, spoiled and destroyed so much in value of his goods as amounted unto two thousand pounds. They toke up in such debts as were owing to him in those parts, to the summe of three thousand pounds, and of his rents to the value nere hand of a thousand pounds. They burnt 23 of his manors which he had in those parts of Wales, with his barnes, and did what hurt they could devise, burning or taking aboate all his writings and evidences. After they had remained 15 daies there, they came into England, with the like force and disorder invading his castles, manors and possessions, so that the damage which they did here unto the said lord chamberleine, amounted to the value of ten thousand pounds.

The king sendeth to the lords.

The lord Badelmeire is contrary to the king.

The king advertised of their doings, sent unto them the archbishop of Canturburie, and the lord Bartholomeu de Badelmeire lord steward of his house, to request them to desist and leaue off from such their outrageous doings, and comming to the parliament which he had already summoned, they might put in their complaints and grievances, & he would see that they should have iustice, according as equitie should require. The lord Badelmeire forsaking the king, became one of the confederacie with the barons, and so the archbishop was glad to returne alone, leaving the L. Badelmeire behind him, who sent the king word by the archbishop, that till they had expelled the Spensers out of the realme, they would not give over their enterprise. On saint Barnabie's day they came to a manour of Hugh Spenser the father called Ffaserne, in the countie of Wiltshire, and spoiled the same with diuerse and manie other manors, as well in Wiltshire, as elsewhere, to wit, in Gloucestershire, Dorsetshire, Hamshire, Berkeshire, Oxfordshire, Buckinghamshire, Surrie, Cambridgeshire, Huntingdonshire, Leicestershire, Lincolnshire, Cheshire, and Warwickshire, making such haucke of all such goods or cattell as belonged to the said Hugh Spenser the father; that he was thought to be indamaged to the value of thirtie thousand pounds, burning his houses, beating, maiming and ransoming his men.

Furthermore not contented to spoile those places which belonged to him, but hearing that in the abbey of Stanlie he had laid by monie and evidences, they brake into that abbey, and toke out there of a thousand pounds in readie coine, beside evidences and writings, to the indamaging of him to the value of six thousand pounds, and likewise entering into the castell of Sparteburgh, where the said Hugh Spenser the father had laid by in wolle to the number of 36 sacks, they toke the same and other of his goods, as well in plate as apparell, to the value in all of six thousand pounds. And they did not onelie spoile the possessions, houses, goods, and cattels of the two Spensers, wherefoer they could heare that the same were to be found, but also they used the like disorder against all such as were knowne to be friends or wellwillers, to either the father or sonne, sending commissions unto such as should see the same executed to the most extrenitie, so that in this rage of enuie and hot reuenge there was no parcialitie, but that one with another, the innocent with the nocent, the guiltlesse with the guiltie went to wracke, and as the old proverbe saith concurring with common practise finallie, after they had satisfied their desires in such riotous sort, they raised the people, and constrained them to sweare to be of their accord, and so came forward with the like force towards the parliament that was summoned to be holden at London three weeks after Midsummer. At their comming to S. Albons, they sent the bishops of London, Salisburie, Ely, Hereford, and Chichester, to the king with their humble suit in outward apperance, though in effect and vertue more presumptuous than was requisite. Their cheefe request was that it might please his highnesse to put from him the Spensers, whose commission they knew to be greatlie against his honour, and hercof not to faile if he tendered the quiet of his realme. They also required letters patents of him, containing a generall pardon for the indemnitie of themselves, and all those that had bene in armes with them, so as they should not be impeached by the king for any transgressions past or present, in time hereafter to come.

The king hereunto answered, that as concerning Hugh Spenser the father, he was abroad on his business beyond the seas, and that Hugh the sonne was on the sea for the safe keeping of the cinque ports, as by his office he was bound, and that they ought not by any right or custome to be banished, before they haue made answer to the crimes objected against them. He added further, that their request wanted foundation of law and reason. And if it might be proued that the Spensers had in any wise offended against the statutes and ordinances of the land, they were alwaies ready to make their answer as the lawes of the realme should require. Lastlie he added this with surplusage, that he would not be so succour contrary to that which at his coronation he had taken upon him by oath through granting letters of peace and pardon to such notorious offenders in contempt of his person, and to the trouble and dishonouring of the whole realme.

The barons upon knowledge had what answer the king made to their request, wherewith got them to armour, and with a great power of men of armes and other, came to the parliament, which the king had summoned to begin at Westminster three weeks after Midsummer. Their retinue were appareled in a suite of habergeons coats of colours, some in purple, some in red, some in blue, some in green, with a band of white all over them. By reason thereof, that parliament long after was called The parliament of white bards. When the kings peace kept within the citie, the barons caused a thousand men well armed to watch within the citie wards, & at diuerse gates of the citie, which watch watch began at foure of the clocke in the morning, and so continued till six at night, and then as manie were appointed to the night watch, continuing the same till the houre of five in the morning. And for the more surtite that this night watch should be well and sufficientlie kept, two aldermen were assigned nightlie to ride about the citie with certeine officers of the towne, to see the watchmen well and discretlie guided. The gates were shut at nine of the clocke & opened againe at seaven in the morning. Also euerie citizen was warned to haue his armour by him, that he might be readie vpon anie occasion when he should be called.

Man. V. Vell.

The Spensers banished by the decree of the barons.

Neuertheless the barons being come in forceable wise (as ye haue heard) vnto this parlement, they constrained the earle of Richmond, Arundell, Waterren, and Denbroke, to agree vnto their purpose; and likewise some of the bishops they compelled through feare to take an oth to ioine with them in their purpose, for the expelling of the Spensers out of the realme, and so committing all together before the king, they published certeine articles against the said Spensers, both the father and sonne, whereupon they made an award, that they should be disherited and banished the land during their liues, if by the king and consent of all the lords in parlement assembled, they should not be reffozed. They had day and place appointed where to passe forth of the land, to wit, at Douer, and not elsewhere, betwixt the daie of his award made, and the feast of the decollation of saint John Baptist, that day to be counted for one. Divers articles (as before is said) were laid to the charge of those Spensers.

Articles wherewith the barons charged the Spensers.

Amongst other things it was alledged; first that Hugh Spenser the sonne, being on a time angry and displeased with the king, sought to alie and confederate himselfe with the lord Gifford of Wymestresh, and the lord Richard Gray to haue constrained and forced the king by strong hand to haue followed his will and pleasure.

Secondlie it was alledged, that the said Spensers as well the father as the sonne, had caused the king to ride into Gloucestershire, to oppresse and deströie the good people of his land, contrarie to the forme of the great charter.

Thirdlie, that where the earle of Hereford, and the lord Mortimer of Wigmore, had gone against one Chlewillin Bren, who had raised a rebellion against the king in Glamorganshire, whiles the lands of the earle of Gloucester were in the kings hands, the same Chlewillin yielded himselfe to the said earle, and to the lord Mortimer, who brought him to the king, vpon promise that he should haue the kings pardon, and so the king receiued him. But after that the said earle and lord Mortimer were out of the land, the Spensers taking to them rofall power, toke the said Chlewillin and led him vnto Bardif, where after that the said Hugh Spenser the sonne, had his purpartie of the said earle of Gloucesters lands, he caused the said Chlewillin to be dratoned, beaped and quartered, to the discredit of the king, and of the said earle of Hereford and lord Mortimer, yea, and contrarie to the lawes and dignitie of the imperiall crowne.

Fourthlie, the said Spensers counselled the king to forswage sir Hugh Audley, sonne to the lord Hugh Audley, and to take into his hands his castles and possessions. They compassed also to haue atteinted the lord Roger Damorie, that thereby they might haue entred the whole earldome of Gloucester.

These and other articles of misdemeanour in the Spensers were exhibited, to perswade the king and others, that they were vnprofitable members in the common-wealth, and not worthy of those places which they occupied. So after that their disheriting and banishment was concluded in manner as before is said, the earle of Hereford and other the lords that had prosecuted the quarell against them, came before the king, and humbly on their knees besought him of pardon for all things which they had committed against him, his lawes, or any other person in the pursuit of the said Spensers. The king, being brought into a streit, durst not but grant vnto all that which they requested, establishing the same by statute.

The parlement being thus ended, the king and quene went to Canturburie, there to visit the shrine of Thomas Becket sometime archbishop there. From thence he went to the Ile of Tenet, that he might meet with his deare & welbeloued counsellour Hugh Spenser the yonger, whome he had of late sent in ambassage vnto the French king, and now being returned by sea into those parts, he was desirous to see him, that he might haue conference with him: and so continuing together, they spent certeine daies in communing of such matters as they thought good. The king calling to him the mariners of the cinque ports, committed to them the custodie of the said Hugh, who for a time kept him with them in their ships, and the king sailing alongst the coast to Doverchester, conferred with him of manie things.

From Doverchester the king ment to returne vnto London, there to meet the quene, who in hir returne from Canturburie would haue lodged one night in the castell of Leeds, which the lord Bartholome de Badelismere late steward of the kings house had by exchange of the king for other lands, and now taking part with the barons, had left his wife and children with other of his friends and treasure in the same castell. Those that were put in trust with keeping this castell, would neither permit quene nor other to enter therein, without expresse commandement from their lord and master, and so they signified not one lie to the quenes seruants that came before to make prouision for hir, but also declared the same to hir selfe coming thither in person.

This chanced verie vnluckilie for the barons: for where the quene had euer sought to procure peace, lone and concord betwixt the king and his lords, she toke such displeasure with this deniall made to hir for one nights lodging in that castell, that vpon hir greuous complaint sent to the king, he forthwith raised a mightie armie out of Kent and Essex, from the cinque ports, and of the Londoners, and hauing with him his brethren, Thomas earle of March, and Edmund earle of Kent, also the earls of Richmond, Denbroke, Arundell, and Athol, he halsted thither, & laid siege about the castell: constraining them within by all meanes that might be deuised.

In the meane time, at the suit of the lord Badelismere, the earle of Hereford, and other lords of the confederacie, came with a great power vnto Kingstons, about the feast of Simon and Jude, and there staing certeine daies for some of their companie that were to come vnto them, they sent vnto the king, the archbishop of Canturburie, and the bishop of London, with the earle of Denbroke, requiring him to remoue his siege, till by parlement some order might be taken: but the king would not giue eare to their suit, but continued his siege till the castell was yielded to him. For those that were at Kingstons cowardlie leuing their enterprize, came not forward, but returned backe againe. They that were within the castell, hauing simplie submitted themselves to the king, caused twelue or thirtene of them to suffer death. Amongst other was one Walter Culpepper reckoned for the cheefe of them that defended the castell against the king. The wife of the lord Badelismere, more, with his nephew Bartholomew de Burgh was sent to the tower of London, but his sister was sent to Dover castle, there to remaine in safe keeping. The castle of Leeds being thus yielded to the king, he entered the same on All halowes day, and shortly after the castle of Gylham was delivered, and the castle of Lumbrydge left void by them that had it in keeping. The king thus bestirring him, came into Essex, and seized into his hands the lands of the lord Badelismere, and likewise the lands of such as were his maintainers, abbettors, friends, favourers, and furtherers; of the which such as he could meet with he put in prison, and here with summoned an armie to meet him at Strenesse about saint Lucies day the virgine. And then about saint Andrews tide he came to London, where the archbishop of Canturburie had called a provinciall councill.

The lord chamberlene presented himselfe to the law.

At the same time Hugh Spenser the sonne, being lately come from the sea, yielded himselfe prisoner to the kings ward, beseeching the king that he might have right ministered to him, concerning the wrongs and injuries to him done by the barons in manner as before ye have heard, speciallie for the award which in parlement they had procured to be enacted against him, the errors committed in the proccesse, whereof he besought the king that he might be admitted to shew: as first, in that they made themselves iudges: secondlie, in that he was not called to answer: thirdlie, for that the same award was made without the assent of the prelates, who are pères of the parlement as well as the temporall lords: fourthlie, in that the said barons had no record in their pursuit upon the causes contained in that award: fifthlie, in that the award was made against the forme of the great charter of franchises, wherein is contained that none shall be foreiudged nor destroyed but by lawfull iudgement of his pères, according to the law of the land. Further, he alledged that it was to be considered, how the said barons and great men being summoned to come in due maner unto that parlement, they came in forceable wise with all their powers. A like petition was also exhibited on the behalfe of Hugh Spenser the father, for redresse to be had of the wrongs and losses, which in like case he had susteyned.

Anno Reg. 15.

The king asked both the opinions of the prelates.

The declaration of the prelates.

The declaration of the earles.

The king favouring through the causes and petitions of the Spensers, granted their requests, and delivered the petitions unto the archbishop of Canturburie and his suffragans, the which at the same time were there assembled in their provinciall councill aforesaid, requiring to have their advise and opinion therein. He likewise requested of the earles and barons that were then with him, and of the counsellors in law, what they thought of this matter. The prelates upon deliberation had, declared that in their opinion, the said award as touching the disheriting and banishing of the Spensers, the father and sonne was erroneous, and not rightlie decreed, and for themselves they denied that they either did or could thinke it reason to consent thereto, and therefore they required that it might be repealed, and the kings brother Edmund earle of Kent, John de Bitaine earle of Richmond, Aimer de Valence earle of Pembroke, and Edmund earle of Arundell, then being in presence of the king, and likewise of the aforesaid prelates, affirmed that the said award pronounced against the Spensers was made contrary to law and right, and therefore as the prelates requested, that the same might be repealed.

Further, the said earles alledged, that the assent which they gave in the said award, was for doubt of the unlawfull force which the barons brought unto the said parlement, when they made that award, and for that the said earles that now were with the king, had counselled him to suffer the said award to passe, for feare of the said force, and confessed they had done euill, and besought him of pardon for their offenses in so doing. The king thus having caused the prelates, earles, barons, and lawyers there present to utter their iudgements in manner aforesaid, he judicially renoked and quite disannulled the proccesse of the said award, made as well touching the banishment, as the disheriting of the Spensers, and restored them to his peace and allegiance, and to their former estates, in all conditions as they enjoyed the same before the making of the said award, notwithstanding certeine letters to the contrarie of the earle of Lancaster, and other lords of his faction, which for the approving and ratifying of the said proccesse they directed under their seales to the king as yet remaining at London.

They wrote also to the prelates, iustices, and barons of the exchequer, to induce the king to give his assent to that which in the tenor of their letters was contained. The earle of Hereford, the lord Roger Mortimer of Cheshire, & the lord Roger Mortimer of Wigmore, entering the marches of Wales, came to Gloucester, and took that citie. The castle was also delivered unto them by the constable thereof. The king having his people coming daily unto him, where by his armie was hugelie increased, about the feast of saint Nicholas he set forth from London, and with him there went his brother Edmund earle of Kent, John earle of Richmond, Edmund earle of Arundell, and many other great lords and barons. The queene with hir children he left in the tower of London. The lord John de saint John coming to submit himselfe unto the king, at the intercession of divers noble men, with much ado had his pardon at length granted him.

The king passing forward, seized into his hands the towncs, castles, manors, and goods of them that were against him. But in the meane time the lord Henry de Latics, with certeine other that were entered into Gloucestershire (hearing that a great multitude of people was assembled out of the countrie of Cirencester by the kings commandement) came thither and chased them home to their houses, putting them in feare of their wives, if they should offer to resist him. The king coming to Cricklade after the feast of saint Lucie the virgine, wrote to the earle of Lancaster an answer of his letters, which he had received from him at London, modestlie reproving him, for that he had so grievously and unadvisably reproached him, without respect had to his roiall estate, and also promising to alledge him a done within the which he should reforme those things which he mistaked in him, as if he were his subject and underling, & beside this was now lothed with his adversaries against him, where on his behalfe there had bene no let nor stay at any time, but that they might be friends & remaine in quiet together. Wherein though he did more than stood with the dignitie of his roiall title, in so much as he had the earles life at his commandement, yet for that he tolerated such insolence of behaviour, as was unbecomlie to be shewed against the person of his prince, the kings clemencie and patience is highly therein to be commended; though his forbearing and seeking means of quietnes did neither a whit amend the malignant mind of the earle, whose heart was so enchanted with ambition and supererminent honour, that he would forget this godd lesson of submission and due allegiance, comming thither to joine their powers with his. Thither came also a great strength of footmen, part of the which under the leading of one Robert Aquarri, a right famous capitaine, took the castell of Bromfield, those that had the keeping of it fleeing forth of it. The king comming to Worcester about Newperes tide, caused the walles of the citie to be repaired, committing the custodie thereof unto William de Longchamps. After the Epiphanie he passed on the side of Seuerne towards Shrewsburie, where, at his comming thither he was honourable received by the burgeses that came forth to meet him in armor, and so conueied him into their towne being stronglie fenced. In this meane time the Scots now that the truce was ended, entring with a strong power into England, destroyed all the countrie to Newcastell upon Tyne with fire and sword. The Welshmen with their capitaine Griffin Lottis took the castels in Wales, which were kept by the people of the lord Mortimer the elder. They took also the castels of Spole, Chirke, and Olono, the keepers whereof comming unto the king to Shrewsburie submitted themselves to him, who shortly after sent them to the tower of London. The lord Hugh Audelle the elder, the lord John de Hastings, and diuerse other comming in, and submitting themselves to the king were likewise committed to ward. The lord Roger Damorie entring into the citie of Worcester destroyed all that which the K. had appointed to be done, about the fortification thereof.

The earle of Lancaster lieng at Bomfret, and hearing of all this businesse, wrote to the earle of Hereford, and other lords that were with him, that they should make hast to come to him at Bomfret, promising from thenceforth to be their generall and leader. The earle of Hereford reioicing at these newes, together with all those that were about him, leauing Gloucester and all other strengths which they held in those parts, set forward to passe through the middell of the realme, spoiling by the way mens catell and goods verie disorderlie, and so came thorough to the earle of Lancaster. The king getting into his hands all the castels of his aduersaries in those parts, went to Hereford, where he was honorable received of the cleergie and citizens. His armie increased daily, many comming in unto him, that before durst not for feare of his aduersaries. The bishop of Hereford was sharplie checked, because he had taken part with the kings enemies.

The king sent from hence the lord John Hastings into Southwales, to take in his name the seizine of the castels belonging to the earle of Hereford, the lord Roger Damorie, and the lord Hugh Spenser the younger, which the barons had the last yeare got into their hands, all which being now taken to the kings use, were furnished with faithfull garrisons.

The king, after this, comming to Gloucester, condemned the shiriffe of Hereford to be hanged, for that he had taken part against him with the barons. The lord Maurice Berkeley came to the king to Gloucester, submitting himselfe to the kings pleasure. After this the king came by Welfton border edge towards Countrie, where he had appointed aforesaid such as he had litle licensed to depart to their homes to refresh themselves for a time, as also diuerse other, to assemble with their powers to go with him from thence against his aduersaries. The day of this assembly was the friday next after the first of ianuarie in Lent. The king from Countrie went to Winton, and there lodged in the abbey for his more ease, waiting to William Sutton under-constable of Warwike castell, commanding him to be attendant on the shiriffe of Warwike, in helping him to watch the entrees and issues to and from the castell of Killingworth that was holden against him. In the meane time certeine of the lords that were gone to the earle of Lancaster besieged Ekehill castell sixtene daies together, but preuailed not.

There were letters intercepted about the same time, which a messenger brought forth of Scotland, thre closed and thre open, for there were sir in all. The king sent them to the archbishop of Canturburie, who by his commandement published them in open audience at London. The first was closed with the seale of the lord Thomas Randolph earle of Murrie, lord of Annandale and of Man, lieutenant to Robert le Bruce king of Scotland, which contained a safe conduct for sir Thomas Topcliffe chapleine, and one to be associate with him to come into Scotland, and to returne from thence in safetie. The second was sealed with the seale of sir James Douglas for a like safe conduct for the same persons. The third was closed with the seale of the said earle of Murrie for the safe conduct of the lord John de Mowbray, and the lord John de Clifford, and fortye hoxses with their pages for their safe comming unto the said erle into Scotland, and for their abiding there and returninge backe. The fourth was closed with the seale of James Douglas, directed to king Arthur. The fift was closed with the seale of James Douglas directed unto the lord Rafe Nevill. The first had no direction, but the tenour thereof was this as folloiweth.

The tenor of the said sixt letter lacking a direction.

Du shall vnderstand my lord, that the communication befoze hand had, is now brought to effect. For the earle of Hereford, the lords Roger Damorie, Hugh de Audelle the younger, Bartholomew de Badeslesmer, Roger de Clifford, John Gifford, Henrie Ceis, Thomas Manduit, John de Willington, and all other are come to Bomfret, and are readie to make you good assurance, so that you will perfozme couenant with them, to wit for your comming to aid vs, and to go with vs into England and Wales, to liue and die with vs in our quarell. We therefore beseech you to assigne vs day and place, where we may meet, and we will be readie to accomplish fullie our businesse: and we beseech you to make vs a safe conduct for thirtie hoxses, that we may in safetie come to your parts.

The king, when such earles and lords as he had licensed for a time were returned (his brother the earle of Northfolke excepted) that the most part of those men of warre were assembled that had summons, although diuerse came not at all; about the first of ianuarie in Lent he set forward towards his enemies, hauing with him to the number of sixtene hundred men of armes on horsebacke, and footmen infinite, with his power passing forth towards his aduersaries, he caused proclamation to be made, that he was readie to receiue all men to his peace, that would come and submit themselves, those excepted which had bene at the siege of Ekehill castell, or at the taking of the citie of Gloucester, or at the invasion made vpon his men at Wydenozth.

At his comming to a litle village called Caldewell, he sent afoze him certeine bands to Burton by-

The earles of Richmond and Denbroke were appointed to passe by a fowd, which they had got knowledge of, with thre hundred horsemen in complet armour, and the king with his brother the earle of Kent should follow them, with the residue of the armie, sauing that Robert Aquarie of Waters, with certeine bands of footmen was commanded to assaile the brydge, which he did verie manfully, causing the archers & crossbowes to annoie them that kept it, so as he might draw the whole power of the enemies that waite, till the king and the earles were passed by the fowd. But after that the earles of Lancaster and Hereford with their complices, heard that the king was passed with his armie, they came forth with their people into the fields, and put them in order of battell: but perceiving the great puissance which the king had there ready to encounter them, without more ado they fled setting fire on the towne, and leauing all their vittels and other things behind them. The kings people coming speedilie forward, and entring the towne, quenched the fire, and fell to the spoile of such things as the enemies for haue left behind them. The king kept nothing to himselfe, but onelie a faire cup that belonged to the earle of Lancaster, a peece esteemed to be of some great value.

On the same night, being Wednesday, the king came to Tutburie, and lodged in the castell, sending forth the next day with all speed, letters to the shiriffe of Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire, aduertising him both of the successe he had against his enemies, and withall, pronouncing them and all their adherents, rebels and traitors to him and his realme, and that for such they should be reputed, taken and viced. Wherefore he commanded in the same letters or writs, vpon forfeiture of all that the said shiriffe might forseeit, he should pursue the said rebels, that is, the earles of Lancaster and Hereford, the lords Roger Damorie, Hugh Audelle the porgier, John de Spowbray, Bartholomew de Badelismere, Roger de Clifford, John Gifford de Wyntfield, Henrie Tiers, and all and euerie other person or persons that were of their confederacie, or in their companies; causing hue and crye to be raised vpon them, in what part soeuer they might be heard of, and in all places where the said shiriffe should thinke it expedient, and to inioine and strenghtlie command all and singular persons, the said rebels and enemies to pursue, take and arrest, and them to deliuer vnto the said shiriffe, and that such as were not able to pursue them, yet with hand or home they should leue hue and crye against them, in paine that being found negligent herein, to be accounted for fauourers and adherents to the said rebels and traitors, and that the said shiriffe should therevpon apprehend them, and put them in prison. The writ was dated at Tutburie the eleuenth of March, and the like writs were directed and sent forth to all other shiriffes throughe the realme, and likewise to the bishop of Durham, and to the iustice of Chester.

Beside this, he directed also other writs to the said shiriffes and others, that although he had bene constrained to passe in forcible wise throughe diuerse parts of his realme, and the marches of Wales, to suppress the malicious rebellion of diuerse his subjects, and that as yet he was constrained to continue his iourne in such forcible wise, neuertheless his pleasure was, that the peace should be maintained and kept througheout his realme, with the statutes, lawes and customes inuiolated, and therfore he commanded the said shiriffes, that they should cause the same to be proclaimed in places where was thought most expedient, as well within liberties as without, inhibiting that any maner of person, of what state or condition soeuer he was, vpon paine that might fall thereon, to attempt any thing to the breach of peace; but that euerie man should seeke to mainteine and preserve the peace and tranquillitie of the people, with the statutes, lawes and god customes of the land, to the vttermost of his power: this alwaies obserued, that the rebels, wheresoeuer they might be found, should be arrested, and committed to safe custody. The date of this writ was at Tutburie afore said on the twelfth of March.

The lord Roger Damorie laie sick in his bed at the same time in the priorie of Tutburie, who after he had heard that iudgement the king had pronounced against him, departed this life within two daies after. But the earles of Lancaster and Hereford, with other in their companie that fled from the discomfiture at Burton, lost manie men and horses in their fleeing away, by reason of such pursuit as was made after them. Diuerse of them that had taken part with the lords against the king, came now and submitted themselves vnto him, amongst the which were sir Gilbert de Cliefeld, and sir Robert Holland knights. The king yet had the said Holland in some suspicion, because he had promised to haue come to him before. The earle of Lancaster had sent him at this time to raise his tenants in Lancashire, and to bring them vnto him, but he deceived him, and came not to him at all, wherevpon the earles of Lancaster and Hereford, with the other barons, being come vnto Pomfret, fell to counsell in the friers there, and finally, after much debating of the matter, and considering how by the vntrue dealing of the said Robert Holland, their side was much weakened, it was concluded, that they should go to the castell of Dunstanborough, and there remaine till they might purchase the kings pardon, with their enterprise thus quailed vnder their hands: and herewith setting forward that waie forth, they came to Borough brydge, where sir Andrew de Berkley with the power of the countesse of Cumberland and Westmerland had laid the passage, and there on a Tuesday being the 16 of March, he setting vpon the barons, in the end discomfited them, and chased their people.

In this fight was kaine the earle of Hereford, the lord William de Sullie, with sir Roger de Bourghfield, and diuerse others. And there were taken Thomas earle of Lancaster, the lord Roger Clifford son to that lord Roger which died in the battell of Banockburne in Scotland, the lord Gilbert Talbot, the lord John Spowbray, the lord Hugh de Willington, the lord Thomas Spandwit, the lord Warren de Aile, the lord Philip Darcie, the lord Thomas Wilther, ther, the lord Henrie de Willington, the lord Hugh de Lanouill, the lord Phillip de Beche, the lord Henrie de Lebozne, the lord Henrie de Bradborne, the lord John de Beckes, the lord Thomas Louell, the lord William fitz William, Robert de Wateville, John de Strikeland, Donell Heron, Walter Paue, lie of Stretton, and a great number of other esquires and gentlemen. This battell was fought on the fiftenth day of March, in the yeare 1322 after the account of them that begin the yeare at the Circumcision, which was in the said fiftenth parte of this kings reigne.

The bodie of the earle of Hereford was sent to Poike, two friers, of the order of preachers being appointed to take to it, till the king took order for the burying of it. The lord Clifford also, because he was wounded with an arrow, was sent unto Poike. At the same time, the lord Henrie Percie took the lord Henrie de laeis, and John de Galdington knight, with two esquires, and within a few daies after, Donald de Bar took the lord Bartholomew de Badeslinere, the lord Hugh Audelle the younger, the lord John Gifford, the lord William Luchet, and in manner all those which escaped by flight from this battell were taken in one place or other, by such of the kings servants and friends as pursued them. Upon the one and twentieth of March, came sir Andrew de Harkley unto Pomfret, bringing with him the earle of Lancaster and other prisoners. The king was come thither a few daies before, and had the castell yelded to him by the constable, that not manie daies past was appointed to the keeping thereof by the earle, which earle now being brought thither captiue, was mocked, scorned, and in derision called king Arthur.

On the morrow after being mondaie, the two and twentieth of March, he was brought before these nobles men, Edmund earle of Kent, John earle of Richmond, Aimer earle of Penbroke, John erle of Surrie, Edmund earle of Arundell, David earle of Atholl, Robert earle of Arnegos, the lord Hugh Spenser the father, the lord Robert de Palmedhorp justice, and others with them associate, before whom he was arraigned of high treason, for that he had raised warre against the king, and defended the passage of Burton bridge, for the space of three daies together against him, and after when it was perceined that the king had passed the riuer, he with Humfrie de Bohun earle of Hereford, and other their complices like traitors, set fire on the said towne, and cruelly burnt part of the houses and men of the same towne, and after, the said earle of Lancaster with his complices, arranged himselfe in field with his armie and banners displayed readie to fight against the king, till that perceiuing the kings power to be ouerstrong for him, and his partakers to resist, he together with them fled, committing by the waie diuerse felonies and robberies, till they came to Burrough bridge, where finding certeine of the kings faithfull subiects readie to resist them, they assailed the said faithfull subiects with force of armes and banners displayed, slaying diuerse of them, till finally the said earle of Lancaster was caught, and other of his complices, some taken, some slaine, and the residue put to flight, so that there wanted no good will in the said earle of Lancaster and others, while the king should not haue bene vanquished. Which treasons, murders, burning of houses, despoiling of the kings people, being plainlie & manifestlie knowne to the earls, barons, lords, and other people of the land, the said earle of Lancaster was thereupon adiudged to die, according to the law in such cases provided, that is, to be drawne, hanged, and headed. But because he was the quenes uncle, and sonne to the kings uncle, he was pardoned of all saue heading, and so accordinglie thereunto suffered.

tered at Pomfret the two and twentieth of March.

Thus the king seemed to be reuenged of the displeasure done to him by the earle of Lancaster, for the beheading of Piers de Gaucisson earle of Cornwall, whom he so deuelie loued, and because the earle of Lancaster was the cheefe occasioner of his death, the king neuer loued him entirelie after. So that here is verified the censure of the scripture expressed by the wisdom of Salomon, that the anger and displeasure of the king is as the roying of a lion, and his reuenge inenitable. Therefore it is an hie point of discretion in such as are mightie, to take heed how they giue edge vnto the wrath of their soueraigne, which if it be not by submission made blunt, the burthen of the smart insuing will lie heauie vpon the offender, even to his bitter vndoying, and losse (perhaps) of life. In this sort came the mightie earle of Lancaster to his end, being the greatest pere in the realme, and one of the mightiest earles in christendome: for when he began to leaue warre against the king, he was possessed of five earldomes, Lancaster, Lincoln, Salisburie, Leicester, and Derby, beside other seignories, lands, and possessions, great to his aduancement in honoz and puissance. But all this was limited within prescription of time, which being expired, both honour and puissance were cut off with dishonour and death, for (as mutable state!)

*Inuida fatorum series, summissa negatum

On the same day, the lord William Luchet, the lord William fitz William, the lord Warren de Lille, the lord Henrie Bradborne, and the lord William; Gentie barons, with John Page an esquire, were drawne and hanged at Pomfret aforesaid, and then shortly after, Roger lord Clifford, John lord Powel, and sir Golein d'Ceull barons, were drawne and hanged at Poike. At Wyke in like manner were executed sir Henrie de Willington, and sir Henrie Montfort barons; and at Gloucester, the lord John Gifford, and sir William Elmehyde knight; and at London, the lord Henrie de laeis baron; at Winchelse, sir Thomas Culpeper knight; at Windesore, the lord Francis de Aldham baron; and at Canturburie, the lord Bartholomew de Badeslinere, and the lord Bartholomew de Athborham, barons. Also at Cardiffe in Wales, sir William Fleming knight was executed: diuerse were executed in their countries, as sir Thomas Maudit and others.

But now touching the foresaid earle of Lancaster, great strife rose afterwards amongst the people, whether he ought to be reputed for a saint or no. Some held, that he ought to be no lesse esteemed, for that he did manie almesdeeds in his life time, honoured men of religion, and maintained a true quarrell till his liues end. Also, his enemies continued not long after, but came to euill end. Others conceiued an other opinion of him, alledging, that he fauoured not his wife, but liued in spouse-breach, desiring a great number of damosels and gentlewomen. If anie offended him, he slue him shortly after in his wrathfull mood. Apostataes and other euill doers he maintained, and would not suffer them to be punished by due order of law. All his doings he vied to commit vnto one of his secretaries, and took no heed himselfe thereof: and as for the manner of his death, he fled shamefullie in the fight, and was taken and put to death against his will, because he could not auoid it: yet by reason of certeine miracles which were said to be done nere the place both where he suffered, and where he was buried, caused manie to thinke he was a saint; howbeit, at length, by the kings commandement, the church doores of the priorie where he was buried, were shut and closed, so that no

When the king had subdued the barons, shortly after, about the feast of the Ascension of our lord, he held a parlement at Poike, in which parlement, the record and whole proccesse of the decrees or iudgements concerning the disheriting of the Spensers, ordeined by the lords in parlement assembled at London the last summer, was now throughe examined, and for their errors therein found, the same record and proccesse was clerelie adnihilated and reversed, and the said Spensers were restored to all their lands and offices, as before. And in the same parlement the lord Hugh Spenser the father was made earle of Winchester, and the lord Andrew de Herklie earle of Carleill. Moreover, in the same parlement, all such were disherited as had taken part with the earls of Lancaster & Hereford, except the lord Hugh Audelle the younger, and a few other, the which lord Hugh was pardoned, because he had married the kings niece, that was sister to Gilbert de Clare earle of Gloucester, which was slaine in Scotland, at the battell of Bannockburne, as before is mentioned.

At this time also master Robert Baldocke, a man euill beloued in the realme, was made lord chancellor of England. This Robert Baldocke, and one Simon Reding were great fauourers of the Spensers, and so likewise was the earle of Arundell, whereby it may be thought, that the Spensers did helpe to aduance them into the kings fauour, so that they bare no small rule in the realme, during the time that the same Spensers continued in prosperitie, which for the terme of five peares after that the foresaid barons (as before is expessed) were brought to confusion, did wonderfullie increase, and the queene for that she gaue god and faithfull counsell, was nothing regarded, but by the Spensers meanes clerelie worne out of the kings fauour. Moreover, we find, that in this parlement holden at Poike, the kings sonne Edward was made prince of Wales, and duke of Aquitaine.

Also, the king caused the ordinances made by the earles and barons to be examined by men of great knowledge and skill, and such as were thought necessarie to be established, he commanded that the same should be called statutes, and not ordinances. Beside a great subsidie granted to the king by the temporarie, the cleargie of all the prouince of Canturburie granted five pence of euerie marke, and they of the prouince of Poike foure pence. Aimer earle of Penbrooke, being returned home from this parlement holden at Poike, was arrested by certeine knights, sent with authoritie thereunto from the king, who brought him backe to Poike, where at length thorough suit of certeine noble men, he was upon his oath taken to be a faithfull subiect, and in consideration of a fine which he paid to the king, set at libertie. The occasion of his imprisonment came, for that he was accused and detected to be a secret fauourer of the barons cause against the Spensers in time of the late troubles.

Moreover, shortly after the king gathered the first penie of the temporall mens goods thorough England, Ireland and Wales, which had bene granted to him at the foresaid parlement holden at Poike, towards the defending of the realme against the Scots. This tax was not gathered without great murmur and grudge, the realme being in such euill and miserable state as it then was. ¶ This peare also the sunne appeared to mans sight in colour like to blood, and so continued six houres, to wit, from ten of the clocke in the morning of the last daie of October, untill one of the clocke in the after none of the same daie.

Here is to be noted, that during the time whilest the ciuill warre was in hand betwixt king Edward and his barons, the Scots and Frenchmen were not idle, for the Scots waisted & destroyed the countrie of the bishoprike of Durham (as before ye haue partlie heard) & the Frenchmen made roades & incursions into the borders of Gwent, alledging that they did it vpon good and sufficient occasion, for that king Edward had not done his homage vnto the king of France, as he ought to haue done, for the duchie of Aquitaine, and the countie of Ponthieu. But the true occasion that moued them to attempt the waies at that present, was for that they were in hope to recover all the lands which the king of England held within France, clerelie out of his hands, for so much as they vnderstood the discord betwixt him and his barons, and how infortunatlie he had sped against the Scots, by reason whereof they iudged the time to serue most fitte now for their purpose.

In the octaves of the natiuitie of saint John Baptist, Robert Bruce entring into England by Carlisle, kept on his waie through Cumberland, Coperland, Kendall, and so into Lancashire, till he came to Preston in Anderneffe, which towne he burnt, as he had done others in the countries through which he had passed. There were some of the Scots that forraied the countrie five miles on this side Preston southwards, and thus being fourescore long miles within England, they returned homewards, and entered againe into Scotland without encounter, after they had bene at this time within England the space of thre weeks and thre daies. King Edward being thus beset with two mischiefes both at one time, thought god first to prouide remedie against the newer danger, which by the Scots was still at hand, and therefore he meant to go against them himselfe, and to send his brother Edmund earle of Kent into Gwent, to defend that countrie from the Frenchmen. Whereupon now in the sixteenth peare of his reigne, after that the Scots were returned home with a great botie and rich spoile, he got together a wonderfull great armie of men, and entring into Scotland, passed far within the countrie, not finding any resistance at all (as the most part of our writers doe agree) but at length, through famine and diseases of the str and other maladies that fell amongst the Englishmen in the armie, he was constrained to come backe, and in his waie besieged the castell of Royham, which fortresse he wan within ten daies after he had begun to assault it.

Robert Bruce immediatlie after the English armie was retired home, raised a power, and entring into England by Sulwaie sands, late at a place called Beaumont, not past thre miles fro Carlisle, by the space of five daies, sending in the meane time the most part of his armie abroad to spoile and harrie the countrie on euerie side, and afterwards remouing from thence, he passed towards Blackamore, hauing knowledge by diligent espials, that king Edward was in those parts, giuing himselfe more to pastime in hunting there within the woods about Blackamore, than to the god ordering of his people which he had then about him. Whereupon the Scottish king Bruce, entring into that wild and mossie countrie, where he had not bene afore, conueied his enterprize so warlike, and with such diligent industrie, that on saint Lukes daie, comming vpon the English armie at vniuares, he put the same to flight, so that the king himselfe

The earle of Carleill being commanded by the king to raise the powers of Cumberland, Westmerland, and Lancashire, did so, and according to that he had in commandement, bringing them beloeue the countreies vnto Forke, found the king there in no plight to giue battell to his enemies, all things being brought about him into great confusion: whereupon he licenced his people to depart to their homes againe, and the Scots so returned without battell home into their countreies, entering into Scotland the morrow after All hallows daie, after they had remained in England at this time, one whole moneth and foure daies. Some write, that in their returne, they spoiled Northalerton, and diuerse other townes and places as they passed.

A conspiracie
to set pri-

bertie.

In the same yeare, there was a great conspiracie practised by certain persons that had taken part with the barons in the late warres, purposing to set at libertie in one selfe night, all those noble men and others, that were by the king kept in prison for that quarrell. Certaine therefore of those conspiratoꝝ came to the castell of Walingford, within the which the lord Sparke Berkeley, and the lord Hugh Audley remained as prisoners. The conspiratoꝝ found this to enter the castell by a posterne gate towards the Thames side, howbeit not so secretlie but that the townesmen hauing knowledge thereof, assembled together and besieged them that were so entred the castell, till the earles of Kent and Winchester came with a great power to reinforce the siege, so that in the end, they that had made this attempt fled into the chappell of the castell, in hope to be saued through sanctuary of the place, but they were (against the willes of the deane and preests of the colledge there that sought to defend them) taken forth by force, so that Sir John de Godington knight, Sir Edmund of the Beth chapeleine, and an esquire called Roger Walton, were sent to Pomfret, and there put in prison; the esquire was after sent to Forke, and there drawne and hanged. This enterpryse caused all other prisoners to be moze streightlie looked vnto.

In this yeare was begun a wicked practise of treason vpon this occasion. Where King Edward hauing asailed fortune so stoward towards him, in chance of warre against the Scots at sundrie times, was thereby taught to doubt the triall thereof any further, and rather to seeke for peace, he appointed Andrew Herkely earle of Carleill, to seeke some means, whereby a peace might be concluded betwixt him and king Robert. The earle by the kings commandement, going into Scotland, and comming vnto king Robert, whome he found at Loghmaran, intreated with him of warre, and not of peace, for whether it were so that he despaired of the state of king Edwards business, which prospered neither at home nor abroad; chafelle by reason of his owne wilfull negligence (as some write) or whether of his owne nature this earle delighted in nothing so much, as in deceit, craft, and treason: he concluded vpon points with the Scottish king, how, when, and where king Edward should be betrayed, and to the end that couenanted faith on either side might be the moze suerlie kept and obserued, the sister of King Robert was affianced vnto the said earle of Carleill: a verie beautifull ladie and a comelie as was anie where to be seene or found.

This practise being thus contriued, shortly after the king got knowledge thereof, though by whome it was not certeinlie knowne: so hard a thing it is for man to conceale and keepe secret that thing which he goeth about, though he studie neuer so much so to do, namely in matters of treason, which hath a thousand fautes to crape abroad, and which way soeuer it goeth, it leaueth a thousand prints of the footsteps behind it, by the which it may be discouered to the world. When therefore the earle came backe againe to Carleill, he was arrested by commandement from the king, and straightwaies being arreigned of the treason, he was thereof condemned and put to execution.

His head was sent vnto London, and there set vpon the bridge, or rather vpon some turret of the tower. So hard a matter it is for traitoꝝ to escape the hands of the executioner; vnder whose hatchet they submit their heads to be beuen from their shoulders, euen then when they haue conceiued their traitorous attempts in hart, for God who hath placed princes in thrones of roialtie, to this end hath bought them a superlative degre of dignitie, that they might be obeyed, neither will his iustice permit impunitie to the disloyall enterprises and complots of malefactoꝝ, common peace-disturbers, hautie-harted pemrods, ambitious Hamans, or anie lewd malcontent: for

Act Dei est oculus ad omnia videndum, Eum panas non effugit mortalis, Fuisse volens ergo ne faciat morte digna.

¶ But there be that write otherwise (as it may well be) thus, that this earle of Carleill, perceiving the miserie of his countrie, without consent of the king of England, made peace with the king of Scots, vnder this forme, as by Richard Southwell we find recorded. First, the earle promised faithfullie for him and his heires, that they should with all their force and means possible, seeke to mainteine the said king of Scots, his heires and successors, in the peaceable possession of the kingdome of Scotland, and that to their powers they should fight against all those that would not agree vnto that couenant, as against them that should seeme to be enemies vnto the common-wealth of both the realmes of England and Scotland. The king of Scots promised faithfullie for his part, to defend the said earle, his heires, and adherents in the said couenant or paction, and not onelie to keepe peace with England, but also to build a monasterie within Scotland, assigning reuenues thereto, to the value of five hundred marks, to celebrate diuine seruice, and to pray continuallie for the soules of them that were dead, by occasion of the passed warres betwixt England and Scotland; and further, that he should giue to the king of England within ten yeares, forty thousand pounds of siluer; and that the king of England should haue the king of Scots eldest sonne, to marrie him vnto some ladie of his bloud, as he should thinke expedient. To the performance of all which couenants well and truelie to be obserued, Thomas Randulfe earle of Spurrey swore on the behalfe of the king of Scots, and the earle of Carleill swore for himselfe: and here with certaine writings indented were drawne and ingrossed, to the which interchangeable they set their hands and scales.

After that the earle of Carleill was returned home, he called to Carleill all the chiefe persons of the countrie, as well spirituall as temporall, and there rather through feare, than otherwise, confrened them to receiue an oth, that they should aid & assist him to their powers, to see all the covenants & bouesaid performed and kept. After that these things were knowne to the king and the realme, although some of the communalie liked well inough of the matter, because they hoped thereby to remaine in peace, especiallie those of the north parts, the king yet and his counsell (not without cause) were sore offended, for that he whom the king had so latelie advanced, should confederate himselfe with the Scots, to the prejudice of the king and his crowne, concluding any covenants of peace without his consent, whereupon reputing him for a ranke traitor, the king sent vnto the lord Antonie Lucie, to apprehend the said earle by some meanes if he might, and for his paines he should not faile to be well rewarded.

The lord Lucie watching his time, when the earles men were gone some whither abroad, and but few left about him, the morrow after the feast of saint Mattheu the apostle, he entred the castell of Carleill, as it were to talke with the earle of some businesse, as his manner was at other times to doe. He had with him sir Hugh Lowther, sir Richard Denton, and sir Hugh Spence knights, and foure esquires, beside other priuie armed, so that leauing some at the inner gate and doore as he entred, he came into the hall, and there finding the earle inditing letters, arrested him. Herewith when certeine of the earles seruants made a noise, and cried, Treason, treason, the porter of the inner gate would haue shut it vpon them that were thus entred, but sir Richard Denton sue that porter with his owne hands, and there was not one more slaine by them in the apprehension of the earle, for all other his seruants yelded themselves and the house vnto the said lord Lucie, without more resistance.

Berkeley.

Whosoeuer one of his seruants that saw these doings, got awaie, and with all speed ran to the peeple of Berthead, and shewed to the earles brother Michael Berkeley what was chanced to the earle, whereupon the said Michael forthwith fled into Scotland, and with him sir William Blunt knight a Scottishman, and diuerse other that were of the earles priuie counsell. The lord Lucie straightwaies sent a messenger to the king vnto Dorke, aduertising him how he had taken the earle, and therefore required to vnderstand further of the kings pleasure. The king forthwith sent the lord Geoffrey Scrope iustice, with a number of armed men vnto Carleill, the which came thither on saint Chaddes daie, and the morrow after, being the thirde of March, he sat in iudgement vpon the said earle, in the castell of Carleill, and there (as out of the kings mouth) he pronounced sentence against him in this wise; first, that he should be disgraced of his earledome, by the taking awaie from him the sword which the king had giuen him with, and likewise of his knighthood, by cutting off his spurs from his heeles, and that after this, he should be dyawen from the castell through the citis vnto the place of execution, where felons were accustomed to suffer, and there to be hanged, afterwards headed, and then his head to be sent vnto London, there to be set aloft vpon one of the turrets of the tower, and his quarters to be diuided, one to be set vp at Carleill, an other at Petercastle vpon Tine, the third at Wyfrow, & the fourth at Douer.

The earle of Carleills
iudgement.

This constancie at his death.

When he had heard this iudgement, he said; You haue diuided my bodie at your pleasure, and I commit my soule vnto God: and being according to the iudgement dyawen to the place where he suffered, he neuer shrank at the matter, but boldlie behaued himselfe, declaring at the verie houre of his death, that his intention in concluding the agrement with the Scots was good, and proceeding not of any euill meaning, but tending onlie to the wealth and quietnes of the realme. Neither could such friers as were permitted to come to him before his arraignment to heare his confession, get any thing more of him, but that his meaning was good, and that which he had concluded with the king of Scots was not done vpon any euill purpose, whereby any hurt might insue, either to the king or to the realme. Thus haue we thought good to shew the cause of this earles death, as by some writers it hath bene registred; although there be that write, that the ouerthrow at Beighland chanced through his fault, by misleading a great part of the kings host, and that therefore the king being offended with him, caused him to be put to death, albeit (as I thinke) no such matter was alleged against him at the time of his arraignment.

About this season was the foundation begun of St. Michaels colledge in Cambridge, by one sir Henrie Stanton knight, chancellor of the exchequer. About the feast of the Ascension, there came as commissioners from the king of England vnto Petercastle, Aimerie earle of Penbrooke, and the lord chamberlaine Hugh Spenser the younger, and other foure personages of good account. And from the king of Scots, there came the bishop of saint Andrews, Thomas Randolph earle of Murray, and other foure of good credit to treat of peace, or at the leastwise of some long truce, and through the good will and pleasure of God, the author of all peace and quietnesse, they concluded vpon a truce, to indure for thirtene yeares, and so about the feast of saint Barnabe the apostle, it was proclaimed in both realmes, but yet so, that they might not traffike together, because of the excommunication wherewith the Scots were as yet intangled, although as some write, about the same time, the interdict wherein the realme of Scotland stood bound, was by pope John released.

The French king, being latelie come to the crowne, sent certeine ambassadores vnto king Edward, to wit, the lord Beouille, and one Andreas de Florentia a notarie, to giue summons vnto him from the French king, to come and doe homage for the lands which he held in France, as for the duchie of Aquitaine, and the countie of Ponthieu. And though the lord chamberlaine Hugh Spenser the sonne, and the lord chancelour Robert Baldocke did what they could to procure these ambassadores, not to declare the cause of their coming to the king, yet when they should depart, they admonished the king to come and doe his homage vnto the French king; and vpon this admonition the said Andreas framed a publicke instrument, by vertue whereof, the French king made processe against the king of England, and seized into his hands diuerse townes and castles in Aquitaine, alledging that he did it for the contumacie shewed by the king of England, in refusing to come to doe his homage, being lawfullie summoned, although the king was thoughtlie informed, that the summons was neither lawfull, nor touched him any thing at all.

About the same time, the lord Roger Mortimer of Wigmore, giuing his keepers a drinke that brought them into a sound and heauie sleepe, escaped out of the tower of London where he was prisoner. This escape of the lord Mortimer greatly troubled the king, so that immediatlie vpon the first news, he wrote to all the shiriffes of the realme, that if he chanced to come within their romes, they should cause hue and crie to be raised, so as he might be raised and arrested, but he made such shift, that he got ouer into France, where he was receiued by a lord of Picardie, named monsieur John de Fieules, who had faire lands in England, and therefore the king wrote to him, repprouing him of vnthankfulnesse, considering he

In Lent this yere, a parlement was holden at London, in the which diuerse things were intreated, amongst other the chiefeest was, to determine for the sending of some honorable ambassage to the French king, to excuse the king for not comming to him to do his homage, according to the pretended summons. ¶ In the same parlement, Adam bishop of Hereford was arrested, and examined upon points of treason, for aiding, succouring, and maintaining the Mortimers, and other of the rebels. This bishop was reckoned to be wise, subtil, and learned, but otherwise, wilfull, presumptuous, and given to mainteine factions. At the first, he disdeined to make ante answer at all, and finally, when he was in manner forced thereto, he flatlie told the king, that he might not make any answer to such matters as he was charged with, except by the licence and consent of his metropolitane the archbishop of Canturburie, and other his peres. Whereupon, the said archbishop and other bishops made such sute, that he was committed to the keeping of the said archbishop, with him to remaine, till the king had taken order for his further answer.

Within few daies after, when the king called him againe before his presence, to make answer to the matters laid against him, the archbishops of Canturburie, Poike, Dublin, and ten other bishops came with their crosses afore them, and under a colour of the priuilege and liberties of the church, took him a waile, before he had made ante answer, forbidding all men on paine of excommunication, to laie ante hands vpon him. The king greatlie offended with this bold proceeding of the prelates, caused yet an inquest to be impanelled, to inquire of the bishop of Herefords treasons, and vpon the finding of him guiltie, he seized into his hands all the temporalties that belonged to his bishopricke, and spoiled his manours and houses most violentlie, in reuenge of his disoiall dealings.

Moreover, in this parlement, the lands and possessions that belonged sometime to the Templers, and had bene deliuered vnto the knights Hospitallers, otherwise called knights of the Rodes by the king in the scanenth yere of his reigne (according to the decree of the counsell of Vienna) were by authoritie of this parlement assured vnto the said knights, to enjoy to them and their successors for ever. Also it was concluded, that the earle of Kent, and the archbishop of Dublin should go ouer as ambassadours into France, to excuse the king for his not comming in person to the French king, to do his homage for the lands he held in France. Moreover, in the same parlement, the king granted, that all the dead bodies of his enemies and rebels that had suffered and hanged still on the gallowes, should be taken downe, and buried in the churchyards next to the places where the same bodies were hanging, and not elsewhere, by such as would take paine to burie them, as by his writs directed vnto the shiriffes of London, and of the counties of Middlesex, Kent, Glocester, Poike, and Buckingham it appeared. And not onelie this libertie was granted at that time for the taking down of those bodies, but (as some write) it was decreed by authoritie in the same parlement, that the bodies of all those that from thenceforth should be hanged for felonies, should incontinentlie be buried, which ordinance hath bene ever since obserued.

Embassadours sent into France.

The earle of Kent, and the archbishop of Dublin going ouer into France, could not light vpon any good conclusion for the matter about the which they were sent, because the same time, or rather somewhat before, the lord Rafe Bassett of Winton, being the kings seneschall in Guien, had ouerthrowne a certeine towne, newlie fortified by the Frenchmen on the frontiers, for that the inhabitants, trusting on the French kings fauour and maintenance, refused to obeie the lawes and ordinances of the countrie of Aquitaine, and seemed to despise and set at naught the authoritie of the said lord Bassett in that countrie, contrarie to all right, good order or reason. Wherefore, the French king took the matter so greeuouslie, that except the lord Bassett might be constrained to come vnto Paris, and there make answer to his offense, he would not hearken to any other satisfaction. And thereupon, when the ambassadours were returned, he sent his vnckle the lord Charles de Blois earle of Anjou, with a mightie armie, against the English subjects into Guien, where entering into Agenois, he took and seized all that countrie into the French kings hands. The earle of Kent being not gotten into those parts, with a great number of other capteins and men of warre sent thither by the king of England, resisted the enemies verie manfully, in so much that vpon their approach to the Rioll, a strong towne in those parts, the earle of Kent as then being within it, did issue forth, and giuing them battell, slue (as some write) fouretene hundred of their men, so that they were glad to lodge at the first somewhat further off the towne.

¶ Whereupon he requested the duke of Britaine, that for the preservation and maintenance of the honorable estate of the peres of France, and for iustice sake he would helpe to aid him, either by waie of request, or other convenient meanes, so as the said freid dealings and iniurious wrongs may cease, and the estate of the peereship may be maintained as was requisite. He wrote likewise to the lord John the infant, the lord of Biskie, and to the lady Marie of Biskie gouernesse of the king of Castile and Leon, and to James king of Aragon, requesting them to aid him with men of warre, as well horsemen as footmen, against his aduersarie the French king, that most vniustlie went about to depriue him of his inheritance. But howsoever the matter went, no aid came to the earle of Kent from any part, till at length, the Frenchmen so reinforced the siege, that the towne was deliuered to the earle of Anjou, and a truce taken vpon certeine conditions, that further

Then were sent ouer other ambassadors, as the lord John de Saulte a Frenchman borne, and one maister John de Schoyich, but the lord Saulte had so strange intertainment for some displeasure which the French king conceiued against him, that if the French queene had not the better intreated for him, he had lost his head; and as for the other, he had also returned home without bringing any thing to passe, of that for the which he was sent. After this, the pope sent the archbishop of Vienna, and the bishop of Orange, to the princes of either realme, to exhort them to some agreement, but they could do no good, and so taking monie of the cleargie for their expenses, they returned. After this, about the twentieth daie after Christmasse, there was a parlement called at London, in the which the king required to haue the aduise of the lords, how he might worke for sauing of the duchie of Guien, soe molested by the French. Wherevpon it was concluded, that the bishops of Winchester and Norwich, and John de Britaine earle of Richmond, should go ouer as ambassadors to the French king, who coming into France, after manie argumentations, allegations, and excuses, made on both parts, at length receiued a certaine forme of pacification at the French kings hands, with the which the bishop of Winchester was sent backe to England, the bishop of Norwich, and the earle of Richmond remaining there, till it might be knowen how the king of England would like thereof.

Finallie it was thought good, that the queene should go ouer to hir brother the French king, to confirme that treatie of peace vpon some reasonable conditi- ons. She willingly toke vpon hir the charge, and so with the lord John Crumwell, & other foure knights, without any other great traine, taking sea, she landed in France, where of the king hir brother she was sol- fullie receiued, and finallie she being the mediatrix, it was finallie accorded, that the K. of England should giue to his eldest sonne the duchie of Aquitaine, and the countie of Montien, and that the French king re- ceiving homage of him for the same, he should re- store into his hands the said countie, and the lands in Guien, for the which they were at variance, and for those countries which had bene forraied and spoiled, the earle of Arion should fullie see him satisfied, as right did require.

Vpon the covenants the French king wrote his letters patents into England, and other letters also of safe conduct, as well for the sonne as for the king himselfe, if it should please him to come ouer him- selfe in person. Vpon which choise great deliberation was had, as well at Langdon, as at Douer, diuerse thinking it best that the king should go ouer him- selfe; but the earle of Winchester and his sonne the lord chamberleine, that neither durst go ouer them- selues with the king, nor abide at home in his ab- sence, gaue contrarie counsell, and at length preua- led so, that it was fullie determined that the kings el- dest sonne Edward should go ouer, which turned to their destruction, as it appeared afterward.

Wherevpon the king made a charter of grant vnto his sonne, of the duchie of Guien, and countie of Pontieu, to haue and hold to him & his heires kings of England, with condition, that if he chanced to de- part this life whilest his father liued, those lands should returne to his father againe, so as the French king might not marrie the kings sonne at his plea- sure, nor appoint vnto him any gardians or gouer- nours. This ordinance was made at Douer by the kings charter, with consent of the prelates and other noble men of the realme there present, the morrow after the Patenite of our ladie, and on the thurdaie following, the kings sonne toke the sea, and with him Walter bishop of Excester and others in competent number, and about the feast of saint Pathe to the apostle, he did homage to his uncle the French king at Bois de Vincennes, under certeine protestations made, as well on the one part as the other.

The summer this yeare proued exceeding hot and drie, so that springs and riuers failed to yeld their accustomed course of waters, by reason whereof great numbers of cattell and beasts, both wild and tame died, through lacke of convenient liquour to asswage their vehement thirst. In the beginning of the next spring, king Edward sent into France vnto his wife and sonne, commanding them, now that they had made an end of their businesse, to returne home with all convenient speed. The queene receiuing the message from hir husband, whether it was so that she was straited by hir brother, vnto whome belike she had complained after what manner she was used at hir husbands hands, being had in no regard with him: or for that she had no mind to returne home, because she was loth to see all things ordered out of frame by the counsell of the Spencers, whereof to heare she was wearie: or whether (as the manner of women is) she was long about to prepare hir selfe forward, she slack- ked all the summer, and sent letters euer to excuse hir tardiance. But yet because she would not run in any suspicion with hir husband, she sent diuerse of hir folkes before hir into England by soft iournies. A la- mentable case, that such diuision should be betwene a king and his queene, being lawfullie married, and hauing issue of their bodies, which ought to haue made that their copulation more comfortable: but (alas) what will not a woman be beaten and allured vnto, if by euill counsell she be once assaulted? And what will she leaue vndone, though neuer so in- convenient to those that should be most deere vnto hir, so hir owne fanse and will be satisfied? And how hardlie is she reuoked from proceeding in an euill action, if she haue once taken a taste of the same? As verie truly is reported by the comedie-writer, saing,

*Male quod mulier incipit nisi effugere id perpetrat, Id illi morbo, id illi senio est; ea illi misera miseria est:
Si bene facere incipit, eius eam cito adium percipit, Nimisq; pauca sunt de fesse, male que facere occiperint, Nimisq; pauca efficiunt, si quid occiperint benefacere; Mulieri nimio malefacere melius est omni, quam bene.*

But to the purpose. King Edward not a little of- fended with king Charles, by whose meanes he knew that the woman thus lingered abroad, he procured pope John to write his letters vnto the French king, admonishing him to send home his sister and hir sonne vnto hir husband. But when this nothing aua- led, a proclamation was made in the moneth of De- cember, the nineteenth yeare of this kings reigne, that if the queene and hir sonne entred not the land by the octaues of the Epiphantie next ensuing in peaceable wise, they should be taken for enemies to the realme and crowne of England. ¶ Here authors varie, for some write, that vpon knowledge had of this proclamation, the queene determined to returne into England forthwith, that she might be reconciled to hir husband.

Others write, and that more truelie, how the being highlie displeased, both with the Spencers and the king hir husband, that suffered himselfe to be misled by their counsels, did appoint indeed to returne into England, not to be reconciled, but to stir the people to some rebellion, whereby the might reuenge hir ma- nifold iniuries. Which (as the profe of the thing shew- ed) seemeth to be most true, for she being a wise wo- man, & considering that with the Spencers had exclud- ed, put out, and remoued all good men, from and be- sides the kings counsell, and placed in their romes such such of their clients, seruants and frends as pleased them, the might well thinke that there was small hope to be had in hir husband, who heard no man but the said Spencers, which the king hated hir deadlye. Whereupon, after that the tearme prefixed in the proclamation was expired, the king caused to be seized into his hands, all such lands, as belonged either to his sonne, or to his wiife.

Walslare.

About the same time, one sir Robert Walslare knight, a right hardie man of his hands, but craftie and subtil (who being taken in the warres which the lordz raised against the king, had bene committed to prison in the castell of Corfe) found means now to kill the constable of that castell most cruellie, and escaping awaie, got ouer to the quene into France, and so the number of them that ran out of the realme vnto hir daile increased. This sir Robert Walslare was a great procurer of the discorde betwixt the king and the lordz, and a chiefe leader, or rather seducer of that noble man Humfrie de Bohune earle of Hereford: and whilist other gaue themselves to seeke a reformation in the decayed state of the commonwealth, he set his mind vpon murders and robberies. Diuerse other about the same time fled out of the realme vnto the quene, and vnto hir sonne the earle of Chester. But in the meane time, Walter Stapleton bishop of Excester, which hitherto had remained with the quene in France, stole now from hir, and got ouer into England, opening to the king all the counsell and whole mind of the quene: which thing turned first of all vnto his owne destruction, as shall after appeare.

The bishop of Excester fled the quene.

Sir Oliver
de Ingham treuerant of Galscoine.

About the same time, one sir Oliver de Ingham, a yong, lustie, and valiant knight, was by the kings sonne the duke of Aquitaine (not without his fathers consent) established lord warden of the marches of Guien, the which sir Oliver gathering an armie of hired soldiers, Spaniards, Aragon, and Galscoine, invaded the countrie of Agenois (which the French king held yet in his hands contrarie to covenant) and recovering it from the French, cleerlie reduced it to the English dominion. Whereouer, sir John Murrum, sir Nicholas Kiriell, and sir John Felton, admirals by the kings appointment, with the fleets of the east, south, and west parts, went to the sea, to apprehend such Frenchmen as they might meet withall. They according to their commission bestirred themselves so, that within few daies they took sir Ioseph saile of Portugall, and brought them into England, whereupon the displeasure for increased betwixt the two realmes.

The king of England stood not onelie in doubt of the Frenchmen, but more of his owne people that remained in France, least they thorough helpe of the French should invade the land, and therefore he commanded the hauens and ports to be suerlie watched, lest some sudden inuasion might happilie be attempted, for it was well vnderstood, that the quene meant not to returne, till she might bring with hir the lord Spertimer, and the other banished men, who in no wise could obtaine any fauour at the kings hands, so long as the Spencers bare rule. ¶ The pope lamenting this matter, sent two bishops into England, to reconcile the king and quene, and also to agree the two kings. These bishops were reuerentlie received, but more than reuerence here they obtained not, and so departed as they came.

King Edward vnderstanding all the quenes drift, at length sought the French kings fauour, and did so much by letters and promise of bribes with him and his counsell, that quene Isabell was destitute in manner of all helpe there, so that she was glad to withdraw into Heinault, by the comfort of John the lord Beaumont, the earle of Heinault his brother, who being then in the court of France, and lamenting quene Isabells case, imagined with himselfe of some marriage that might be had betwixt the yong prince of Wales, and some of the daughters of his brother the earle of Heinault, and thereupon required hir to go into Heinault, and he would be glad to attend hir. She gladlie consenting hereto, went thither with him, where she was most ioufullie receiued with hir sonne, and all other of hir traine.

Polydor.

The Spencers (some write) procured hir banishment out of France, and that she was aduised by the earle of Arthois. chafellie to repaire into Heinault. Also I find, that the Spencers deliuered five barrels of silver, the summe amounting vnto five thousand marks, vnto one Arnold of Spaine a brother, appointing him to conueie it ouer into France, to bestowe it vpon such frends as they had there of the French kings counsell, by whose means the king of France did banish his sister out of his realme. But this monie was met with vpon the sea by certaine Zelanders, and taken, together with the said Arnold, and presented to the earle of Heinault, vnder whose dominion the Zelanders in those daies remained, of which god hap the earle and quene Isabell greatly reioiced.

Caxton.

In the time that the quene and hir sonne late in the court of the earle of Heinault, a marriage was concluded betwixt the prince of Wales, and the ladie Philip, daughter to the said earle, vpon certaine conditions, whereof one was, that the said erle should at his proper costs set ouer into England the said prince of Wales, with a crue of foure hundred men of armes. But whether there was any such marriage as then concluded, and that in consideration thereof, the earle of Heinault aided quene Isabell and hir sonne, it may be doubted, because other writers make no such report. Neuerthelesse, certaine it is, that the earls brother sir John de Heinault lord Beaumont, was appointed with certaine bands of men of armes, to the number of foure hundred or five hundred, to passe ouer with the said quene and hir sonne into England, and so thereupon began to make his purueiance for that iourne, which thing when it came to the knowledge of king Edward and the Spencers, they caused musters to be taken through the realme, and ordeined beacons to be set by, kept and watched, as well in the ballies by the sea side, as within the countries, vpon hills and high grounds, that the same vpon occasion of the enemies arrivall, might be set on fire, to warne the countries adjoining to assemble and resist them.

But quene Isabell and hir sonne, with such others as were with hir in Heinault, feared not their iourne for doubt of all their aduersaries provision, but immediatlie after that they had once made their purueiances, and were readie to depart, they took the sea, namely the quene, hir sonne, Edmund of Woodstoke earle of Kent, sir John de Heinault as foresaid, and the lord Roger Mortimer of Wigmore, a man of good experience in the warres, and diuerse others, having with them a small companie of Englishmen, with a crue of Heineuilers and Almains, to the number of 2757 armed men, the which sailing forth towards England, landed at length in Suffolke, at an haven called Drwell besides Harwich, the 25 daie of September. Immediatlie after that the quene and hir sonne were come to land, it was wonder to see how fast the people resorted vnto them; and first of all, the earle Sparshall, in whose land the first came on shore, repaired vnto hir, so did the earle of Leicester, and diuerse barons & knights of those parts, with all the prelates in manner of the land, as the bishops of Lincoln, Hereford, Dublin, and Elie, the which being ioined with the quene, made made a great armie. The archbishop of Canturburie and others aided hir with monie.

After that the had refreshed hir people a litte space at saint Edmundsburie, she marched forth to seeke the aduersaries of hir and of the realme, as she byruted it; but they still keeping themselves nere to the kings person, that under the shadow of the wings of his proteccion they might remaine in more safegard, durst not depart from his presence. At the tyme of the quenes landing he was at London, and being sore amazed with the newes, he required aid of the Londoners. They answered, that they would doo all the honour they might unto the king, the quene, and to their sonne the lawfull heire, of the land: but as for strangers & traitors to the realme, they would keepe them out of their gates, and resist them with all their forces: but to go forth of the citie further than that they might returne before sunne-setting, they refused, pretending certeine liberties in that behalfe to them granted in times past, as they alledged.

The king not greatlie liking of this answer, forthfied the tower, and leauing within it his yonger son John of Eltham, and the wife of the lord chamberleine Hugh Spenser the yonger that was his nece, he departed towards the marches of Wales, there to raise an armie against the quene. Before his departure from London, he set forth a proclamation, that euerie man under paine of forfeiting of life & goods, should resist them that were thus landed, assaile, and kill them, the quene, his sonne Edward, and his brother the earle of Kent onelie excepted; and whosoever could bring the head or dead corps of the lord Spensi-mer of Wigmore, should haue for his labour a thousand marks. The quenes proclamations on the other part willed all men to hope for peace, the Spensers publike enemies of the realme, and the lord chancellor Robert Baldocke, with their assistants onlie excepted, through whose meanes the present trouble was happened to the realme. And it was forbidden, that no man should take ought from any person, and who so euer could bring to the quene the head of Hugh Spenser the yonger, should haue two thousand pounds of the quenes gift.

Excester left in charge with the citie
of London.

The king at his departure from London, left master Walter Stapleton the bishop of Excester behind him, to haue the rule of the citie of London.
When shortly after, the quene with hir son, making towards London, wrote a letter to the maior, and the citizens, requiring to haue assistance for the putting downe of the Spensers, not onelie knowne enemies of theirs, but also common enemies to all the realme of England. To this letter no answer at the first was made, wherefore an other was sent, dated at Baldocke the first daie of October, vnder the names of Isabell by the grace of God quene of England, ladie of Ireland, and countesse of Pontieu, and of Edward eldest sonne to the king of England, duke of Guien, earle of Chester, of Pontien and of Muttrell.
This letter being directed to the maior and communaltie of London, containing in effect, that the cause of the landing and entring into the realme at that time, was onelie for the hono: of the king and wealth of the realme, meaning hurt to no maner of person, but to the Spensers, was fastened vpon the crosse in Cheape, then called the new crosse in Cheape, on the night before the ninth daie of October. Diuerse copies of the same letter were set by, and fastened vpon windowes and doores in other places of the citie, and one of the same copies was tacked vpon the lord maiors gates.

Flavian.
Thom. Walf.

After which letter thus published in the citie, a great number of artificers, and other that loued not to sit in rest vpon such occasion of discord offered; now that things were in boile in other parts of the realme, assembled in great numbers, & with swapon in hand came to the lord maior of the citie, whom they knew to fauor the kings part, & therefore they forced him through feare of some inuiolent violence, to receiue an oth to stand to their ordinance, which was to put to death all those that were aduersaries to the quene, or had by any meanes procured the hinde-rance of the cities liberties; vnder pretext of which oth they ran and toke one of the citizens, called John Barthall, who because he was verie familiar with the earle of Gloucester, and therefore suspected to haue accused the citizens, they strake off his head, and spoiled all his goods.

On the same day, being the fourteenth of October, continuing their rage, they ran to the house of the bishop of Excester, Walter de Stapleton, and setting fire on the gates, they entred and spoiled him of all his plate, iewels, monie and goods. And as it chanced in an infortunate houre for him, the bishop being at the same tyme returning from the fields, would not seeme to shrink, although he was admonished of these outrageous attempts of the people; but sitting on horsebacke, came to the north doore of St. Pauls, where forthwith the furious people laid violent hands on him, they drew him downe, and drew him most outragiously into Cheapestree, where they proclaimed him an open traitor, a seducer of the king, and a destroyer of their liberties. The bishop had vpon him a certeine cote of defense, which was called an aketon, the same therefore being plucked before his backe as all other his garments, they thore his head from his shoulders, and to the like death they put two of his seruants, the one an esquire, and the other a peoman, The bishops head was set on a pole for a spectacle, that the remembrance of his death, and the cause thereof might continue. His bodie was buried in an old churchyard of the pied friers, without any manner of crequies of funerall seruice done for him.

The chiefest cause of the enimitie which the Londoners bare towards this bishop, rose hereof. He being lord treasurer, procured that the iustices itinerants did sit in the citie of London, and where manie of the citizens were found offenders, and iustlie punished, as well by losing their freedoms, as by paieng their fines, and suffering corporall punishments, they conceined a great displeasure towards him. Moreover, it was said, that he had raised a great multitude of armed men against the quene, and hir son the duke of Aquitaine, and therefore did the Londoners (as they affirmed) seeke to prevent his proceedings.
¶ The morrow after that they had thus beheaded the bishop of Excester, they toke by chance sir John Welston constable of the tower, and from him they toke the keyes of the same tower, and so entering the tower, they set all the prisoners at libertie, and in like case all those that were imprisoned in maner through the land were permitted to go at large, and all the banished men and outlawes were likewise restored home.

The Londoners hauing the tower thus at their commandement, remoued all the officers therein placed by the king, and put other in their comes, in the name of the lord John de Eltham the kings son, whom they named warden of the citie and land. And yet they ceased not to commit manie robberies & other outrageous & most insolent parts. In the meane time, the king being come to Wyssow, left that citie in the keeping of the earle of Winchester. And with the earles of Gloucester and Arundell, and the lord chancellor sir Robert Baldocke, he sailed ouer into Wales, there to raise a power of Welshmen in defence of himselfe against the quene and hir adherents, which he had good hope to find amongst the Welsh.

Welshmen, because he had euer vsed them gentlie, and shewed no rigor towards them for their riotous misgouernance. Againe, he drew the rather into that part, that if there were no remedie, he might easilie escape ouer into Ireland, and get into some mounteine-countrie, marshy-ground, or other streit, where his enemies should not come at him.

But now to speake of the queene, yee most vnderstand, that after she had receiued knowledge from the Londoners, that they were wholie at hir deuotion, she being glad thereof, turned hir iournie toward Wales, to follow the king, and comming to Drenford, staid there a while, and still came people to hir from all sides. Where Adam de Doleton the bishop of Hereford, which latelie before had bene sore fined by the king, for that he was accused to stirre the people to rebellion, and to aid the barons (as yee haue heard) made a pible oration to the armie, declaring that the queene and hir sonne were returned onelie into England, to the intent to persecute the Spensers, & reforme the state of the realme. And sith then that they now were come in maner to an end of the tyrannye of most naughtie men, and of the danger that might growe daillie thereof, he exhorted them with patient minds to beare the small trauell that remained in pursuit of the enemies; and as for reuward, they might looke for all things by the victorie, and the queenes liberalitie, whose loue was such towards the common-wealth, as the onelie applied all hir endeouours and doings to the aduancement thereof.

These words spoken, the queene accompanied with a great power, departed from Drenford, and went straight vnto Glocester, and sent before hir vnto Bristol the earle of Kent, the kings brother, sir John of Pennegeth, with other, to take the earle of Winchester. They did their endeour with such diligence, that the towne men, compounding to be saued harmlesse in bodie and goods, deliuered the towne and castell vnto the queene, & to hir sonne the prince. In the meane time, there came to the queene at Glocester, the lord Percie, the lord Wake, and diuerse other, as well from the north parts, as south of the marches of Wales, so that hir armie hugelie increased.

From Glocester she passed by Berkley, and restored the castell of Berkley (which the earle of Glocester, Hugh Spenser the younger had held) vnto the lord Thomas Berkley, heire to the lord Spaurice Berkley latelie before deceased in prison, within the castell of Wallingford, together with all the appurtenances to the honor of Berkley belonging. From thence she went to Bristol, and the morrow after hir thither comming, being the euen of the apostles Simon and Jude, through the instant calling vpon of the people, the earle of Winchester was hanged forth in his cote armor vnto the common gallows, and there hanged. His head was after cut off, and sent to Winchester, whereof he was earle.

The king in this meane time kept not in one place, but shifting hither and thither, remained in great care. Wherevpon sir Thomas Blunt, an ancient knight, and lord steward of the kings house, toke his seruants, with Wittels, horses, and armour in great plentie, and came to the queene, of whom, and likewise of hir sonne he was iustly receiued, and diuerse of them with he brought with him were retined; and the other had letters of protection, and were sent awayne in longin making. The king with the earle of Glocester, and the lord chancellor, taking the sea, meant to haue gone either into the Ile of Man, or else vnto Ireland, but being tossed with contrarie winds for the space of a weeke together, at length he landed in Glamorgan shire, and got him to the abbete and castell of Peith, there secretly remaining vpon trust of the Welshmens promises. Hugoline Spenser, the sonne of the earle of Glocester, defended the castell of Kerlie, against the power of the queene and of hir sonne till easter following, and then compounding for the safetie of his owne life, and all theirs within that castell, and likewise for the inuoleng of their goods, he yelded it to the hands of the men of warre that held siege before it in the queenes name, and of hir sonne.

But now touching the king, whilst he was thus abroad, and no man wist where he was become, proclamations were made in the queenes armie daillie, in the which he was summoned to returne, and to take the rule of the reime into his hands, if he would be conformable to the minds of his true liege men; but when he appeared not, the lords of the land assembled in counsell at Hereford, whither the queene was come from Bristol, and there was the lord Edward prince of Wales and duke of Aquitaine made wardens of England, by common decre, vnto whom all men, as to the lord wardens of the realme, made fealtie, in receiuing an oth of allegiance to be faithfull and loiall to him. After this, they made the bishop of Norwich lord chancellor, and the bishop of Winchester lord treasurer.

The queene remained about a moneths space at Hereford, and in the meane while sent the lord Henrie erle of Leicester, and the lord William la Zouch, and one Ricc ap Howell, that was latelie deliuered out of the tower where he was prisoner, into Wales, to see if they might find means to apprehend the king by helpe of their acquaintance in those parts, all those of them hauing lands thereabouts, where it was knowne the king for the more part kept. They used such diligence in that charge, that finally with large gifts bestowed on the Welshmen, they came to vnderstand where the king was, and so on the day of saint Edmund the archbishop, being the sixteenth of November, they toke him in the monasterie of Peith, nere to the castell of Laturstan, together with Hugh Spenser the sonne called earle of Glocester, the lord chancellor Robert de Baldocke, and Simon de Reading the kings marshall, not caring for other the kings seruants, whom they suffered to escape.

The king was deliuered to the earle of Leicester, who conueied him by Spommouth and Leadburie, to Killingworth castell, where he remained the whole winter. The earle of Glocester, the lord chancellor, and Simon de Reading, were brought to Hereford, and there presented to the queene, where on the foure & twentieth of November, the said earle was hanged and hanged on a paire of gallows of fiftie fot in heighth. Then was his head striken off, his bowels taken out of his bodie and burnt, and his bodie diuided in quarters. His head was sent to London, and set vpon the bridge with other, & his quarters were sent to foure seuerall parts of the realme, and there pight vpon poles, to be seene of the people. He was hanged in his owne cote armour, about the which there were letters embzodered plaine to be read, containing a parcell of the 52 psalme, as followeth.

 5 Therefore shall God destroe thee for euer, he shall take thee, and plucke thee out of thy dwelling, and roote thee out of the land of the liuing, 6 The righteous also shall see this, and feare, and shall laugh him to scorne, 7 Lo this is the man that tooke not God for his strength, but trusted vnto the multitude of his riches, & strengthened himselfe in his wickednesse.

On the same daie was Simon de Reading byatone and hanged on the same gallowes, but ten foot lower than the other. This Reading being marshall of the kings house, had vsed the queene very vncourteouslie, giuing hir manie reprochfull words, which now were remembred, and therefore may serue for an example, how dangerous a thing it is to speake euill of the higher powers. The common fame went, that after this Hugh Spenser the sonne was taken, he would receiue no sustenance, wherefore he was the soner put to death, or else had he bene conueied to London, there to haue suffered. John earle of Arundell was taken on St. Hughes day, in the parts about Shrewsburie, and the same day seuen night before the execution of the earle of Gloucester, Hugh Spenser the younger, as well the said earle, who had bene euer a great friend to both the Spensers, as also John Daniell, and Thomas de Spilshelbeure were put to death at Hereford, by procurement of the lord Spertimer of Walsingham, that hated them extreamly, by reason whereof they were not like to speed much better, for what he willed the same was done, and without him the queene in all these matters did nothing.

The chancellor Robert de Waldoche being committed to the custodie of Adam de Loxleton bishop of Hereford, remained at Hereford in safe keeping till Candlemasse next, and then the bishop being at London, appointed him to be brought vp, where not without the bishops consent (as was thought) he was taken out of his house by violence, and laid in Fleetgate, where shortly after thorough inward sorow and extream greife of mind he ended his life. Thus the queene and hir companie hauing compassed their business in so hapie maner as they could wish, the with hir sonne and a great companie of lords and gentlemen repaired vnto Wallingford, where they kept Christmasse together with great joy and triumph, the king in the meane while remaining (as ye haue heard) at Killingworth, in a kind of honorable estate, although he was prisoner. ¶ After Christmasse, the queene with hir son and such lords as were then with them, remoued to London, where at their coming thither, which was before the feast of the Epiphanye, they were receiued with great joy, triumph, and large gifts, and so brought to Westminster, where the morrow after the same feast, the parlement which before hand had bene summoned began, in which it was concluded and fullie agreed by all the states (for none durst speake to the contrarie) that for diuerse articles which were put vp against the king, he was not worthy longer to reigne, and therefore should be deposed, and withall they willed to haue his sonne Edward duke of Aquitaine to reigne in his place. This ordinance was openlie pronounced in the great hall at Westminster by one of the lords, on the feast day of saint Hilarie being tuesday, to the which all the people consented. The archbishop of Canturburie taking his theame, Vox populi, vox Dei, made a sermon, exhorting the people to prate to God to bestow of his grace vpon the new king. And so when the sermon was ended, euery man departed to his lodging. But the duke of Aquitaine, when he perceiued that his mother took the matter heauilie in appearance, for that hir husband should be thus depriued of the crowne, he protested that he would neuer take it on him, without his fathers consent, and so there vpon it was concluded, that certeine solemne messengers should go to Killingworth to moue the king to make resignation of his crowne and title of the kingdome vnto his sonne.

There were sent on this message (as some write) thre or (as other haue) two bishops, two earles, two abbats, two or (as Tho. de la More and Walsingham haue) foure barons, and for euery countie, citie, and burrough, and likewise for the cinque ports, certeine knights and burgeises. The bishops that were sent were these (as T. de la More noteth) John de Stratford bishop of Winchester, Adam de Loxleton bishop of Hereford, and Henrie bishop of Lincoln. The two earles (as Southwell hath) were Lancaster and Warwike: the two barons, Kose and Courteney: beside these (as he saith) there were two abbats, two priors, two iustices, two friers of the order of preachers, two of the Carmelites, two knights for the commons on the north side of Trent, and two for the other on the south side of the same riuer: two citizens for London, two burgeises for the cinque ports, so as in all there went of this message (as Southwell saith) thre and twentie or rather foure and twentie persons of one degree and other.

None of the frier minors went, because they would not be the bringers of so heauie tidings, although they had euer borne them great god will. The bishops of Winchester and Lincoln went before, and coming to Killingworth, associated with them the earle of Leicester, of some called the earle of Lancaster, that had the king in keeping. And hauing secret conference with the king, they sought to fraigne his mind, so as he might be contented to resigne the crowne to his sonne, bearing him in hand, that if he refused to do, the people in respect of the euill will which they had conceiued against him, would not saile but proceeded to the election of some other, that should happilie not touch him in lineage. And although this was the onlie meane to bring the land in quiet, they willed him to consider how much he was bound in conscience to take that waie that should be so beneficiall to the whole realme.

The king being troubled with heate such displeased newes, was brought into a marvellous agone, but in the end, for the quiet of the realme and want of further damage to himselfe, he determined to follow their advice, and so when the other countenances were there, and the lord bishop of Hereford had declared the cause wherefore he was sent, the king in presence of them all pronounced his resignation of the crown and title of the kingdome, and so came to himselfe, he answered that he had to that he was taken into this miserie through his owne consent, and therefore he

he was contented patientlie to suffer it, but yet it could not be said but greave him, that he had in such wise runne into the hatred of all his people: notwithstanding he gaue the lords most heartie thanks, that they had so forgotten their receiued injuries, and ceased not to beare so much good will towards his sonne Edward, as to wish that he might reigne ouer them: Wherefore to satisfie them, with otherwise it might not be, he viterlie renounced his right to the kingdome, and to the whole administration thereof. And lastlie he besought the lords now in his miserie to forgiue him such offenses as he had committed against them. Ah lamentable ruine from roialtie to miserable calamitie, procured by them the selfe that should haue bene the pillars of the kings estate, and not the hooked engins to pull him downe from his throne! So that here we see it versed by trial, that

— miser atq; infelix est etiam rex, Nec quonquam (mihi crede) facit diadema beatum.

The ambassadours with this answer returning to London, declared the same vnto all the states, in order as they had receiued it, whereupon great top was made of all men, to consider that they might now by course of law proceed to the choosing of a new king. And so thereupon the nine and twentieth day of Januarie in session of parlement then at Westminster assembled, was the third king Edward, sonne to king Edward the second, chosen and elected king of England, by the authoritie of the same parlement, first as before is said) confirmed by his fathers resignation: and the first day of his reigne they agreed to be the five and twentieth of Januarie: in the yeare 1326 after the account of the church of England, beginning the yeare the five & twentieth day of March, but by the common account of writers, it was in the yeare 1327. ¶ On the same daie sir William Trussell procurator for the whole parlement did renounce the old king in name of the whole parlement, with all homages and fealties due to him, so that the same five and twentieth day of Januarie hath bene reputed and taken for the first day of the beginning of king Edward the third his reigne, so that whatsoever chanced before that day, is ascribed to be done during the reigne of his father.

But now to make an end of the life, as well as of the reigne of king Edward the second, I find that after he was deposed of his kingle honour and title, he remained for a time at Killingworth, in custodie of the earle of Leicester. But within a while the queene was informed by the bishop of Hereford, (whose hatred towards him had no end) that the erle of Leicester fauoured his husband too much, and more than stood with the suertie of his sonnes state, whereupon he was appointed to the keeping of two other lords, Thomas Berkeley, and John Spattreurs, who receiuing him of the earle of Leicester the third of Aprill, conueied him from Killingworth vnto the castell of Berkeley, situate not farre off from the river of Seuerne, almost the midwaie betwixt Gloucester and Bristol.

But so much as the lord Berkeley used him more courteouslie than his aduersaries wished him to doe, he was discharged of that office, and sir Thomas Courney appointed in his stead, who together with the lord Spattreurs conueied him secretlie (for feare least he should be taken from them by force) from one strong place to another, as to the castell of Cozse, and such like, still remouing with him in the night season, till at length they thought it should not be knowen whether they had conueied him. And so at length they brought him backe againe in secret manner vnto the castell of Berkeley, where whilest he remained (as some write) the queene would send vnto him courteous and louing letters with apparell and other such things, but she would not once come nere to visit him, bearing him in hand that she durst not, for feare of the peoples displeasure, who hated him so extreemlie. Howbeit, the with the rest of his confederats had (no doubt) laid the plot of their deuise for his dispatch, though by painted words she pretended a kind of remorse to him in this his distresse, & would seeme to be faultlesse in the sight of the world; for Proditor ille dicit verbis dum verbera cadit.

But as he thus continued in prison, closelie kept; so that none of his friends might haue access vnto him, as in such cases it often happeneth, when men be in miserie, some will euer pitte their state, there were diuerse of the nobilitie (of whom the earle of Kent was chiefe) began to deuise means by secret conference had together, how they might rescue him to libertie, discommending greatlie both queene Isabella, and such other as were appointed gouernours to the yong king, for his fathers streit imprisonment. The queene and other the gouernours understanding this conspiracie of the earle of Kent, and of his brother, durst not yet in that new and greene world go about to punish it, but rather thought good to take a waie from them the occasion of accomplishing their purpose. And hereupon the queene and the bishop of Hereford wrote sharpe letters vnto his keepers, blaming them greatlie, for that they dealt so gentlie with him, and kept him no stricter, but suffered him to haue such libertie, that he aduertised some of his friends abroad how and in what manner he was used, and withall the bishop of Hereford vnder a philosophical forme of words signified to them by his letters, that they should dispatch him out of the waie, the tenor whereof wrapped in obscuritie ran thus:

Edwardum occidere nolite timere bonum est:

To kill Edward will not to feare it is good.

Which riddle or doubtfull kind of speech, as it might be taken in two contrarie senses, onelie by placing the point in orthographie called Coma, they construed in the worse sense, putting the Coma after Timere, and so presuming of this commandement as they toke it from the bishop, they lodged the miserable prisoner in a chamber ouer a foule filthie dungeon, full of dead carrion, trusting so to make an end of him, with the abhominable stinck thereof: but he bearing it out stronglie, as a man of a tough nature, continued still in life, so as it seemed he was verie like to escape that danger, as he had by purging either vp or downe auoided the force of such poison as had bene ministred to him sundrie times before, of purpose so to rid him.

Whereupon when they sawe that such practises would not serue their turne, they came suddenly one night into the chamber where he late in bed fast asleep, and with heauie featherbeds or a table (as some write) being cast vpon him, they kept him down and withall put into his fundament an horne, and through the same they thrust vp into his bodie an hot spit, or (as other haue) through the pipe of a trumpet a plumbers instrument of iron made verie hot, the which passing vp into his intrailles, and being rolled to and fro, burnt the same, but so as no appearance of any wound or hurt outwardlie might be once perceived. His crie did moue manie within the castell and towne of Berkeley to compassion, plainelie hearing him utter a wailfull noise, as the tormentors were about to murder him, so that diuerse being awaked therewith (as they themselves confessed) prayed heartilie to God to receiue his soule, when they understood by his crie what the matter ment.

The queene, the bishop, and others, that their tyrannie might be hid, outlawed and banished the lord Spattreurs, and Thomas Courney, who sieng vnto parcels, thre yeares after being knowen, taken, &c.

The nature & disposition of king Edward the second.

and brought toward England was beheaded on the sea, least he should accuse the chiefe owners, as the bishop and other. John Patrevers, repenting himselfe, laie long hidden in Germanie, and in the end died penitentie. Thus was king Edward murdered, in the yeare 1327, on the 22 of September. The same went that by this Edward the second, after his death manie miracles were wrought. So that the like opinion of him was conceived as before had bene of earle Thomas of Lancaster, namely amongst the common people. He was knowne to be of a good and courteous nature, though not of most pregnant wit. And albeit in his youth he fell into certeine light crimes, and after by the companie and counsell of euill men, was induced vnto more heinous vices, yet was it thought that he purged the same by repentance, and patientlie suffered manie reproches, and finally death it selfe (as before ye haue heard) after a most cruell manner. He had suerlie good cause to repent his former trade of liuing, for by his indiscreet and wanton misgouernance, there were headed and put to death during his reigne (by iudgement of law) to the number of 28 barons and knights, ouer and besides such as were slaine in Scotlands by his infortunate conduct.

All these mischeues and manie more happened not onlie to him, but also to the whole state of the realme, in that he wanted iudgement and prudent discretion to make choise of sage and discret counsellors, receiving those into his fauour, that abused the same to their priuate gaine and aduantage, not respecting the aduancement of the common-wealth, so they themselves might attaine to riches and honour, for which they onelie sought, in somuch that by their courteous rapine, spoile, and immoderate ambition, the hearts of the common people & nobilitie were quite estranged from the dutifull loue and obedience which they ought to haue shewed to their soueraigne, going about by force to wrest him to follow their wils, and to seeke the destruction of them whome he commonly fauoured, wherein suerlie they were worthe of blame, and to tast (as manie of them did) the deserved punishment for their disobedient and dissolall demeanours. For it was not the waie which they toke to helpe the disfigured state of the common-wealth, but rather the readie meane to ouerthrow all, as if Gods goodnesse had not bene the greater it must needs haue come to passe, as to those that shall well consider the pittifull tragedie of this kings time it may well appeare.

But now to proceed with that which remaineth touching this infortunate prince. He had issue by his wife quene Isabell two sonnes, Edward which was made king whilist he was yet aliue, and John which died young: also two daughters, Elianor which died before she came to yeares able for marriage; and Jane which was after giuen in marriage vnto David king of Scotland. He was indifferentlie tall of stature, strong of bodie, and healthfull, neither wanted there in him stoutnesse of stomach, if his euill counsellors had bene remoued, that he might haue shewed it in honorable exploits, which being kept backe by them, he could not do. So that thereby it appeareth of what importance it is to be trained vp in youth with good and honest companie. ¶ It is said that he was learned, in somuch that there remaine verses, which (as some haue written) he made whilist he was in prison. Certeine it is he fauored learning, as by the erection of Oxall colledge in Oxford, & S. Maries hall, which were of his foundation, it may well be gathered.

Learned men we find recorded by Bale, to liue in this kings time these as follow. John Duns that subtill logician, borne (as Leland hath gathered) in a village in Northumberland called Emblune, three miles distant from Alntwike, although other hold the contrarie, the Scots claiming him for their countryman, and the Irishmen for theirs; Robert Walsingham a Carmelite frier that writ diuerse treatises, John Wilton an Augustine frier, Walter Wintborne, Rafe Locksley, Nicholas Stanford, William Whitley, Thomas Joice, Walter Joice, William Gainsburgh, Robert Basson borne not farre from Nottingham, a Carmelite frier of Scarburgh, the same whome king Edward toke with him into Scotland to write some remembrances of his victories, although being taken by the Scots, he was constrained by Robert Bruce to frame a dittie to a contrary tune; John Wozminger a Suffolke man borne, William Rishanger a monke of S. Albons an historiographer, Rafe Baldoche bishop of London wrote also an historie, which was intituled Historia Anglica; Richard Bliton a Lincolnshire man borne a Carmelite frier, John Walsingham borne either in Walsingham or Runham (as Bale supposeth) a Carmelite frier also, and wrote diuerse treatises; Thomas Chabham a canon of Salisbury and a doctor of diuinitie, Robert Plimpton borne in Devonshire a regular canon, Thomas Calfesford a monke of Pomfret, William Spansfield, John Canon, Robert Grime, William Abettelle of Wenerley, Geoffrey of Coznewall, John Gattisden, Rafe bald Anglicus, Stephan Eiton or Eton, John Goldstone borne in Woxheshire, John Winchelsey, Nicholas de Lyza a Jew by birth of those that had their habitations in England, who wrote verie manie treatises, to his great commendation for his singular knowledge and zeale, which he shewed in disputing the Rabines that still sought to keepe the Jewish nation in blindness and vaine hope, in looking for another Messias; Rafe Aton an excellent diuine, John Dumbleton a logician, Thomas Langford borne in Maldon in Essex a logician, Albert Pickenham a Carmelite frier of Lin in Northfolke, Nicholas Okeham a graic frier, William Ockham a frier minor that wrote diuerse treatises, and namely against John Duns, and likewise against John the thre and twentieth pope of that name in fauour of the emperour Letwes of Bauier, Richard Walsingford, Thomas Haleswood a canon of Leeds in Kent wrote a chronicle called Chronicon compendiarium, Robert Barre, Robert Perescutator borne in Woxheshire a blacke frier and a philosopher or rather a magician, Richard Welgrane a Carmelite, Winkley a minorite; and others.

Conceit appoi

Thus far infortunat Edward the second.

The les of the confid

Edward the third, who came to the crowne by the resignation of his father Edward the second.

Edward the third of that name, the sonne of Edward the second, and of Isabell the onelie daughter of Philip le Beau, & sister to Charles the first king of France, began his reigne as king of England, his father yet living, the 25 daie of Januarie, after the creation 5293, in the peare of our lord 1327, after the account of them that begin the peare at Christmasse, 867 after the coming of the Saxons, 260 after the conquest, the 13 peare of the reigne of Lewes the fourth then emperor, the seventh of Charles the first king of France, the second of Andronicus Junior emperor of the east almost ended, and about the end of the 22 of Robert le Bruce king of Scotland. He was crowned at Westminster on the day of the Purification of our lady next ensuing, by the hands of Walter the archbishop of Cantuarburie.

Governours appointed,

And because he was but fourteene peares of age, so that to governe of himselfe he was not sufficient, it was decreed that twelve of the greatest lords within the realme should haue the rule and government till he came to more perfect peares. The names of which lords were as followeth. The archbishop of Cantuarburie, the archbishop of Yorke, the bishops of Winchester and of Hereford, Henrie earle of Lancaster, Thomas Brotherton earle marshall, Edmund of Woodstocke earle of Kent, John earle of Warren, the lord Thomas Wake, the lord Henrie Percy, the lord Eliu de Ingtham, & the lord John Roos. These were sworn of the kings counsell, and charged with the government as they would make answer. But this ordinance continued not long: for the queene, and the lord Roger Mortimer took the whole rule so into their hands, that both the king and his said counsellors were governed onelie by them in all matters both high and low. Nevertheless, although they had taken the regiment upon them, yet could they not foresee the tumults and byroz that presentlie upon the yong kings inheriting did intue: but needs it must come to passe that is left written where children weare the crowne, & beare the scepter in hand, Pauperi terra sapissime sunt ibi guerra.

The franchises of the cite of London confirmed.

He confirmed the liberties and franchises of the cite of London, and granted that the maior of the same cite for the time being might sit in all places of iudgement within the liberties thereof for cheefe iustice, above all other, the kings person onelie excepted; and that everie alderman that had bene maior should be iustice of peace through all the cite of London and countie of Middlesex; and everie alderman that had not bene maior, should be iustice of peace within his owne ward. He granted also to the citizens, that they should not be constrained to go forth of the cite to anie warres in defense of the land, and that the franchises of the cite should not be seized from thenceforth into the kings hands for anie cause, but onelie for treason and rebellion shewed by the whole cite. Also Southwarke was appointed to be vnder the rule of the cite, and the maior of London to be bailiffe of Southwarke, and to ordeine such a substitute in the same borough as pleased him.

In the first peare of this kings reigne, we find in records belonging to the abbey of S. Edmundsburie in Suffolke, that the inhabitants of that towne raised a fore commotion against the abbat & monks of the same abbey, and that at severall times, as first on the wednesdaie next after the feast of the conversion of S. Paule, in the said first peare of this kings reigne, one Robert Forston, Richard Daiton, and a great number of other, assembling themselves together in warlike order and arate, assaulted the said abbey, brake downe the gates, windowes, and doores, entered the house by force, and assailing certeine monks and servants that belonged to the abbat, did beat, wound, and euill intreat them, brake open a number of chests, coffers, and forsets, took out chalices of gold and silver, books, vestments, and other ornaments of the church, beside a great quantitie of rich plate, and other furniture of household, apparell, armour, and other things, beside five hundred pounds in readie coine, & also three thousand florens of gold.

All these things they took and caried awaie, together with diuerse charters, writings, & miniments, as three charters of Knute sometime king of England, foure charters of king Hardiknute, one charter of king Edward the confessor, two charters of king Henrie the first, & other two charters of king Henrie the third, which charters concerned as well the foundation of the same abbey, as the grants and confirmations of the possessions and liberties belonging thereto. Also they took awaie certeine writings obligatorie, in the which diuerse persons were bound for the paiement of great summes of monie, and deliuerie of certeine wines unto the hands of the said abbat. Whereupon they took awaie with them ten severall bulls, concerning certeine exemptions and immunities granted to the abbats and monks of Burie by sundrie bishops of Rome.

Furthermore, not herewith contented, they took Peter Clopton prior of the said abbey, and other monks forth of the house, and leading them unto a place called the Leaden hall, there imprisoned them, till the thursdaie next before the feast of the Purification of our lady, and that daie bringing them backe againe into the chapter-house, detained them still as prisoners, till they had sealed a writing, containing that the abbat and convent were bound in ten thousand pounds to be paid to Oliver Kempe and others by them named. And further, they were constrained to seale a letter of release for all actions, quarrels, debts, transgressions, suits and demands, which the abbat might in any wise claime or prosecute against the said Oliver Kempe and others in the same letters named.

For these wrongs and other, as for that they would not permit the abbats bailiffes and officers to keepe their ordinarie courts as they were accustomed to do, as well thre daies in the weeke for the market, to wit, mondaie, wednesdaie and fridaie, as the Portman mote euerie tuesdaie thre weeks, and further prohibit them from gathering such tols, customes, and yearelie rents, as were due to the abbat for certeine tenements in the towne, which were let to farme, the abbat brought his action against the said Morton, Draiton, and others, and hauing it tried by an inquest, on the fridaie next after the feast of saint Lucie the virgine, in a sessions holden at Burie by John Stonore, Walter Friskney, Robert Habershope, & John Bouffer, by vertue of the kings writ of oier and determiner to them directed, the offenders were condemned in 4000 pounds, so that the said Richard Draiton, and others there present in the court, were committed to prison in custodie of the shiriffe Robert Walkesare, who was commanded also to apprehend the other that were not yet arrested, if within his bailiwike they might be found, and to haue their bodies before the said iustices at Burie asoforsaid, on thurdaie in Whitsonweke next ensuing.

Beside this, there was an other inditement and action of trespassse found there the same daie against the said Richard Draiton and others, for a like disorder and riot by them committed, on the thursday next after the feast of the Purification of our ladie, in the same first yeare of this king, at what time they did not onelie breake into the abbeie, and beat the abbats men, but also toke the abbat himselfe, being then at home, with certeine of his monks, keeping both him and them as prisoners, till the next daie that they were constrained to seale certeine writings. And amongst other, a charter, in which it was contained, that the abbat and his conuent did grant unto the inhabitants of the towne of Burie, to be a corporation of themselves, and to haue a common seale with a gild of merchants and aldermen: also they were compelled to seale another charter, wherein was contained a grant to the said inhabitants, that they should haue the custodie of the towne gates, and likewise the wardship of all pupils and orphans within the same towne, beside diuerse other liberties.

Moreover, they were in like manner constrained to seale thre seuerall obligations, in which the abbat and conuent were bound to the said inhabitants, as to a communalitie of a corporation, in seauen thousand pounds, as in two thousand by one obligation, and in two thousand by an other, and in three thousand by the third obligation: and further they were bound to seale a letter of release of all trespassses, and other things that might be demanded against the said inhabitants, with a generall acquittance of all debts. Beside this, the said riotous persons toke at the same time forth of the abbeie great riches, as well in plate, armor, books, & apparell, as in other things. They also brake downe two houses or messuages, that belonged to the abbeie, and situate within the towne of Burie: they also destroyed his fish-ponds, and toke out such store of fish as they found in the same: they cut downe also thre scope ashes there growing on the soile that belonged to the said abbat, and did make other great outrages and enormities, so that it was found by the inquest, that the abbat was damaged to the value of other forty thousand pounds.

These riots may seeme greuous and verie strange, but yet the same were not so heinoussly taken, as an other which the said inhabitants of Burie attempted against the said abbeie in manner of a plaine commotion, upon saint Lukes day in the same yeare, at what time (as by the records of that abbeie it should appeare) both the abbat and his house were in the kings speciall protection, and the said inhabitants prohibited by his letters to attempt any iniurie against him or his conuent. But neuerthelesse we find that not onelie the inhabitants of Burie, but also a great number of other misgouerned persons, that resorted to them from places there about, armed and furnished with horse, armor and weapons, after the manner of warre, came and assaulted the abbeie gates, set fire on them, and burned them with diuerse other houses nere adjoining, that belonged to the abbeie, and continued in that their riotous enterprise all that day and the night following.

The same night also they burnt a manor of the abbats called Holdernesle barne, with two other manors called the Almoners barne, and Haberdone, also the granges that stood without the south gate, and the manour of Westlie, in which places they burned in cozne & graine, to the value of a thousand pounds. The next daie they entered into the abbeie court, and burnt all the houses on the north side, as stables, brewhouses, bakehouses, garners, and other such necessarie houses and convenient rooms of offices; and on the other side the court, they burnt certeine houses belonging to the Almonrie. On the next daie they burned the mote hall, and Wadford hall, with the new hall, and diuerse chambers and sollers to the same halles annexed, with the chapell of saint Laurence at the end of the hospitall hall. Also the manor of Eldhall, the manor of Hoisinger, with all the cozne and graine within and about the same.

The next day they burnt the soller of the Sollerer, with a chapell there: also the kitchin, the larder, and a part of the farmarie. On the thurdaie they burnt the residue of the farmarie, and the lodging called the blacke lodging, with a chapell of S. Andrew therein. In executing of all these riotous disorders, one Geseffrie Poxeman was an aider, who with diuerse other persons unknowne, departed forth of the towne of Burie, and by the assent of the other his complices he burnt the manor of Foznham. The same day also he burnt the manor of Foznham. The same day also other of their companie, as William the sonne of James Pekeston, Rafe Grubbe, Richard Kerte, and a great number of other persons unknowne, by the assent and abbetment of the other that committed the said disorders, burnt two manors belonging also to the said abbeie in great Werton, with all the cozne and graine there found.

Upon knowledge had of these great riots, and perillous commotions, there was a commission directed from the king, unto Thomas earle of Northfolke, high marshall of England, to Thomas Bardulfe, Robert Sparlie, Peter Medall, John Howard, and John Walkesare, authorizing them with the power of the countesse of Suffolke and Northfolke, to apprehend, trie and punish such lewd disordered persons, and rebellious malefactors, which had committed such felonious enterprises, to the breach of the kings peace, and dangerous disquieting of his subjects; but the said commissioners proceeded not according to the effect of their commission in trial of any felonies by the same persons committed and done, but onelie caused them to be indicted of trespassse: albeit Robert Walkesare, and John Clauer, with their associates iustices of peace, in their sessions holden at Clueden the tuesdaie next after the feast of the apostles Simon and Jude, in the said first yeare of this king Edward the third proceeded in such wise against the said malefactors, that John de Barton cordwainer, Robert Forton, and a great number of other were indicted of felonie, for the misdemeanours afore mentioned, and the indictments so found were after sent and presented unto John Stonore, Walter de Friskene, Robert Spalberthorpe, and John Bousler, who by vertue of the kings commission of oier and determiner to them directed, sat at S. Edmunds burie the wednesdaie next after the feast of saint Lucie the virgin; and then and there sent forth precepts to the shiriffe, commanding him to apprehend the said Barton, Forton, and others, that were indicted of the foresaid felonies, and also to returne a sufficient iurie to trie upon their arreignment the said malefactors by order of law, the fridaie next after the said feast of S. Lucie. Hereupon Alan de Latoner, and Robert Walling, with seauentene others, being arreigned, were found guiltie, and suffered death according to the order appointed for felons.

One Adam Spiniot stood mute, and refused to be tried by his countie, and so was pressed to death, as the law in such case appointeth. Diuerse other were saved by their wokes, according vnto the order of clerkes conuict, as Alexander Wyd person of Hoge set, John Kugham person of little Wilmetham, John Barton cordwainer, and diuerse other. Some were respited, as one woman named Julian Warbo, who being big belied was respited, till she were deliuered of child. Benedict Sio and Robert Russell were respited, and committed to the safe keeping of the shiriffe, as triers or appeachers (as we terme them) of other offenders: and because there was not anie as yet attached by their appeales, they were commanded againe to prison. One Robert de Creswell was saved by the kings letters of speciall pardon, which he had there ready to shew. As for Robert Forton, Adam Cokefield, and a great number of other, whome the shiriffe was commanded to apprehend, he returned that he could not heare of them within the precinct of his bailiffeweke, whereupon erigents were awarded against them, and the shiriffe was commanded, that if he might come to attach them, he should not faile but so to do, and to haue their bodies there at Burie before the said iustices, the thursdaie in Whitfunweke, next ensuing.

Diuerse also were arreigned at the same time of the said felonies, and thereof acquitted, as Michaell Scabaille, Kase Smeremonger, and others. Indeede those that were found guiltie, and suffered, were the chiefe authors and procurors of the commotion, bearing others in hand, that the abbat had in his custodie a certeine charter, wherein the king should grant to the inhabitants of the towne of Burie, certeine liberties, whereby it might appeare that they were free, and discharged from the payment of diuerse customs and exactions, whereupon the ignorant multitude easilie giuing credit to such furnished tales, were the sooner induced to attempt such disorders as before are mentioned. ¶ Thus haue ye heard all in effect that was done in this first yeare of king Edward the third his reigne, by and against those offenders. But because we will not interrupt matters of other yeares with that which followed further of this businesse, we haue thought good to put the whole that we intend to write thereof here in this place.

Ye shall therefore vnderstand, that diuerse of those, against whome erigents were awarded, came in, and yelded their bodies to the shiriffes prison, before they were called on the first countie daie. Albeit a great manie there were that came not, and so were outlawed. Robert Forton got the kings pardon, and so purchasing forth a supercedeas, the suit thereupon against him was staied. The shiriffe therefore in Whitfunweke, in the second yeare of this kings reigne, made his returne touching Benedict Sio, Robert Russell, & Julian Warbo, so that he deliuered them vnto the bailiffes of the libertie of the abbat of Burie, by reason of an ancient priuilege, which the abbat claimed to belong to his house. The bailiffes confessed they had receiued the said prisoners, but forsomuch as they had bene arreigned at a Portmante mote, which was vsed to be kept euerie three weeks, and vpon their arreignment were found guiltie of certeine other felonies by them committed within the towne of Burie, and thereupon were put to execution, Adam Finchman the kings attornie there toke it verie euill, & laid it grauenously to the charge of the abbats officers, for their hastie and presumptuous proceeding against the said prisoners, namelic, because the said Sio and Russell were respited, to the end that by their vtterance, many heinous offences might haue bene brought to light.

On the same daie, that is to wit, the thursdaie in Whitfunweke, the foresaid Robert Forton, and diuerse other came in, and were attached by the shiriffe to answer the abbat to his action of trespassse, which he brought against them, and putting the matter to the triall of an inquest, they were condemned in sixtie thousand pounds, to be leuted of their goods and chattels, vnto the vse of the abbat, and in the meane time they were committed to prison. But first they made suit that they might be put to their fines for their offenses committed against the kings peace, and their request in that behalfe was granted, so that vpon putting in sufficient suerties for their good behauiour, their fines were assessed, as some at more and some at lesse, as the case was thought for to require.

Thus rested the matter a long season after, vntill the fifth yeare of this kings reigne, in which the thursdaie next after the feast of the blessed Trinitie, the B. being himselfe in person at S. Edmundsburie afore said, a small agreement and concord was concluded betwixt the said abbat and his conuent on the one partie, and Richard Draiton and others of the inhabitants of that towne on the other partie, before the right reuerend father in God John bishop of Winchester and chancelor of England, and the kings iustices John Stonore and John Cantbridge sitting there at the same tyme, by the kings commandement. The effect of which agreement was as followeth.

The articles of agreement betweene the monks of Burie and the inhabitants of Burie.

First, wheras the said abbat had recovered by iudgement before the said John Stonore and other his associates iustices of oier and determiner in the said towne of Burie, the summe of seuen score thousand pounds for trespassses to him and his house committed and done by the said Richard Draiton, and other the inhabitants of Burie: now at the desire of the said king, and for other good respects him mouing, he pardoned and released vnto the said Richard Draiton, and to other the inhabitants of Burie, to their heires, executors, and assigns the summe of 12333 pounds, eight shillings eight pence, of the said tall summe of 14000 pounds.

And further the said abbat and convent granted and agreed for them and their successors, that if the said Richard Wratton, & other the inhabitants of the said towne of Burie, or any of them, their heires, executors or assignes, should paie to the said abbat & convent, or their successors within twentie yeares next insuing the date of that present agreement, 2000 marks, that is to saie, 1000 marks yearelie at the feasts of S. Michael & Easter, by even portions: that then the said Richard & other the inhabitants of the towne of Burie should be acquitted & discharged of 4000 marks, parcel of 17666 pounds, thirtene shillings foure pence residue behind for ever.

Moreover, whereas the said abbat and convent, & the said abbat by himselfe, since the 19 yeare of the reigne of king Edward the second unto that present time, had sealed certeine charters, deeds, & writings, as well with the proper seale of the abbat, as with the common seale of the abbat & convent, if the said Richard and the inhabitants of the said towne of Burie did restore unto the said abbat & convent all the same writings, or take such order, that neither the abbat nor convent be impleaded, or in any wise hindered, indamaged nor molested by force of the same: and further if neither the said Richard, nor any the inhabitants of the said towne, nor their heires, executors, nor assignes, shall go about to reverse the iudgements against them, at the suit of the said abbat, nor shall seeke to impeach the executions of the same iudgements by any false or forged acquitances or releases, nor implead nor molest any of the iurie, by whom they were convicted, that then they and their heires, executors & assignes shall be acquitted & discharged of ten thousand pounds parcel of the said 17666 pounds, 13 shillings foure pence.

And furthermore, if the said Richard and other the inhabitants of the said towne of Burie, do not hereafter maliciouslie rise against the said abbat or convent, nor seeke to vex them by any conspiracie, confederacie, or by some other secret uniuersall cause, nor likewise euill intreat any man by reason of the inditement found against them, nor yet claime to haue any corporation of themselves within that towne, that then the said Richard, & the said inhabitants, their heires, successors & assignes, shall remaine acquitted and discharged of all the residue of the said 17666 pounds, thirtene shillings foure pence for ever. And the said abbat and convent do grant for them & their successors, that their intention is not, that if any singular person of his owne private malice, shall rise against the said abbat and convent, their successors, monks, bailiffes, or seruants, to do them, or any of them iniurie or dispacure: that those which be not partakers of the offense, shall be in any wise punished for the same, so that the offenders be not maintained by any of the same towne, but that the inhabitants there, do assist the abbat and convent their successors, bailiffes, seruants & officers, that the same offenders may be punished, according to their demerits, as reason and law shall allow.

This was the effect of the agreement at length had and made betwixt the abbat and monks of Burie on the one part, & the inhabitants of that towne on the other part, and for the more confirmation thereof, it pleased the king to put his seale to the charter containing the same agreement. ¶ But how soeuer it chanced, it should appeare by such records as came to the hands of master John Fox, as he alledgeth in the first tome of his booke of acts and monuments, this agreement was but soilie kept: for diuerse of the former offenders, bearing grudge towards the abbat for breaking promise with them at London, did confederat themselves together, and priuie in the night coming to the manour of Oxenington where the abbat then did lie, burst open the gates, and entering by force, first bound all his seruants, and after they had robbed the house, they took the abbat, and spauing him, secretly conueied him to London, and there removing him from street to street unknowne, had him ouer the Thames into Kent, and at length transported him ouer into Wilt in Wabanc, where they kept him for a time in much penurie, shalldome and miserie, untill at length the matter being understood, they were all excommunicate, first by the archbishop, & after by the pope. At the last, his friends having knowledge where he was, they found means to deliver him out of the hands of those thieues, and finally brought him home with procession, and so he was restored to his house againe.

Thus much touching those troubles betwixt the towne of Burie & the abbat and monks there, and now we will returne to other generall matters touching the publike state of the realme. ¶ And first you shall vnderstand, that in the beginning of this kings reigne the land trulie seemed to be blessed of God for the earth became fruitful, the aire temperate, and the sea calme and quiet. This king though he was as yet vnder the gouernement of other, neuertheless he began within a short time to shew tokens of great forwardnesse, framing his mind unto graue deuises, and first he prepared to make a loinie against the Scottisshmen, the which in his fathers time had done so manie displeasures to the Englishmen, and now vpon confidence of his minority, ceased not to invade the borders of his realme. And namely the verie selfe night that followed the day of this kings coronation, they had thought by scaling to haue stolne the castell of Roxham: but Robert Spencers capteine of that place, vnderstanding of their enterpryse aforehand by a Scottisshman of the garison there, so well provided for their coming, that where firste of them boldie entred vpon the wall, he slue nine or ten of them, and took five.

This was thought an euill token, that they should still be put to the losse in this kings time, as they had so had successe in the verie beginning of his reigne: but they continuing in their malicious purposes, about saint Margarets tide invaded the land with three armies, the earle of Surrey hauing the leading of one of the same armies, and James Douglas of another, and the third was guided by the earle of Mar. King Edward aduertised hereof, assembled not onelie a great poiser of Englishmen, but also required John lord Beaumont de Heimaull, whome he had lately sent home right honorable rewarded for his good assistance, to come againe into England, with certeine bands of men at armes, and he should receiue wages and good intertainment for for them. The lord Beaumont, as one that loved dards of armes, was glad to accomplish king Edwards request: and so thereupon with seauen hundred men at armes, or five hundred (as Froissart saith) came ouer into England againe, to serue against the Scots.

The generall assemblie of the armie was appointed to be at Porke, and thither came the said lord Beaumont with his people, and was tofullie recei-ued of the king and his lords. Here whyles not one-lie the Scottish ambassadours (which had bene sent to treat of peace, were heard to tell their message) but also whyles the counsell toke some leisure in debating the matter how to guide their enterprise, which they had now in hand: vpon Trinitie fundate, it chanced that there arose contention within the ci-tie of Porke, betwixt the English archers, and the strangers, which the lord Beaumont of Heinault had brought with him, in somuch that fighting together there were slaine to the number of foure score persons of those archers, which were buried within the church of saint Clement in Fosgate. Some write that there were slaine to the number of thre hundred Englishmen: yet because the Henriches came to aid the king, their peace was cried vpon paine of life. And further, it was found by an inquest of the ci-tie, that the quarrell was begun by the Englishmen, the which (as some write) were of the Lincolneshire men, of those that sometime belonged to the Spen-sers, and to the earle of Arundell, so that there was cause, whie they bare euill will to the Henriches which had aided (as yee haue heard) to bring the said earle and Spensers to their confusion.

In this meane time the Scots being entred into England, had done much hurt, and were come as farre as Stanop parke in Wilredale: and though they had sent their ambassadours to treat with the king and his counsell for peace, yet no conclusion followed of their talke. At the same time, because the English souldiours of this armie were cloathed all in cotes and hoods embroidered with floures and branches verie semelie, and used to nourish their beards: the Scots in derision thereof made a rime, which they fastened vpon the church doores of saint Peter toward Stangate, containing this that fol-loweth.

Long beards, hartlesse, Painted hoods, witlesse, Gaie cotes, gracelesse, Make England thirlesse.

The king when he saw it was but a vaine thing to staie anie longer in communication with the ambassadours about peace, departed from Porke with his puissant armie, and getting knowledge how the Scots were closette lodged in the woods of Stan-op parke, he came and stopped all the passages, so it was thought that he should haue had them at his pleasure, but through treason (as was after reported) of the lord Roger Mortimer, after that the Scots had bene kept within their lodgings for the space of fifene daies, till they were almost famished, they did not onelie find a waie out, but about two hundred of them under the leading of the lord William Douglas, assailing that part of the English campe where the kings tent stood, in the night season, missed not much of either taking the king or sleieng him: and hauing done hurt enough otherwise, as in the Sco-tish chronicle is also touchd, they followed their com-panie, and with them returned into Scotland without impeachment.

It is said, that Henrie earle of Lancaster, and John the lord Beaumont of Heinault would gladlie haue passed ouer the water of Wille, to haue assal-ted the Scots, but the earle of March through counsell of the lord Mortimer, pretending to haue right to the leading of the fore ward, and to the giuing of the first onset, would not suffer them. Howsoeuer it was the king missed his purpose, and right penfule therefore, brake vp his field, and returned vnto London.

¶ Walter bishop of Canturburie departed this life in Nouember, and then Simon Peperham was aduanced to the gouernement of that see. The lord Beaumont of Heinault was honorable rewarded for his paines and trauell, and then licenced to returne into his countrie, where he had not bene long, but that through his means then (as some write) the marriage was concluded betwene king Edward, and the ladie Philip daughter to William earle of Heinault, and neece to the said lord Beaumont, who had the charge to see hir brought ouer thither into England about Christmasse: where in the citie of Porke vpon the euen of the Conuersion of saint Paul, being fundate, in the latter end of the first yeare of his reigne, king Edward solemnlie mari-ed hir.

In the second yeare of his reigne, about the feast of Pentecost, king Edward held a parliament at Northampton, at the which parliament by euill and naughtie counsell, wherof the lord Roger Mortimer and the queene mother bare the blame, the king concluded with the Scottish king both an impossible and a dishonorable peace. For first, he released to the Scots their fealtie and homage. Also he deliuered vnto them certeine old ancient writings, sealed with the seales of the king of Scots, and of diuerse lords of the land both spirituall and temporall: amongst the which was that indenture, which they called Rag-man, with manie other charters and patents, by the which the kings of Scotland were bound as feodaries vnto the crowne of England; at which season also there were deliuered certeine iewels, which before time had bene twome from the Scots by the kings of England; and among other, the blacke crossier or rod is speciallie named.

And not onelie the king by his sinister counsell lost such right and title as he had to the realme of Scotland, so farre as by the same counsell might be denied, but also the lords and barons, and other men of England that had anie lands or rents within Scotland, lost their right in like manner, except they would dwell vpon the same lands, and become liege men to the king of Scotland. Here vpon was there also a marriage concluded betwixt Dauid Bruce the sonne of Robert Bruce king of Scotland, and the ladie Jane siller to king Edward, which of diuerse writers is surmised Ione of the tower, and the Scots surnamed hir halfe in derision, Ione Wake-peace. This marriage was solemnised at Werwicke vpon the daie of Marie Magdalen. The queene with the bishops of Elie and Norwich, the earle Warren, the lord Mortimer, and diuerse other barons of the land, and a great multitude of other people were present at that marriage, which was celebrat with all the honour that might be.

After the quindene of saint Michaele, king Edward held a parliament at Salisburie, in which the lord Roger Mortimer was created earle of March, the lord John of Eltham the kings brother was made earle of Cornwall, and the lord James Butler of Ireland earle of Ormond, who about the same time had married the earle of Herefords daughter.
But the earle of March toke the most part of the rule of all things pertaining either to the king or realme vnto his owne hands: so that the whole gouernment rested in a manner betwixt the queene mother and him. The other of the counsell that were first appointed, were in manner displaced; for they bare no rule to speake of at all, which caused no small grudge to arise against the queene and the said earle of March, who maintained such poirts, and kept among them such

such retinue of servants, that their provision was wonderfull, which they caused to be taken by, namely for the quene, at the kings price, to the sore opprobrium of the people, which took it displeasingly enough.

There was like to have growen great variance betwixt the quene and Henrie erle of Lancaster, by reason that one sir Thomas Withers, a knight pertaining to the said erle of Lancaster, had slain Robert Holland, who had betrayed sometime Thomas erle of Lancaster, and was after committed to prison by erle Henries means, but the quene had caused him to be set at libertie, and admitted him as one of his counsell. The quene would have had sir Thomas Withers punished for the murder, but erle Henrie caused him to be kept out of the waite, so that for these causes and other, Henrie the erle of Lancaster went about to make a rebellion, and the quene having knowledge thereof, sought to apprehend him: but by the mediation of the earles Sparthall and Kent, the matter was taken by, and erle Henrie had the kings peace granted him for the summe of eleven thousand pounds, which he should have paid, but he neuer paid that fine, though it was so assented at the time of the agreement.

There were diuerse lords and great men that were confederat with him, the lord Thomas Wake, the lord Henrie Beaumont, the lord Fouke Fitz Warren, sir Thomas Rosselin, sir William Trussell, and other, to the number of an hundred knights.

In the third yeare of his reigne, about the Ascension tide, king Edward went ouer into France, and comming to the French king Philip de Valois, as then being at Amiens, did there his homage vnto him for the duchie of Guen (as in the French historie appeareth). The same yeare Simon the archbishop of Canturburie held a synod at London, wherein all those were excommunicated that were guiltie to the death of Walter Stapleton bishop of Excester, that had bene put to death by the Londoners, as in the last kings time ye haue heard. This bishop of Excester founded Excester college in Oxford, & Harts hall. But now to the purpose.

The king about the beginning, or (as other saie) about the middle of Lent, held a parlement at Winchester, during the which, Edmund of Woodstock erle of Kent the kings uncle was arrested the morrow after saint Gregories day, and being arraigned vpon certeine confessions and letters found about him, he was found guiltie of treason. There were diuerse in trouble about the same matter, for the erle vpon his open confession before sundrie lords of the realme, declared that not onelie by commandement from the pope, but also by the setting on of diuerse nobles of this land (whome he named) he was persuaded to endeavour himselfe by all waies and means possible how to deliuer his brother king Edward the second out of prison, and to restore him to the crowne, whome one Thomas Dunhed, a frier of the order of preachers in London, affirmed for certeine to be alive, hauing (as he himselfe said) called by a spirit to vnderstand the truth thereof, and so that by counsell of the said frier, and of thre other friers of the same order, he had purposed to worke some meane how to deliuer him, and to restore him againe to the kings doine. Among the letters that were found about him, disclosing a great part of his practise, some there were, which he had written and directed vnto his brother the said king Edward, as by some writers it should appeare.

The bishop of London and certeine other great personages, whome he had accused, were permitted to go at libertie, vnder suerties taken for their good demeanour and faith comming. But Robert de Tonton, and the frier that had raised the spirit for to know whether the kings father were liuing or not, were committed to prison, wherein the frier remained till he died. The erle himselfe was had out of the castell gate at Winchester, and there lost his head the 19 day of March, this felie (as was thought) thorough the malice of the quene mother, and of the erle of March: whose pride and high presumption the said erle of Kent might not well abide. His death was the lesse lamented, because of the presumptuous gouernement of his servants and retinue, which he kept about him, for that they riding abroad, would take by things at their pleasure, not paying nor agreeing with the partie to whome such things belonged, in so much that by their means, who ought to haue done their uttermost for the enlargement of his honour, he grew in greater obloquie and reproch: a folow fault in servants so to abuse their lords names to their priuat profit, to whome they cannot be so trustie. But such are to be warned, that by the same wherein they offend, they shall be punished, even with servants faithlesse to plague their vntrustinesse, for

Qui violare fidem fecit, & violetur eadem.

The young quene Philip was brought to bed at Woodstocke the 15 day of June of his first sonne, the which at the fontstone was named Edward, and in processe of time came to great proofe of famous chualrie, as in this booke shall more plainelie appeare. He was commonlie named when he came to ripe yeares prince Edward, & also surnamed the Blacke prince. The sixteenth day of Julie chanced a great eclipse of the sunne, and for the space of two moneths before, and thre moneths after, there fell exceeding great raine, so that through the great intemperance of weather, corne could not ripen, by reason wherof, in many places they began not haruest till Michalmas, & in some places they inned not their wheat till Allhallontide, nor their pease till saint Andrews tide.

On Christmasse euen, about the bryake of day, a marvellous sore and terrible wind came forth of the west, which overthrow houses and buildings, ouerturned trees by the roots, and did much hurt in diuerse places. This yeare shortly after Easter, the king with the bishop of Winchester, and the lord William Spontacate, hauing not past fifteene houres in their companie, passed the sea, apparelled in clothes like to merchants, he left his brother the erle of Cornewall his deputie & gardian of the realme till his returne. Whereouer, he caused it to be proclaimed in London, that he went ouer on pilgrimage, and for none other purpose. He returned before the later end of April, and then was there holden a turnie at Dertfort.

The mondaie after saint Matthews day in September, the king held a solempne iusts in Cheapside, betwixt the great crosse and Soperlane, he with 12 as chalengers answering all defendants that came. This solempne iusts and turnie continued thre daies. The quene with manie ladies being present at the same, fell beside a stage, but yet as god hap would they had no hurt by that fall, to the relieving of manie that saw them in such danger, and yet so luckilie to escape without harme. Also in a parlement holden at Spotingham about saint Lukes tide, sir Roger Spontacate the erle of March was apprehended the seuenteenth day of October within the castell of Spotingham, where the king with the two quenes, his mother and his wife, and diuerse other were as then lodged. And though the heies of the castell were dailie and nightlie in the custodie of the said erle of March, and that his power was such, as it was doubted how he might be arrested (for he had, as some writers affirme, at that present in retinue nine score knights, beside esquires, gentlemen and peomen) yet at length by the kings helpe, the lord William Spontacate, the lord Humfre de Bohun, and his brother sir

the lord Rafe Stafford, the lord Robert Clifford, the lord William Clinton, the lord John Bevil of Hornbie, and diuerse other, which had accused the said earle of March for the murder of king Edward the second, found means by intelligence had with sir William de Glend constable of the castell of Nottingham, to take the said earle of March with his sonne the lord Roger or Geoffrey Mortimer, and sir Simon Beresford, with other.

Sir Hugh Trumpington or Currington (as some copies haue) that was one of his chiefe friends with certeine other were slaine, as they were about to resist against the lord Montacute, and his compaignie in taking of the said earle. The manner of his taking I passe over, because of the diuersitie in report thereof by sundrie writers. From Nottingham he was sent by to London with his sonne the lord Roger or Geoffrey de Mortimer, sir Simon Beresford, and the other prisoners, where they were committed to prison in the tower. Shortly after was a parliament called at Westminster, cheselle (as was thought) for reformation of things disordered through the misgouernance of the earle of March. But whosoever was glad of soie for the trouble of the said earle, suerlie the queene mother toke it most heauilie about all other, as the that loued him moze (as the same went) than stood well with his honour. For as some write, he was found to be with child by him. They kept as it were house together, for the earle to haue his prouision the better cheape, laid his penie with his, so that his takers serued him as well as they did his both of vittels & carriages. Of which misbriage (all regard to honour and estimation neglected) euerie subiect spake shame. For their manner of dealing, tending to such euill purposes as they continually thought upon, could not be secret from the eyes of the people. And their offense herein was so much the moze heinous, because they were persons of an extraordinary degree, and were the moze notable marked of the multitude of common people,

The earle of March executed.

But now in this parliament holden at Westminster he was attainted of high treason expressed in five articles, as in effect followeth.

1 First, he was charged that he had procured Edward of Carnaruan the kings father to be murdered in most heinous and tyrannous manner within the castell of Berkleie.

2 Secondlie, that the Scots at Stanop parke through his means escaped.

3 Thirdblie, that he receiued at the hands of the lord James Douglas, at that time generall of the Scots, great summes of monie to execute that treason, and further to conclude the peace upon such dishonorable covenants as was accorded with the Scots at the parliament of Northampton.

4 Fourthlie, that he had got into his hands a great part of the kings treasure, and had wasted and consumed it.

5 Fiftlie, that he had impropried unto him diuers wards that belonged unto the king: and had bene moze pituie with queene Isabell the kings mother, than stood either with Gods law, or the kings pleasure.

These articles with other being proued against him, he was adiudged by authoritie of the parliament to suffer death, and according therunto, upon saint Andrewes euen next ensuing, he was at London drawne and hanged, at the common place of execution, called in those daies The elmes, & now Tisborne, as in some booke we find. His bodie remained two daies and two nights on the gallowses, and after taken downe was deliuered to the friers minors, who buried him in their church the morrow after he was deliuered to them, with great pompe and funeral requies, although afterwards he was taken up and carried unto Wigmore, whereof he was lord. He came not to his answer in iudgement, no moze than any other of the nobilitie had done, since the death of Thomas earle of Lancaster.

Sir Simon de Beresford knight that had bene one of the kings iustices, was drawne also and hanged at London, upon St. Lucies daie. In this parliament holden at Westminster, the king toke into his hand, by abuse of the states there assembled, all the possessions, lands and reuenues that belonged to the queene his mother, the hauing assigned to hir a thousand pounds by yeare, for the maintenance of hir estate, being appointed to remaine in a certeine place, and not to go elsewhere abroad: yet the king to comfort hir, would lightlie euerie yeare once come to visit hir. After that the erle of March was executed (as yee haue heard) diuerse noble men that were departed the realme, because they could not abide the pride and presumption of the said earle, now returned: as the sonne and heire of the earle of Arundell, the lord Thomas Wake, the L. Henrie Beaumont, sir Thomas de Roselin, sir Fouke Fitz Warren, sir Griffin de la Pole, and diuerse other.

In the fifth yeare of R. Edwards reigne, Edward Baliol came forth of France into England, and obtained such fauour through the assistance of the lord Henrie Beaumont, the lord David of Strabogie earle of Athole, the lord Geoffrey de Howhaie, the lord Walter Cummin, and others, that king Edward granted him licence to make his prouision in England to passe into Scotland, with an armie of men to attempt the recouerie of his right to the crowne of Scotland, with condition that if he recovered it, he should acknowledge to hold it of the king of England as superiour lord of Scotland. The coming awate of Edward Baliol out of France is diuerslie reported by writers: some saie, that he was aided by the French king, whose sister he had married: and other saie, that he being in prison in France, for the escape of an Englishman, one John Barnabie esquier, which had slaine a Frenchman by chance of quarrelling in the towne of Dampierre, where the same Barnabie dwelled with the said Edward Baliol, so it came to passe that the lord Henrie Beaumont hauing occasion of businesse with the French king, that fauoured him well, came ouer to France, and there vnderstanding of Baliols imprisonment, procured his deliuerance, and brought him ouer into England, and caused him to remaine in secret wise at the manor of Sandhall upon Duse in Northeshire with the ladie Mescie, till he had purchased the kings grant for him to make his prouision of men of war and ships within the English dominions.

In the first yeare of king Edwards reigne, Keig-nold earle of Gelderland married the ladie Elianor sister to this king Edward the third, who gaue unto the said earle with hir for hir portion, fiftene thousand pounds sterling. Isabell the kings daughter was borne also this yeare at Woodstoke. After that Edward Baliol had prepared and made readie his purueances for his iourne, and that his men of warre were assembled and come together, being in all not past fife hundred men of armes, and about two thousand archers, and other footmen, he toke the sea at Hauenspurgh in Northeshire, and from thence directing his course northward, he arrived at length in Scotland, where he atchiuing great victories (as in the Scottish chronicle yee may read moze at large) was finally crowned king of that realme.

It may seme a wonder to manie, that the king of

of England would permit Edward Balioll to make his p[ro]vision thus in England, and to suffer his people to aid him against his brother in law king David that had married his sister (as before ye have heard.) Indeed at the first he was not verie readie to grant their suit that moved it, but at length he was contented to dissemble the matter, in hope that if Edward Balioll had god successe, he should then recover that againe, which by the conclusion of peace during his minority, he had through euill counsell resigned out of his hands. The Scots neuertheless in December chased their new king Edward Balioll out of Scotland, so that he was faine to retire into England, and celebrated the feast of the Nativite at Carleill, in the house of the friers minors, and the morrow after being S. Stephens day, he went into Westmerland, where of the lord Clifford he was right honorable received, to whome he then granted Douglasdale in Scotland, which had bene granted to the said lord Cliffords grandfather in the daies of king Edward the first, if he might at any time recover the realme of Scotland out of his aduersaries hands.

After this, he went and late a time with the ladie of Gines, that was his kinswoman. Finally about the tenth day of March, having assembled a power of Englishmen and Scottishmen, he entred Scotland, and besieged the towne of Berwike, during the which siege, manie enterprises were attempted by the parties: and amongst other, the Scots entred England by Carleill, doing much mischief in Gillingham, by burning, killing, robbing and spoiling. The king advertised hereof, thought himselfe discharged of the agreement concluded betwixt him and David Bruce, the sonne of Robert Bruce that had married his sister, & therefore took it to be lawfull for him to aid his cosen Edward Balioll the lawfull k. of Scots. And here with assembling an armie, came to the siege of Berwike, together with his brother John of Gloucestre earle of Cornwall, and other noble men, seeking by all meanes possible how to win the towne: and finallye discomfited an armie of Scots, which came to the rescue thereof upon Halidon hill, in slaing of them what in the fight and chase, seven earles, nine hundred knights and baronets, foure hundred squiers, and upon 32 thousand of the common people: and of Englishmen were slaine but 15 persons, as our English writers make mention. The Scottish writers confesse, that the Scottishmen lost the number of 14 thousand.

On the morrow following, being S. Margarets day, the towne of Berwike was rendered unto king Edward with the castell, as in the Scottish chronicle ye may read, with more matter touching the siege and battell aforesaid, and therefore here in few words, I passe it over. King Edward having thus sped his businesse, left a power of men with Edward Balioll, under the conduct of the lord Richard Talbot, and returned himselfe backe into England, appointing the lord Percie to be gouernour of the towne of Berwike, and sir Thomas Grey knight his lieutenant. The lord John Darcie lord chiefe iustice of Ireland, leaving the lord Thomas Bourgh his depute in that countie, passed over with an armie into Scotland, to aid the king, who (as ye have heard) was there the same time in person. And so by the king on one side, and by the Irishmen on an other, Scotland was subdued, and restored unto Balioll, who the morrow after the octaves of the Nativite of our ladie, held a parliament at saint Johns towne, in the which he revoked and made void all acts, which the late king of Scots Robert Bruce had made or made: and further ordeined, that all such lands and possessions as the said Bruce had given to any manner of person, should be taken from them, and restored to the former and true inheritour.

In this yeare about the twelfth of October, Simon Speham archbishop of Canturburie, departed this life, in whose place succeeded John Streteford, being removed from the see of Winchester, whereof he was bishop, before that he was thus called to the see of Canturburie. After Candlemas the king of England repaired towards Yorke, there to hold a parliament, to the which (beginning on the monday in the second weeke in Lent) when Edward Balioll doubting to be surprised by his aduersaries, could not come, yet he sent the lord Henrie de Beaumont, and the lord William de Montacute, to make excuse for him. The king of England passing further into the north parts, held his Whitsuntide at Berwike upon Tyne, with great roialtie: and shortly after, Edward Balioll king of Scots came thither, and upon the nineteenth daie of June made his homage unto the king of England, and swore unto him fealtie in the presence of a great number of Nobles and gentlemen there assembled, as to his superiour and chiefe lord of the realme of Scotland, binding himselfe by that oth, to hold the same realme of the king of England, his heires and successors for ever. He also gave and granted unto the king of England at that time five counties next adjoining unto the borders of England, as Berwike and Rochburgh, Weples, and Dunfries, the townes of Haddington and Gedworth with the castell, the forrests of Silkirk, Etherke, and Gedworth, so as all these portions should be clerelie separated and put apart from the crowne of Scotland, and annexed unto the crowne of England for ever. And these things were confirmed and robozated with oth, scepter, and with nesse sufficient.

Which things done in due order, as was requisite, the king of England returned home, and the kings went backe into Scotland. And then were all such lords restored againe to their lands and possessions in Scotland, which in the daies of Edward the second had bene expelled from the same: and now they did their homage unto the king of Scotland for those lands as appertained. ¶ Immediately after, the king of England called a counsell of his lords spirittual and temporall at Potingham, commanding them to meet him there about the thirtieth daie of Julie, there to consult with him of weightie causes concerning the state of the realme. This yeare on saint Clements daie at night, which fell on the three and twentieth of November, through a marvellous inundation & rising of the sea all along by the coasts of this realme, but especiallie about the Thames, the sea bankes or walles were broken and borne downe with violence of the water, and infinite numbers of beasts and cattell drowned, fruitfull grounds and pastures were made salt marshes, so as there was no hope that in long time they should recover againe their former fruitfulness.

In this meane time the French king was appointed to have made a viage against the Saracens, enemies of our faith, and had sent to the king of England, requiring him of his companie in that iourne. But the king of England being otherwise occupied with the affaires of Scotland, made no direct answer therunto, so that the French king perceiving that the king of England was not in all things well pleased with him, thought god before he set forward on that iourne to understand his meaning, and thereupon sent emissaries unto him other ambassadors. These ambassadors arrived here in England and had audience, but nothing they concluded in effect, save that the king promised to send his ambassadours over into France, to have further communication in the matter touching such points of variance as depended betwixt them.

Although Edward Balioll by the puissance of the king of Englands assistance had got the most part of the realme of Scotland into his hands, yet diuerse castles were holden against him, and the Scots baliell slipped from him, and by open rebellion molested him diuerse waies. The king of England aduertised thereof called a parlement at London, wherein he toke order for his iourne into Scotland, had a tenth and a sixtieth granted him, and so about Alhallontide he came to Newcastle vpon Tyne, with his armie, and remained there till the feast of Saint Katharine, and then entering into Scotland, came to Rockesburgh, where he repaired the castell which had bene aforetime destroyed. After the third daie of Christmasse was past, the king of England entred into the forrest, beating it vp and downe, but the Scots would not come within his reach: whereupon he sent the king of Scots that was there present with him, and the earles of Marwike and Drenford, and certeine other barons and knights with their retinues vnto Carleill, to keepe and defend those west parts of the realme from the Scots.

In their iourne thitherwards, they went by Pelys to apprehend certeine Scots, whome they heard to be lodged and abiding thereabouts, but when they found them not, they wasted the countrie, and turned streight to Carleill, where after the Epiphanie there assembled an armie forth of the countie of Lancaster, Westmerland, and Cumberland, by the kings appointment, which armie together with the king of Scots and the other lords there found, entred Scotland, and did much hurt in the countrie of Galloway, destroying towne and all that they found abroad, but the people were fled and withdrone out of their waie. And when they had taken their pleasure, the king of Scots returned backe to Carleill. This yere there fell great abundance of raine, and thereupon ensued morren of beasts: also corne so failed this yere, that a quarter of wheat was sold at fortie shillings.

Finallie, when the king had finished his businesse in Scotland, as to his seeming good with his pleasure, he returned into England, and shortly after he sent the archbishop of Canturburie, sir Philip de Spontacate, and Geoffrey Scrope vnto the French king, to conclude a firme amitie & league with him. These lords comming into France, were not at the first admitted to the French kings presence, till they shewed themselves halfe grieved with that strange dealing: for then finallie were they brought vnto him, who gentlie receiued them, and caused the matter to be intreated of about the which they were sent, in furthering thereof, such diligence was vsed, that finallie a conclusion of peace and concord was agreed, and so farre passed, that proclamation thereof should haue bene made in Paris, and in the countrie thereabout the next day: but scarce were the English ambassadours returned vnto their lodgings, when they were sent for backe againe, and further informed, that the French king minded to haue the said king of Scotland comprised in the same league, so that he might be restored vnto his kingdome, and the Balioll put out. The English ambassadours answered, that their commission extended not so farre, and therefore they could not conclude any thing therein. Whereupon all the former communication was reuoked, and cleerlie made void, so that the English ambassadours returned home into England without any thing concluded.

About the feast of the Ascension, the king held a parlement at Poerke, ordaining for his iourne into Scotland, and also deuising by authoritie thereof di-uerse profitable statutes for the common wealthe. About midsummer, he came with his armie vnto Newcastle vpon Tyne, whither came to him from Carleill the king of Scots, and there order was taken, that the king of England, and his brother the earle of Cornuwall, the earles of Marwike, Lancaster, Lincoln, and Hereford, with all their retinues, and the earle of Gulkerland, that had married the kings sister, and with a faire companie was come to serue the king in these warres, should passe to Carleill, and on the twelue of Julie enter Scotland. The king of Scots, the earles of Surrie, and Arundell, and the lord Henrie Percie, a baron of great might and power, being all of kin vnto the king of Scots, with their retinues should go to Berwike, and there enter the same day aboue mentioned, and as it was appointed, so it was put in practise. For both kings on the same day entering Scotland in severall parts passed forward without resistance at their pleasures, wasting and burning all the countie, both on this side, and beyond the Scottish sea. The Welshmen spared neither religious persons nor their houses, making no more accompt of them than of others: the mariners of Newcastle also burnt a great part of the towne of Dundee.

The earle of Hamure about the same time comming into England, to serue the king in his warres, toke vpon him to passe into Scotland with a band of an hundred men of armes, beside seauen or eight knights which he brought ouer with him, and certeine Englishmen to be his guides from Berwike, but he was assailed before he could get to Cdenburgh, by the earles of Spurrey and Dunbarre, and the lord William Dowglas: so that notwithstanding the strangers bare themselves verie manfullie, yet oppressed with multitude, they were forced to giue place, but yet still fighting and defending themselves till they came to Cdenburgh, and there taking the hill where the ruines of the castell stood, kept the same all the night following. But the next day they despairing of all succours, and hauing neither meat nor drinke, at length yielded themselves, whom the earle of Spurrey receiuing right courteously, shewed them such fauour, that without ransom he was contented they should returne into their countie: and for more suertie, he conueied the said earle of Hamure (whome the Scottish books call earle of Gelderland) and his companie backe to the borders: but in his returne, shortly after, the same earle of Spurrey that toke himselfe for gouernour of Scotland, was encountred by the Englishmen that late in garison within Rockesburgh, and by them taken prisoner. The lord William Dowglas being there also with him escaped, but James Dowglas brother to the said lord William Dowglas, was at that bickering slaine with diuerse other.

About the feast of the Assumption of our ladie, diuerse of the Scottish nobilitie came and submitted themselves to the king, namely the earle of Atholl and others, but earle Patrike of Dunbarre, and the earle of Ross, the lord Andrew de Spurrey, the lord William Dowglas, and the lord William de Beth, and manie other would not come in, but assembling themselves together, did all the mischief they could vnto those that had receiued the kings peace. The earle of Atholl in the winter season, besieging the castell of Kilburnie beyond the Scottish sea was set vpon by the earles of Dunbarre and Ross, so that they slue him there in field, for his men fled from him (though some traitorous practise as was thought) and left him and a few other in all the danger. The king of England being returned forth of Scotland, remained for the most part of the winter in the north parts, and held his Christmasse at Newcastle vpon Tyne,

Time, and after the Epiphanye having assembled an armie readie to passe into Scotland, to reuenge the earle of Athols death, which he took verie displeasingly, there came in the meane time ambassadoz both from the pope and the French king, and found the king of England at Bertolke, readie with his armie to set forwarde into Scotland. But these ambassadoz did so much by intreatie with the two kings of England and Scotland, that about the feast of the Purification, a truce was agreed vpon to indure till midlent.

Then was a parlement to be holden at London, and herewith articles were owtane, and certeine petitions put forth, vpon the which if the parties in the meane time could agree, the peace accordingly might be established, if not, then the warre to be prosecuted as before. The chiefest article and petition which the Scots proponed, as desirous to be therein resolved, was to understand which of the two that claimed the crowne of Scotland, to wit, Edward Balliol, and David Bruce, had most right thereto. But when in the parlement time the lord Maurice de Spurrey sene sir Geoffrey de Rosse a Scottish knight, that was thriffe of Aire and Lenarke, being of the Balliols side, for that in time of open warre the same sir Geoffrey had slaine his brother, vpon respect of this presumptuous part, and by reason of such stoutnesse as the Scots otherwile shewed, no conclusion of peace could be brought to effect.

Before the feast of the Ascension, the king of England sent forward the king of Scots, the earles of Lancaster, Warwike, Oxford, and Arnegos, and diuerse lords and capteins with an armie, the which after Whitsonside entering into Scotland, passed ouer the Scottish sea, and comming to saint Johns towne (which the Scots had burnt, despairing to defend it against the English power) they set in hand to fortifie it, compassing it with deepe ditches and a strong rampier of earth. About the same time the king called a parlement at Northampton, where leauing the prelates and other to treat of such matters as were proponed, he himselfe rode northwards, and comming to Bertolke, took with him a small band of men of armes, and setting forward, halted forth till he came to saint Johns towne, where he found the king of Scots, and other his nobles greatlie wondering at his comming thither so vnlooked for. After he had rested there a litle, he took with him part of the armie, and passed forward ouer the mounteines of Scotland euen vnto Elgen in Spurrey and Inuernes, further by manie miles than euer his grandfather had gone.

In his returne he burnt the towne of Aberdeen, in reuenge of the death of a right valiant knight called sir Thomas Rosselin, that comming thither by sea took land there, and was slaine by the enimies: he burnt diuerse other townes and places in this boiage, spoiling and wasting the countries where he came, not finding anie to resist him. About Lammas the earle of Cornewall with the power of Northeshire and Northumberland, and the lord Anthony Lucie with the Cumberland and Westmerland men entered Scotland, and destroyed the west parts, as Carlisle, and other which obeyed not the Balliol. The lord William Douglas still coasted the Englishmen, doing to them what damage he might. At length this armie laden with preies and spoile returned home, but the earle of Cornewall with his owne retinue came through to saint Johns towne, where he found the king being returned thither fro his tourne which he had made beyond the mounteins. The king staid not long there, but leauing the king of Scots with his companie in that towne, he went to Strueling, where, on the plot of ground vpon which the destroyed castell had stood, he built an other fortresse, called a Pisle. And now, because he had spent a great deale of treasure in those warres of Scotland, he summoned a parlement to be holden at Nottingham, in which there was granted to him a tenth of the cleargie, and likewise of the citizens and burgeses of good townes, and a fifthenth of other that dwelt south of cities and boroughes.

About the latter end of October, John of Elgham earle of Cornewall the kings brother departed this life at saint Johns towne in Scotland: his bodie was afterwards conueied to Westminster, there buried with all solemne funerals. The Scottish writers affirme that he was slaine by his brother king Edward for the crueltie he had used in the west parts of Scotland, in sleaing such as for safegard of their liues fled into churches. Moreover, in December there deceased at S. Johns towne aforesaid, Hugh de Fresnes, that in right of the countesse of Lincoln was intituled earle of Lincoln. He died of the sir, or (as was said) through excessive cold, which in those quarters in that cold time of the yeare sore afflicted the English people. In the meane time, about the feast of saint Luke the euangelist, the king went with an armie into Scotland toward the castell of Bothuille, and comming thither repaired the same, which by the Scots had lately before bene destroyed. The baron Stafford at the same time comming towards the king with a power of men, took Douglas Dale in his waie, taking in the same a great preie of cattell and other things.

Before Christmaste the king returned into England, but the king of Scots remained all the winter in saint Johns towne with a sober companie. When the king had settled the state of Scotland vnder the gouernement of the Balliol, those Scottishmen which took part with the Balliol, ordered as it were in recompense of king Edwards friendship a statute, whereby they bound themselves to the said king Edward and his heires kings of England, that they should aid and assist him against all other princes: and whensoever it chanced that either he or any king of England being rightful inheritor, had any wars against any prince, either within the land or without, the Scottishmen of their owne proper costs and expences should find thre hundred bowmen, a thousand footmen well and sufficientlie armed for the warre, the which thirtene hundred men the Scots should wage for a whole yeare: and if the king of England ended not his warres within the yeare, then he to giue wages to the said number of thirtene hundred Scots, as he doth to other of his soldiers and men of warre. There be that write, that the king of England should not onlie fortifie saint Johns towne about this time, as before is mentioned, but also saint Andzels, Cotoper, Aberdine, Dunfermeling, with certeine other castels, leauing garisons of men in the same. But for so much as ye may read sufficientlie of those troubles, in Scotland, and of the returne of king David south of France, and how his realme was recovered out of the Balliols hands in the Scottish chronicles: we need not here to make anie long discourse thereof.

The queene was deliuered of hir second sonne at Hatfield, who was therfore named William of Hatfield, who liued but a short time, departing this world when he was but young. The king being returned home out of Scotland, sought by all waies possible how to recouer monie, both to supplie his charges for the Scottish wars, and also to furnishe the other wars which he meant to take in hand against the French king: he got so much into his hands (as it is reported by writers) that it was verie scant and hard to come by throughout the whole realme: by reason of which scarcitie

England and France, wherby the procurement banished out of France, upon occasion of a claime by him made unto the earldome of Artois. This lord Robert after he was banished France, fled over into made him earle of Richmond. All the goods of the Italians were by the kings commandement this yere confiscate to his use, and so likewise were the goods of the monks of the Cluniack and Cistercean orders. This yere also a comet, or blasing starre appeared, with long and terrible flames passing from it. In the eleuenth yere of his reigne, the king held a parlement at Westminster, about the time of Lent, during the which, of the earldome of Cornwall he made a duchie, and gaue it unto his eldest sonne Edward, that was then earle of Chester, whom also (as some write) he created at the same time prince of Wales.

Moreover in reward of service there were six noble men at this parlement advanced to the honour and title of earles, as the lord Henrie sonne to the earle of Lancaster was created earle of Derby, or after some writers, earle of Leicester; William Bo-hun was created earle of Northampton, William Montacute earle of Salisbury, Hugh Audley earle of Gloucester, William Clinton earle of Dunkingdon, and Robert Wifford earle of Suffolk. This creation was on the second sundae in Lent, and the same day were twentie knights made, whose names for brevnesse we do here omit. In this parlement it was enacted, that no man should weare any manner of silke in gowne, cote, or doublet; except he might dispense of god and sufficient rent an hundred pounds by yere, which act was not long observed.
For the nature of man is such, that of it owne corrupt & evil inclination, it withstandeth good things, and sheweth rather to follow whatsoever is forbidden; yea though the same be sharke naught and offensive to law and conscience: which preposterous and o-uerthwart disposition the poet noteth well, saying, aliquid cupido Mens alind suadet: video meliora, probosq; Deteriora sequor.

It was also ordeined by the aduise of this parlement, that Henrie of Lancaster newlie created erle of Derby should go ouer into Gascoine, there to re-maine as the kings lieutenant. But Richard South-well saith, that the earle of Salisbury, and not the earle of Derby was appointed to go into Gascoine at that time, and the earle of Warwick into Scotland. Moreover in this parlement it was enacted that no wool of the English growth should go forth of the land, but be here wrought and made in cloath: and further an act was ordeined for receiuing of strangers that were clothworkers, and order taken, that fit and convenient places should be assigned forth to them where to inhabit, with manie priuileges and liberties, and that they should haue wages and stipends allowed them, till they were so settled as they might gaine commodiouslie by their occupation and science: but now to returne againe to other matters.

The Scots this yere toke the castell of Bothwell by surrender, so as the Englishmen that were with in it, departed with their liues and goods saued. Di-uerse other castles and fortresses were taken by the Scots in this, and in other parts, but the countrie of Galloway was by them speciallie sore afflicted, because the people there held with their lord Edward Balliol. Whereupon it was agreed in this last parlement, that the earle of Warwick being appointed to go thither, should haue with him the power beyond Trent northwards. But when about the Ascension tide the Scots had besieged the castell of Strickling, the king of England in person hastid thitherwards, of whose approach the Scots no sooner understood, but that straightwaies they brake by their siege, and departed thence: the king therefore returned backe into the south parts. About the same time sir Eustace de Sparwell knight, lord of Carlanerocke, revolted from Edward Balliol unto David le Bruce his foe, and so that part daile increased, and also the warre continued, with damage inough unto both parts.

In the beginning of September the earle of Warwicke with an armie entred Scotland by Ber-wicke, and the lord Thomas de Wake, and the lord Clifford, with the bishop of Carleill accompanied with the Westmerland and Cumberland men, entered by Carleill, and within two daies after met with the earle of Warwick, as before it was appointed, and so joining together, they passed forwards, spoiling and wasting Leudale, Dofetdale, and Fide-dale. The lord Anthonie Lucie with a part of the armie entred into Galloway, and after he had wasted that countrie, he returned to the armie, which by reason of the exceeding great weat that fell in that season, they could not keepe on their iourne into Dougladale, and to Aire, as they had appointed: but having remained in Scotland twelue daies, they returned altogether unto Carleill. Edward Balliol was not with them in this iourne, but remained still in England.

The Scots in reuenge hereof made diuerse rodes into England, withdrawing still with their prey and hotties, before the English power could assemble to giue them battell. About Alhallontide, the Scots besieged the castell of Edenburgh, but the bishop of Carleill, the lord Randall Dacres of Gillelland, with the power of the countie of Cumberland and of Westmerland, and the king of Scots Edward Balioll, with the lord Anthonie Lucie, and such compa-nie as they brought from Berwicke, meeting at Rockeburgh, marched forth unto Edenburgh, and chasing the Scots from the siege, toke order for the safe keeping of the castell from thenceforth, and returned into England. In this meane time things happened so well to the purpose of king Edward, that by practise he alienated the hearts of the Flemings from the obedience of their earle, being altogether an earnest friend to the French king. He therefore understanding the minds of his people, sought to winne them by some gentle treatie, and so did euen at the first, concluding an agreement with them of Gaunt, which were fullie at a point to haue entred into league with the king of England, as with him whose friendship by reason of the traffike of merchandize, (and namelie of the English wools) they knew to be more necessarie for their countrie than the French kings.

Although by the helpe of the bishop of Tournie the earle of Flanders caused them to stae from concluding or joining in anie such bonds of amitie with the king of England for that time, yet he doubted the ar-riual of some power out of England, and thereupon appointed his bassard brother Guie of Ryckenburgh, and certeine other noble men and captains, with a crue of men of warre to lie in the Ile of Cabant, to defend the passage there, and to see that no English ships should come or go that waite by the seas: whereof the king of England being aduertised, sent thither the earle of Derby, the lord Leues Beauchampe, the lord Reginald Cobham, also the lord William sonne to the earle of Warwick, the lord Walter de Spannie an Hannenier, and other lords, knights, and capteins, with a power of five hundred men of armes, and two thousand archers, the which comming to the foresaid Ile of Cabant, found the Flemings, about five thousand in number, readie arranged on the towne dikes and lands, in purpose to defend the entrie, which they did a certeine space right ballantlie: but in the end they were discomfited, and three thousand of them slaine in the streets, hauens, and houses. Sir Guie the bastard of Flanders was taken with diuerse other knights and gentlemen, the towne was burnt, and the goods with the prisoners were carried into England. This chanced on a sundae the daie before the feast of saint Martine in Nouember. Where the lord Walter de Spannie might haue had 11 thousand pounds sterling for the ranfome of the said sir Guie, and other prisoners, the king bought them of him in the fourteenth yeare of his reigne for eight thousand pounds sterling, as by records in the tower it appeareth.

About the feast of saint Martine in winter, there came vnto London two cardinals, sent by the pope to treat for a peace betwixt the kings of England, and France. The archbishop of Canturburie, with the bishops of Winchester, Ely, Chichester, Couentrie, & the commoners of the citie of London met them on Wynters hill. The duke of Cornewall with the earle of Surrie, and manie other of the nobilitie received them a mile without the citie. The king himselfe received them at the lesser hall doore of his palace at Westmynster, and brought them into the painted chamber, where they declared their message: whereupon the king caused a parlement to be summoned at London, to begin the morrow after Candlemasse day. The king held his Christmasse at Wyndesore, and within the octaues of the same feast he took his iourne towards Scotland, or rather (as other haue) he sent thither the earles of Salisburie, Gloucester, Derby, and Anegos, with three barons, the lords Percie, Mewill, and Stafford, the which with twentie thousand men besieged the castell of Dunbar.

This siege began even in the beginning of the twelfth yeare of king Edwards reigne, and continued for the space of nineteene weeks, with small gaine and lesse honour to the Englishmen, in so much that the same waie by vnder a colour of a truce, when there was no hope of winning the place, and that the noble men that laie there at siege, basted to make an end, that they might attend the king in his iourne ouer into Brabant. The morrow after Candlemasse day the parlement began, in which there was a grant made to the king by the laitie of the one halfe of their wolle through the whole realme for the next summer, which he receiued, and likewise he leuied of the cleargie the whole, causing them to paie nine marks of euerie sacke of the best woll. But after the rate of the one halfe he took in whose hands so ever it was found, aswell merchants as others. After this, he took a fifthenth of all the communaltie of his realme in woll, the price of euerie stone containing foureteen pounds rated at two shillings. The one and twentieth of March the two cardinals took the sea at Douer, and in their companie went ouer the archbishop of Canturburie, and the bishop of Durham to treat of a peace, if by any good means the two kings might be made friends. But as it appeared, their trauelell was in vaine, for although they abode together for a time on the frontiers, doing their best indueor, yet their trauelell nothing auailed, as by that which followeth is most manifest.

The Flemings that fauoured king Edward, were put in such comfort by the late victorie obtained by the Englishmen in the Ile of Cabant, that falling to their former practise, one Jaques or Jacob van Arteueld an hounmaker of the towne of Cant, was chosen amongst them to be as it were the defender of the people, and namelie of the weauers, and other clothworkers. At first he, his authoritie grew so hugelie amongst all the whole number of the commons in Flanders, that he might do more with them than their earle; and yet the earle to reconcile the people to his fauour, ceased not to be all courtous means towards them that he could devise, as releasing prisoners and duties of monie, pardoning offenses, forfeitures, and other such like, but all would not auail him. The king of England had so wonn them by the means of the said Jaques van Arteueld, that in the end John archbishop of Canturburie, & Richard the bishop of Durham, came into Flanders as ambassadors from king Edward, and traueled to earnestlie to draw the Flemings vnto an amitie with their master king Edward, that finally a league was concluded betwixt the countie of Flanders, and the said king at Cant, in the presence of the earle of Gelderland, as then being there. The chiefe authors of this league were the said Jaques van Arteueld, and a noble man of Flanders, called Siger de Curtrey.

But this Siger being immediatlie after apprehended by the earle of Flanders, was put to death, which act procured the earle so much hatred of the people, that shortly after comming to Bruges, and attempting to force the towne to his will, he was forced himselfe to flee from thence, for otherwise he had bene either taken or slaine; the commons of the towne & namelie the fullers, of whom he had slaine some there in the streets, rose so fast vpon him. Hereupon fleeing home to his house, he took his wife, and a sonne which he had, and fled with them into France, so forsaking his countie which was now gouerned by Jaques van Arteueld, as though he had bene immediatlie lord thereof. After this, the earle returned home againe, as it were with the French kings commission, to persuaue the Flemings to renounce the league concluded with the king of England: but he could bring nothing to passe, but was still in danger to haue bene arrested and staied of his stone subiects, both at Cant and in other places, but namelie at Dirmue, where if he had not made the more hast alwaie, he had bene taken by them of Bruges. Amongst other of his stuffe which he left behind him in that hastie departure, his signet was forgotten, and not missed till he came to saint Omers, whither he fled for his safegard.

Thus ye may perceiue that Flanders rested vpon king Edwards commandement, who to establish amitie also with the duke of Brabant, and other princes of the empire, about the middle of Julie sailed ouer vnto Antwerpe, with his wife queene Whilp, his sonne the prince of Wales, and a great number of other of the pères and barons of his realme, where he was most ioyfullie receiued of the duke of Brabant, and other lords of the empire. There was sent to the emperour to procure his frendship, from the king of England, the marques of Salike with certeine noble men of England, and also certeine of the duke of Gelderland his counsell, the which marques was made at that time an earle, & the earle of Gelderland was made duke. This duke of Gelderland named Reginald had married the ladie Isabell sister of king Edward, and therefore in fauour of the king his brother in law, traueled most earnestlie to procure procure him all the friends within the empire that he could make.

Edwards confederates.

The princes and lords then, with whom king Edward was allied and confederated at that time, find to be these; the dukes of Brabant and Gelderland, the archbishop of Cullen, the marquisse of Salike, sir Arnold de Baquchen, and the lord of Clakenburgh, who all promised to besse the French king in the king of Englands quarrell, and to serue him with notable numbers of men, where and when soeuer it should please him to appoint. The alliance of the earle of Heineault first procured the king of England all these friends, vnto the which earle he had sent ouer the bishop of Lincolne and other in ambassage, immediatlie after that he had resolved to make warres against France, by the counsell and aduise of sir Robert Dartois, as in the French historie more plainlie appeareth. In this meane season was quene Philip brought to bed at Antwerpe of hir third sonne, which was named Lionel. The king of England earnestlie followed his businesse, and had manie treaties with his friends and confederats, till at length he made sure to him the friendship of all those townes & countries, which lie betwixt France and the river of Rhene: onelie the cities of Tourne and Cambrie held of the French kings part, though Cambrie belonged to the empire.

In this twelfth yeare of king Edwards reigne at a counsell holden at Southampton by the duke of Cornetwall, lord warden of England in absence of the king his brother, and by manie of the prelates and barons of the realme, there was granted to the king a subsidie in twell, to the great burthen of the commons: but for so much as the cleargie of the land was not present at that counsell, it was ordeined that they should be called, and so they assembled in a conuocation at London the first day of October, in which the cleargie granted to the king a tenth for the third yeare then to come, ouer and besides the two tenths before granted, and that the tenth of this present yeare should be paid in shorter time than it was appointed: but they flatlie denied to grant their twell, which neuertheless the laitie paid, and that to their great hinderance, for it rose double to a fiftene. From the beginning of October, to the beginning of December this yeare, fell such abundance of raine that it hindered greatlie the husbandmen in sowing of their winter corne: and in the beginning of December came such a vehement frost continuing the space of twelue weeks, that it destroyed by all the seed almost that was sowne, by reason whereof small store of winter corne came to profe in the summer following: but though there was no plentie, yet all kinds of graine were sold at a reasonable price, through want of monie.

The Frenchmen by sea fore troubled the sea coasts of this realme, speciallie where the champion countries stretch towards the sea coasts. At Hastings in the feast of Corpus Christi, they burnt certeine fishermen houses, and slue some of the inhabitants. Also in the hauens about Denonshire and Cornetwall, and towards Wistow, they toke and burnt certeine ships, killing the mariners that came to their hands, and in the Whittun-wake they landed at Plinmouth, and burnt the more part of the towne: but Hugh Courtne earle of Denonshire, a man almost fourscore yeares of age, and other knights and men of the countrie came against these Frenchmen, slaying such as came into their hands to the number of five hundred, as was esteemed, and chased the residue. The Scots also about the same time did much hurt and great mischief to the Englishmen both by sea and land.

glas, with a number of men of warre, returned from France home into England, and to him upon his returne the castell of Colmper was deliuered, with all the countrie thereabouts. After this, comming to the siege of St. Johns towne, which the gouernour the earle of Purrey, the erle of March, Patrike de Dunbarre, and other of the Scottish lords had besieged, at length it was surrendered by sir Thomas Withed capiteine there of the English garison, departing in safetie home into England. Thre daies before the feast of the Assumption of our ladie, there chanced in the night season such a mightie and sudden inundation of water at Newcastle upon Tyne, that it bare downe a peece of the towne wall, sir perches in length, nere to a place called Walknot, where a hundred and twentie temporall men with diuerse preests and manie women were drowned and lamentable perished.

But now to returne to the king, which all this while remained in Brabant. We haue heard how the citie of Cambrie held with the French king: wherefore the R. of England assembling together a mightie strong armie aswell of Englishmen as of the low countries of Dutchland, ment to besiege it, but first he sent the archbishop of Canturburie with the bishops of Lincolne and Durham vnto Arras, as commissioners from him to meet there with the archbishop of Rouen, and the bishops of Langres and Beauuais, appointed to come thither as commissioners from the French king, to treat with the Englishmen of a peace, but they could not agree vpon any conclusion, whereupon king Edward, comming forward with his power, approached to Cambrie, and planted his siege round about it. But the bishop, not meaning to deliuer the citie vnto king Edward nor vnto any other that should demand it to the behoofe of the emperor Ludouike of Baviere, as then excommunicated of the pope, had receiued into the towne five thousand Frenchmen, with the French kings eldest sonne, the duke of Brabantie latelie returned out of Guien, and the lord Theobald Marquis, with certeine companies of Sansons, so that the citie was so defended, that the king of England perceiuing he should but lose time, letted his siege, and entred into France, pitching his field at a place called Flamini-guerie.

In the meane time had the French king not onelie made himselfe strong by land, but also by sea, hauing sent forth a strong nauie of ships and gallees towards the coasts of England, which arriving at Southampton the mondays after Michaelmas day, toke and spoiled the towne, and the morrow after set fire vpon it in five places, so that a great part of it was burnt. Also thirtene sailles of the French fleet met with five English ships, and after a long fight which continued nine houres, toke two of those five being tall and goodlie ships; the one called the Edward, and the other the Christopher; the other three being smaller vessels, as two of them barcks and the other a caruell escaped by their swiftnesse of sailing. There was slaine in that fight vpon both parts about the number of six hundred men.

The French king himselfe hearing that the king of England would invade his realme, made his general assemble of his armie at Bertranne; and when he heard that he was entred France, he remoued towards him with his whole power, being at the point of an hundred thousand men, as in the French chronicle you may read more at large. The king of England had not past threescore thousand in his armie at the most: but whilst he late there vpon the borders of France, his people did much hurt, making roades abroad beyond the water of Soine, burning and spoiling abbeies, to towns, and villages, as E.ignit, saint Benoit, Ribemont in Thieralle, saint Govan, sparle, and Cressie. Also the lord Beaumont of Heinault burnt the towne of Gaule, though his daughter was as then within the same towne wife unto Leves earle of Blois: his brother William earle of Heinault was latelic befoze deceased, leaving the earldome to his sonne named also William, who continued with the king of England so long as he laie before Cambrie, & kept him within the bounds of the empire, as though his allegiance had bound him to no lesse, but after the said king was passed the river of Elcault, otherwise called the Schell, and in Latine scaldis, which divideth the empire from the kingdome of France, he would no longer serve the king of England, but departed from him for feare to offend the French king, accounting that the matter pertained not now to the empire, but to the private quarrell and businesse of the king of England: notwithstanding his uncle the said sir John like a faithfull gentleman continued still in king Edward his service.

The two armies of England and France approched within foure miles together, so that euerie man thought that there would sure haue bene battell betwixt them, as there had bene in dede, if the French king had bene willing: yet some saie, that he of himselfe was disposed thereto: but his counsellors advised him to the contrarie, by reason of certeine signs and tokens which they misliked, as the starting of an hare amongst them, and such like. Also it was said that Robert king of Naples being then come into France, whose knowledge in astronomie was knowne to be great, dissuaded the French king by his letters, that in no wise he should fight with the king of England, for he had understanding by art of the beaueilie influences and disposition of the heuies aboue, that if the French king fought with this Edward king of England, he should assuredly be put to the worse. Whether this was the cause, or anie other, sure it is that the Frenchmen had no mind to fight, so that these two mightie armies departed in fume without battell, and the king of England returned into Flanders, soze in dede that he had not with him halfe the number that the French king had, yet in trust of the valiance of his souldiours, chosen out of the pickedst men through England and all the low countrie on this side the Rhene, he went herelle to haue encountered his enemies, if they had come forward.

At his coming backe into Brabant, there was a counsell called at Brussels, where were present all those lordes of the empire which had bene with him in that iourne, as the dukes of Brabant, Gelderland, and Gulike, the marques of Blankbourgh, the earle of Bergen, the lord Beaumont of Heinault otherwise called sir John de Heinault, the lord of Walkeirbourgh, and manie others. Whither came also Jaques Arteueld cheefe gouernour of Flanders. Here in counsell taken how the king of England might best mainteine the wars which he had begun thus against the French king, he was advised that he should in his wife require them of Flanders to aid him, and in his owne selfe to besiege the French king, and to go with host against the said French king, and if they would thus doe, then should he promise them to restore and deliuer into their hands the towne of Lille, Douwaie, and Bethon. The king of England, according to this aduise to him giuen, made suit request to the Flemings, who thereupon desired time to consult together, what they might doe therein, and finally they declared for answer, that they would graunt so do, but yet where as they were bound by faith and oth, and in the summe of two millions of florens in the popes chamber, not to make nor moue any warre against the king of France, whosoever he were, on paine to lose that summe, and beside to run in the sentence of cursing, they besought him, that it might stand with his pleasure, to take upon him the title and armes of France, as the same appertained to him of right, and then would they obey him as rightfull la. of France, and require of him acquittances in discharge of their bonds, and he to pardon them thereof, as rightfull king of France.

The king of England, though he had iust cause to claime the crowne of France, in right of his mother queene Isabell, yet to take upon him the name and armes of that realme, before he had made conquest of any part thereof, he thought it good not with much reason: but yet after he had caused the matter to be thoroughlie debated amongst them of his counsell, as well to satisfie the Flemings, as for other respects, he saie it should be the best waie that might be taken to the aduancement of his purpose. Then he answered the Flemings, that if they would sweare, and scale to this accord, and promise to mainteine his waie, he would be contented to fulfill their desire, and also he promised to get for them againe the towne of Lille, Douwaie, and Bethune. Hereupon was a day assigned to meet at Cant: the king came thither, and the most part of the said lordes, and all the counsellors of the good towne & places in Flanders were there assembled, and so all the foresaid matters were rehearsed, sworne, and sealed, and the armes of France were then quartered with those of England, and from thenceforth he took upon him the name of king of France, in all his writings, proclamations, and commandements. This is noted by Christopher Okland, where speaking of the mingling of the French and English armes, he saith amongst other things;

— ut heret.

Legitimus regni Celtarum insignia gentis Ille suis immiscet atrox, quod amantulus orbis Carabus i. uita ad superas migraverat oras, &c.

With then that we be come to this place, it shall not be uncomely to rehearse somewhat of the right title wherby king Edward did thus claime the crowne of France, hauing of purpose omitted to speake thereof, till now that he intituled himselfe with the name, & took upon him to beare the armes also of France, upon occasion before expressed. It is well knowne that Philip le Beau king of France had issue by his wife queene Jone three sons, Leues surnamed Butine, Philip le Long, and Charles le Beau: also two daughters, the one dieng in his fancie, and the other named Isabell liued, and was married unto Edward the second of that name king of England, who begot of his this Edward the third, that made this claime. The three sounes of the foresaid Philip le Beau reigned ech after other, as kings of France. First after Philip the father, succeeded his eldest sonne Leues Butine, who had issue by his first wife spargaret, daughter to Robert duke of Burgogne, a daughter named Jone, the which was anon giuen in marriage unto Leues earle of Cyren: but she liuing not long, died without issue. His father the said Leues Butine married after the decesse of his first wife, an other wife named Clemence, daughter to Charles spartell, the father of R. Robert of Sicill, whom he left great with child when he died: the child being borne promised a son, & was named John, but liued not manie daies after. Then Philip the Long was admitted unto the crowne of France, though manie stood in opinion that Jone the daughter of Leues Butine, which yet was aliue, ought to haue inherited the kingdome after his father: and namely Doo duke of Burgogne, uncle to the said Jone, was most earnest in that matter, in fa-

honor of his nece. But might ouercame right, so that he was constrained to be quiet. Philip le Long, after he had reigned five yeares, died also, and left no issue behind him. Then lastlie Charles le Beau took upon him the kingdome, and the seventh yeare after died, his wife big bellied, which shortly after brought forth a maiden named Blanch, that freightwaies hasting to follow hir father, liued no while in this world. By this means then the blood totall in the heires male of Philip le Beau was ertinguished in his sonne the foresaid Charles le Beau, whereof the contention toke beginning about the right to the crowne of France, betwixt the Frenchmen and Englishmen, which hanged as yet undecided till these our daies. For king Edward auerred that the kingdome of France appertained unto him as lawfull heire, because that he alone was remaining of the kings stocke, and touched his mothers father Philip le Beau, in the next degree of consanguinitie, as he that was borne of his daughter Isabell.

Therefore immediatlie after the deceasse of the said Charles le Beau, by ambassadours sent unto the perces of France, he published to them his right, requiring that they would admit him king according thereunto: but his ambassadours could neuer be quietlie heard, and therefore returned home without anie towardlie answer, which moued him in the end to attempt the recouerie of his lawfull inheritance by force, sixth by law he could not preuaile, and now by abuse of his friends to take upon him both the title and armes of France, to signifie to the world what right he had to the same. After that this league therefore was concluded with them of Flanders, and that king Edward had taken upon him the name of king of France with the armes; the duke of Gelderland and Jaques van Arteueld went unto all the good towncs and iurisdicions of Flanders, to receiue their oths of fidelitie unto king Edward, persuaading with the people, that the supreme rule belonged unto him, saying to the towncs their ancient lawes and liberties, and to their earle his right of proprietie.

King Edward took upon him the title & armes of the K. of France.
The Flemings swore fealtie to the King of England.

About the latter end of this thirteenth yeare of his Edwards reigne, the mariners and sea-men of the cinque ports, getting them aboard into a number of small ships and balingers, well trimmed and appointed for the purpose, passed over to Bullongne, where they took land one day in a thicke foggie weather, and setting on the Basc towne, they burnt nineteene gallees, foure great ships, and to the number of twentie smaller vessels, together with their tackle and furniture. They set fire also on the houses that stood nere to the water side, and namelie they burnt one great house, wherein laye such a number of oares, sailes, armour, and crossebowes, as might haue sufficed to furnish so manie men as could be well aboard in nineteene gallees. There were manie slaine on both parts in atchiuing this enterprize, but more of the Frenchmen than of the Englishmen. About the same time the queene of England was deliuered of hir fourth soun in the towne of Gaunt, the which was named John, first created earle of Richmond, and after duke of Lancaster. He was borne about Christmasse, in the thirteenth yere of king Edwards reigne.

When king Edward had finished his businesse, with the Flemings at Gaunt, he left his wife queene Philip there still in that towne, and returned himselfe unto Antwerpe, and shortly after about the feast of Candlemasse took the sea, and came backe into England, to provide for monie to mainteine his begun warres. And hereupon about the time of Lent following, he called his high court of parlement at Westminster, in the which he asked of his commons towards his charges, for the recouerie of his right in Parlement.

France, the first part of their moueable goods, the customes of wools for two yeares to be paid aforehand, and the ninth sheafe of euerie mans cozne. At length it was agreed, that the king should haue for euerie sacke of wools fortie shillings, and for euerie last of leather fortie shillings, and for other merchandize after the rate, to begin at the feast of Easter, in this fouretenth yeare of the kings reigne, and to indure till the feast of Pentecost then next following, and from that feast till the feast of Pentecost, then next ensuing into one yeare: for which the king granted, that from the feast of Pentecost, which was then to come into one yeare, he nor his heires should not demand, asseesse, nor take, nor suffer to be asseessed or taken, more custome of a sacke of wools of any Englishman, but halfe a marke, and upon the wools fells and leather the old former custome.

Beside this, the citizens and burgeses of cities and god towncs, granted to giue the ninth part of all their goods; and the forren merchants and other not liuing of gaine, nor of breeding cattell, nor of sheepe, should giue the fiftenth part of all their goods lawfullie to the value: for the which he granted that as well now in time of warre as of peace, all merchants, denizens and forreiners (those excepted that were of the enemies countries) might without let safelie come into the realme of England with their goods and merchandize, and safelie tarie, and likewise retorne, paie the customs, subsidies, and profits, reasonable thereof due, so alwaies that the franchises and free customs granted by him or his predecessours reasonable to the citie of London, and other cities, burroughes, and towncs, might alwaies to them be saued. Moreover, there was granted unto him the ninth sheafe, the ninth fleece, and ninth lambe, to be taken by two yeares next coming. And for the leuies thereof, the lords of euerie shire through the land, were appointed to answer him, euerie one for the circuit within the which he dwelled. And because the king must needs occupie much monie per the receipt of this subsidie could come to his hands, he borrowed in the meane time manie notable summes of diuerse cities, and particular persons of this land, amongst the which he borrowed of the citie of London 20000 marks, to be paid againe of the monie coming of the foresaid subsidie.

In the meane while, now that king Edward was come backe into England, the warres were hotlie pursued against his friends, that had their lands nere to the borders of France, and namelie against sir John de Heinauld lord Beaumont, for the French men burned all his lands of Chimale, except the fortresses, and took from thence a great preie. All the frontiers were full of men of warre, lodged within towncs in garrison, as at Tournie, Portaigne, S. Amond, Dowaie, Cambzie, and in other smaller fortresses. These men of warre late not idle, but were doing oftentimes in Flanders, and sometime other where, neither was the countrie of Heinauld spared, though the earle (as we haue heard) did not onlie refuse to serue the king of England against France, but also when the same king entred France, he resorted to the French king, and serued him; yet by the suggestion of the bishop of Cambzie, who complained of the Hainauters, for the damages which they had done him, the French garrisons of the frontiers thereabouts were commanded to make a road into that countrie, which they did, burning the towne of Aiper, and brought from thence a great botie. The earle of Heinauld soe moued therewith to haue his lands spoiled and burnt, desired the French king, and joining with his uncle the lord Beaumont, entred with an armie into Thierasse, took & destroyed

In this meane time the French king procured the pope to pronounce his curse against the Flemings for their rebellion, and to suspend all diuine seruice that ought to be said in anie hallowed place, so that there were no priests to be found that would take upon them to saie any diuine seruice: whereupon the Flemings sent ouer into England certeine messengers to giue notice to king Edward how they were intreated, but he sent them word that he would bring at his comming ouer vnto them, priests that should saie masses and other seruice, whether the pope would or not, for he had priuilege so to do. ¶ In April, Willliam Melton archbishop of Yorke departed this life, after whome variance rose in the election of a new gouernour to that church, so that two were elected, William la Zouch, and William Billelshie: but at length William la Zouch took place, being the 43 archbishop that had sit in that seat. ¶ The earles of Salisbury and Suffolke, which were left in Flanders by king Edward to helpe the Flemings, shortie after Ester, or (as other haue) in the time of Lent, were discomfited by the garrison of Lille, and taken prisoners as they would haue passed by that towne, to haue ioined with Jaques Arteveld, meaning to besiege Tournie, but now by the taking of those two earles that enterprise was broken. The duke of Bormandie with a great armie entered into Heinaut, burning and wasting the countie, euen to the gates of Valenciennes and Duesnop. And thus were they occupied in those parts, whilest the king of England prepared himselfe with all diligence to returne into Flanders.

The French king being aduertised, that the king of England meant shortly to returne into Flanders with a great power, in purpose to invade the realme of France on that side, assembled a naue of four hundred ships vnder the leading of three expert capteins of the warres by sea, as sir Hugh Kiriell, sir Peter Babuchet, and a Geneuwaie named Barbepoir, appointing them to the coasts of Flanders to defend the king of England from landing there, if by any meanes they might. These three capteins or ad-merals came and late with their ships in the haven of Sluise, for that it was supposed the king of England would arrive there, as his meaning was indeed, whereupon when his men, ships, and provisions were once readie in the moneth of June, he took the sea with two hundred saile, and directing his course towards Flanders, there came vnto him the lord Robert Hoptey, with the north naue of England, so that then he had in all about three hundred saile, or (as other saie) two hundred and three score.

The French naue laie betwixt Sluise and Blanc-bergh, so that when the king of England approached, either part descried other, & therewith prepared them to battell. The king of England staid, till the sunne which at the first was in his face, came somewhat westward, and so had it vpon his backe, that it should not hinder the sight of his people, and so therewith did set vpon his enemies with great manhood, who likewise were stoutly encountered him, by reason whereof ensued a foie and deadlie fight betwixt them.
The naues on both sides were diuided into three bat-tels. On the English part, the earles of Gloucester, Northampton and Huntingdon, who was admerall of the fleet that belonged to the cinque ports, and the lord Robert Hoptey admerall of the northerne naue had the guiding of the fore ward, bearing themselves right valiantlie, so that at length the Englishmen hauing the aduantage, not onlie of the sunne, but also of the wind and tide, so fortunallie, that the French fleet was driuen into the freights of the haven, in such wise that neither the souldiers nor mariners could helpe themselves, in somuch that both heauen, sea, and wind, seemed all to haue conspired against the Frenchmen. And herewith manie ships of Flanders ioining themselves with the English fleet, in the end the Frenchmen were vanquished, slaine and taken, their ships being also either taken, holged, or broken.

When night was come vpon them, there were thirtie French ships, that yet had not entred the battell, the which sought by couert of the night to haue sloine awaie, and one of the in being a mightie great vessel, called the James of Wepe, would haue taken awate with hir a ship of Sandwich that belonged to the prio: of Canturburie: but by the helpe of the earle of Huntingdon, after they had fought all the night till the next morning, the Englishmen at length prevailed, and taking that great huge ship of Wepe, found in hir aboue four hundred dead bodies. To conclude, verie few of the French ships escaped, except some of their smaller vessels, and certeine gal-lies with their admerall Barbanoir, who in the beginning of the battell got forth of the haven, aduising the other capteins to do the like, thereby to auoid the danger which they would haue imbraced. There died in this battell fought (as some write) on midsummer daie, in the yeare aforesaid, of Frenchmen to the number of 30000, of Englishmen about 4000, or (as other haue that liued in those daies) not past 400, amongst whom there were foure knights of great nobilitie, as sir Thomas Donhermere, sir Thomas Latimer, sir John Boteler, and sir Thomas Moynings.

It is said also, that the king himselfe was hurt in the thigh. The two English ships that had bene taken the yeare before, the Edward and the Christopher, were recovered at this time, amongst other of the French ships that were taken there. ¶ Sir Peter Babuchet was hanged vpon a crosse pole fastened to a mast of one of the ships. Thorough the willfulnesse of this man, the Frenchmen receiued this losse (as the French chronicles report) bicause he kept the naue so long within the haven, till they were so inclosed by the Englishmen, that a great number of the Frenchmen could neuer come to strike stroke, nor to bte the shot of their artillerie, but to the hurt of their fellows.
Howsoeuer it was, the Englishmen got a famous victorie, to the great comfort of themselves, and discomfort of their aduersaries. ¶ The king of England, after he had thus vanquished his enemies, remained on the sea by the space of three daies, and then comming on land, went to Gant, where he was re-ceiued of the queene with great ioy and gladnesse.

In this meane while the duke of Bormandie besieged the castell of Thine Leuesques, nere to Cambrie, which was taken by sir Walter of Spannie, a lord of Heinaut, at the first beginning of the warres, and euer since till that time kept to the king of England his fide. The earle of Heinaut, who had bene of late both in England with king Edward, and also in Almaine with the emperor, to purchase their assistance for the defense of his countie against the inuasions of the Frenchmen, was now returned home, and meaning to rescue such as were besieged in Thine, sent for succours into Flanders, and into Almaine, and in the meane time leuening such power as he could make with his owne coun-trie, came therewith to Valenciennes, whither forthwith resorted vnto him the earle of Fiamre with two hundred speares, the duke of Wabant with sir hundred, the duke of Gelberland, the earle of Wer-gen, the lord of Walkenburgh, and diuerse other, the which together with the earle of Heinaut went and lodged alongst by the river of Lessault ouer against the French host, which kept siege (as ye haue heard)

There came also to the aid of the earle of Heinault Jaques Arteueld, with his thre scoze thousand Flemings. Now it was thought that they would haue fought yet they had departed in sunder, but they did not. For after it was knowne how the king of England was arrived in Flanders, and had discomfited the French fleet, the duke of Brabant and others thought good to breake up their enterpryse for that time, and to resort unto the king of England, to understand what his purpose was to do. Whether were the Frenchmen hable to giue battell, so that after the captaine of Duine Leuelques, sir Richard Limsin bright an Englishman, and two elquiers, bethyn to the erle of Hamure, John and Thieric, had left their fortresse void, and were come over the ri-uer by boats unto the earle of Heinaults campe, the armies on both sides brake up and departed, the Frenchmen into France, and the other to Valenciennes, and from thence the princes and great lords drew to Gaunt, to welcome the king of England into the countrey, of whome they were right foillie receiued: and after they had communed togither of their affaires, it was appointed by the king, that they should meet him at Willeford in Brabant at a daie prescribed, where he would be ready to consult with them about his proceedings in his warres against his auerfaries the Frenchmen.

At the day appointed, there came to Willeford the dukes of Brabant, and Gelderland, the earle of Hei-nault, Gulike, Hamure, Blackenheim, Bergen, sir Robert Dartois earle of Richmond, the earle of Walkenburgh, and Jaques Arteueld, with the other rulers of Flanders, and manie others. Here it was ordained, that the countreies of Flanders, Brabant, and Heinault, should be so united and knit in one corporation, that nothing should be done amongst them in publick affaires, but by common consent, and if any warres were moued against anye of them, then should the other be ready to aid them, against whome anye such warre was moued: and if upon anye occasion anye discorde rose betwixt them for anye matter, they should make an end of it amongst themselves; and if they could not, then should they stand to the iudgement and arbitrement of the king of England, unto whome they bound themselves by oth to keepe this ordinance and agreement.

Forward,
Courne furnished with a strong power of men.

The French king being informed that the king of England ment to laie siege unto Courne, as it was indeed deuised at this counsell holden at Willeford, toke order for the furnishing thereof with men, munition, and vittells in most defensible wise. There were sent to that towne the best men of warre in all France, as the earle of Cleves constable of France, the young earle of Guines his sonne, the earle of Fois, and his brethren, the earle Amere de Parbon, with manie other, having with them foure thousand souldiers. Sir Godmar du Foie was there before as captaine of the towne, so that it was provided of all things necessarie. Holobert, the king of England (according as it was appointed at the counsell holden at Willeford, about the feast of S. Martyn) departed from Gaunt, and came to Courne, having with him seauen earles of his owne countrey, as Darbie, Burgoyne, Hereford, Huntingdon, Powampton, Gloucester, and Arundell, eight prelates, eight and thentie baronets, two hundred knights, foure thousand men of armes, and nine thousand archers, besides other footmen. He lodged at the gate called saint Martin, in the wall that is toward Wille and Polwaie.

Courne besieged.

Anon after came the dukes of Brabant and Gel-derland, the earle of Gulike, the marquesse of Blanqueburgh, the marquesse of Poule, the earls of Wer-gen, Schaumes, and Heinault: also Jaques Arteueld, who brought with him about fortie thousand Flemings. So that there was at this siege to the number of six scoze thousand men, as some writers assume. There was also an other armie of Flemings, as of the townes of Ypres, Doppingue, Furnes, Castell, of the Chateleinie, & of Bergis, being to the number of fortie thousand, appointed to make warre against the Frenchmen that kept saint Omers, and other townes there on the frontiers of Arthois, which armie was led by the earle of Richmond, otherwise called the lord Robert Dartois, and by sir Henric de Flanders, the which approaching one day to saint O-mers, were sharplie fought with; for within saint O-mers at that time late a strong power of Frenchmen with the duke of Burgoyne, the earle of Arminacke and others.

The Flemings were not willing to serue, for neither had they any trust in their captaine the said earle of Richmond, neither would they willingly haue passed out of their owne confines, but onlie to defend the same from the invasion of their enemies: yet through much persuation, for ward they went, dis-cided into sundrie battels contrarie to their manner.
The enemies perceiuing some aduantage, issued forth upon them, and assailed them verie stoutlie, in so much that the earle of Arminacke setting upon them of Ypres, ouerthrew them, and chased them vnto a towne called Arques, which they had a little before set on fire and burned. An other compantie of Frenchmen, skirmishing with them of Franks, Furnes, and Bergis, put them also to the worse. Contrarily, those Frenchmen that encountered with the lord Robert Dartois, and them of Buges whome he led, sustained great losse, and were beaten backe into the citie: the duke of Burgoyne himselfe being in his small danger for a time, so sharpe the bickering was betwixt them, and the event so variable. Wherefore it is notable and little said in this behalfe, that — incerti fallax fiducia Marti.

There be that write, that this fight continued from thre of the clocke till euentide, and that the earle of Richmond was twice put to flight, for his people did leauie him in the plaine field: but at length by the assaile of sir Thomas Wylhed, whome the king of England had appointed to attend the said earle, with manie Englishmen and archers, he assembled his people eassones togither againe, and setting on his enemies, now when it was almost night, nere to the gates of saint Omers, he finally ouercame them, where were slaine of the French part sixtene barons and fourescore knights, beside a great number of other people. Diuerse also were slaine on the earle of Richmonds part at this last encounter, and among other an English knight, that bare armes eschequered bluer and gules.

Finally, as the earle of Richmond returned towards his campe, which laie in the vale of Castell, he met with certen Arteuelds and Frenchmen, which had bene chasing the other Flemings, and thence it was late in the euening, that one could not take good view of an other, yet heere they fought againe, and so diuerse of the Frenchmen were taken and killed, and amongst other that were caught, was a knight of Burgoyne, named sir William de Wille.
But when the earle of Richmond and those that were with him came to the place where the campe lay, they found that all the residue of the Flemings were fled and gone. And when the said earle came to Castell, the people were ready to haue slaine him. The reuer malice towards him being now much increased with the euill successe of this passed enterpryse, so that he was glad to get him thence, and to repaire vnto king Edward, that laie yet at the siege before Tournie, during which siege manie proper feats of armes were done betwixt those within and them without: for few daies passed without the atching of some enterpryse.

The great armye raised by the French king.

Also the French king, hauing made his assemble at Arras, and got thither a mightie host, as well out of the empire as of his owne subiects, came and lodged at the bridge of Bouuins, thre leagues from Tournie. There were with him the king of Bohem, the duke of Lozaine, the bishop of Spentz, the earles of Bar, mount Belliard, & Sauoie, also the dukes of Burgogne and Burbone, with a great number of other earles and lords, so that the greatest puissance of all France was iudged to be there with the king. Whiles he laie incamped thus at Bouuins, and the king of England at Tournie, manie exploits were atchued betwixt their people, who laie not idle, but still rode abroad and oftentimes met, and then that part which was weakest paid for the others charges, so that manie were slaine & taken on both sides as well of the nobilitie as other. Also diuerse towne were sacked and burned on the frontiers of France, during this siege at Tournie, namelie at the pursuit of the earle of Heinnault, as Seclin, S. Amond, My ches, Landas, and other.

The ladie Jane de Walois sister to the French king, and mother to the earle of Heinnault, travelling still betwixt the parties to bring them vnto some accord, it was granted that either partie should send certeine sufficient persons to intreat of the matter, which should meet at a little chappell, standing in the fields called Clplotin, and hereto also was a truce granted for thre daies.

A truce accorded.

For the English part were appointed the duke of Brabant, the bishop of Lincolne, the duke of Gelderland, the earle of Gultike, and sir John de Heinnault lord Beaumont. For the French part, the king of Bohem, Charles erle of Anson brother to the French king, the bishop of Liege, the earle of Flanders, and the earle of Arminacke: and the ladie of Walois was still among them as a mediatrix, by whose meanes cheslelie they at length did agree vpon a truce to endure for a peare betwene all parties and their men, and also betwene them that were in Scotland, in Gascoigne, and Poitou.

The Flemings released of debts, and of the interdiction.

It was agreed also by these commissioners, that there should other commissioners of either part foure or five meet at Arras at a daie appointed, and thither also should the pope send his legats, to treat of a perpetuall peace and full agreement to be made betwixt the two kings of England and France. There was also consideration had of the Flemings, so that they were released of all such summes of monie as they were by any bonds indangered to paye by forfeiture, or otherwise, for any matter before that time vnto the crowne of France. Also they were released of the interdiction and curse of the church, and then also was their earle restored home. It was further accorded, that the French king should restore vnto the king of England certeine townes and places in Guien, which in the beginning of these warres the earle of Anson had taken from the Englishmen, as Denne in Agenois, and others. Also whereas the French king had seized the countie of Pontien into his hands, which was the dowry of quene Isabell, the mother of king Edward, he should also restore the same vnto king Edward, to hold it as he did before. Whereupon was the siege raised from Tournie, after it had continued there the space of ten weekes and foure daies. They within stood in great danger for lacke of vittels to haue bene constrained to the surrendering of the towne, if this truce had not bene concluded, which caused the French king the sooner to agree, in like case as the lacke of monie caused the king of England to take his truce, which otherwise (as was thought) he would not haue done: so that by the violent constraint of necessitie they were forced thus to do, against which there is no trieng of maiesties, nor struggling to make it stope and obvie: for

A necessitate omnia in seruitutem rediguntur.

After he had raised his siege he went to Cant, and thither came also the earle of Flanders being now restored home to his countrie, and made the king of England great cheare, feasting and banquetting him right princelie, together with the quene. Finally, after that king Edward had refreshed himselfe a while at Cant, he toke a vertie few with him, and came into Zealand; and there taking the seas to passe ouer into England, he was soze tossed by force of outrageous stormes of wind and weather. Yet at length after thre daies and thre nights sailing, in the night of the feast of saint Andrew, he came on land at the towne of London about cocke-croving, and with him the earle of Portsmouth, the lord Walter de Spennie, the lord John Darcie, the sonne of the lord John Beauchampe, Giles Beauchampe, with two chapleins that were his secretaries, sir William Killestie, and sir Philip Weston, beside a few others.

After his arrivall he sent for the bishop of Chichester that was lord chancellor, for the bishop of Conuertie and Lichfield being lord treasurer, and for such of the iudges as were then in London. The lord chancellor, and the lord treasurer, he straightwaies discharged of their offices, threatening to send them into Flanders, there to remaine as pledges for monie that he there owght, or if they refused to go thither, then to keepe them prisoners in the towne. But when the bishop of Chichester declared to him the danger of the canon established against such as imprisoned bishops, he suffered them to depart: but the iudges, to wit, John de Stonore, Richard de Willoughbte, William de Sherehall, and also Nicholas or (as other haue) Spathe de la Beech, who was before gardian of his sonne, and lieutenant of the towne: also John de Wulstie, and William de Pole merchants; and the chiefe clerkes of the chancerie, John de saint Maule, Michaell de Wath, Henrie de Streteford, and Robert de Chikewell; and of the eschequer, John de Thorpe, and manie other, were committed to diuerse prisons, but yet because they were committed but onelie vpon commandement, they were within a while after deliuered.

The lord Wake was also committed, but shortly after, he was deliuered to his great honoz, as Walsingham writeth. Robert de Bourchier was made lord chancellor, and Richard de Sadington lord treasurer: all the shiriffes of shires, and other officers also were removed, and other put in their places, and iustices appointed in euerie shire, to inquire vpon the defaults of collectors and other officers, so that few or none escaped unpunished, howeuer they had demeaned themselves, so straitlie those iustices proceeded in their commissions. The king indeed was soze offended with those whom he had put in trust to leuie monie, and to keepe conueied ouer to him into the low countrie, because that for want thereof in time of need, he was constrained to take truce with his aduersarie the French king, and leaue off his enterpryse, which he was in good forwardnesse to haue gone through withall, if he had not bene disappointed of treasure which he had commanded to be sent ouer vnto him, which was not done but kept backe in whom soeuer the fault rested.

1347 The archb. of Canturburic.

Anno Reg. 15. A letter sent to the deane of Baules.

The archb. of Canturburic refused to come to the court.

In all displeasure against the archbishop of Canturburic, who thereupon withdrew him into the priory of Christes church at Canturburic, and there remaining for a season, wrote his mind to the king, exhorting him not to give too light credit unto such as should counsel him to have those in contempt that were faithful and true to him, for in so doing, he might haply lose the love and good will of his people. Nevertheless, he wished that he should trye out in whose hands the wools and monie remained, which were taken by to his use, and that upon a full accounts had at their hands, it might appeare who were in fault, that he had not monie brought to him, whilst he laye at siege before Tourne, as he had appointed; and that when the truth was knowne, they that were in fault might be worthily punished. And as for his owne cause, he signified, that he was ready to be tried by his peeres, saving alwaies the state of holie church, and of his order, &c. Further, he besought the king, not to thinke evill of him, and of other good men, till the truth might be tried, for otherwise, if judgement should be pronounced, without admitting the partie to come to his answer, as well the guiltlesse as the guiltie might be condemned.

The king nevertheless still offended towards the archbishop, caused Adam bishop of Winchester to indite a letter against him, directed from the king to the deane and chapter of Baules, openlie to be published by them: the effect whereof was, to burthen the archbishop with unthankfulness, and forgetting of his bounden duetie towards his soveraigne lord and loving master, namely, in that where he promised the king to see him throughlie furnished with monie, towards the maintenance of his warres: when it came to passe, none would be had, which turned not onelie to the hinderance of the kings whole proceedings, but also to his great discredit, and causing him to run greatlie in debt by interest, through borrowing of monie, for the payment of the wages of his men of warre, when through the archbishops negligence, who had the cheefe rule of the land, the collectors and other officers slackted their duetie, whereby there was no monie sent over, according to that was appointed: and whereas now, since his coming over, he had sent to the archbishop to come unto him, that by his information, he might the better learne who they were that neglected their duetie, he disobedientlie refused to come, pretending some feare of bodily harme, through the malice of some that were about the king. Whereupon, when Wase lord Stafford, lord steward of the kings house, was sent with a safe conduct, for him to come in all safetie to the court, he flatlie made answer that he would not come, except in full parlement.

Another other misdemeanour was the archbishop charged with towards the king in that letter, as maliciouslie slandering the king for unjust oppression of the people, confounding the cleargie, and greaving the church with exactions, levies of monie, tolles and tallages: Therefore, sith he went about to slander the kings roiall authoritie, to defame his servants; to stirre rebellion among the people; and to withdraie the devotion and love of the earles, lords, and great men of the land from the king: his highnesse declared, that he meant to provide for the integritie & preservation of his god name (whereof it is said, trulix Dukius est are pretiosum nomen salvare) and to meet with the archbishops malice: And hereupon with diverse things were hearkned to the archbishops reproch, which he should do, & more, and suffer to be done, by his evill and sinister counsell; whilst he had the rule of the realme in his hands: under the king, wherein he had shewed himselfe not onelie an acceptor of gifts, but also of persons, in gratifying diverse that nothing had deserved sundrie waies forth, and presuming to do rashlie manie other things to the detriment of the kings roiall state, and hurt of his regall dignitie, and to no small damage of the people, abusing the authoritie and office to him committed, so that if he persisted in his obstinate wilfulness, and rebellious contumacie, the king by those his letters signified, that he meant to declare it more apparentlie in due time and place, and therefore commanded the said deane and chapter of Baules, to publish all those things openlie, in places where they thought convenient, according to their wisdom given to them by God, so as he might have cause to commend therein their careful diligence. This letter was dated at Westminster the tenth of Februarie, in the sixteenth yeare of his reigne over England, and second over France.

Where the Londoners would not permit the kings justices to sit within the citie of London, contrarie to their liberties, the king appointed them to sit in the tower; and when they would not make anie answer there, a great tumult was raised by the commons of the citie, so that the justices being in some perill (as they thought) feigned themselves to sit there till towards Easter. Whereupon, when the king could not get the names of them that raised the tumult, no otherwise but that they were certeine light persons of the common people, he at length pardoned the offense. After this, those justices neither sat in the tower, nor elsewhere, of all that yeare.

In the quindene of Easter, the king held a parlement at London, in the which, the prelates, earls, barons, and commons, presented manie petitions; as to have the great charter of liberties, and the charter of forests duly observed, and that they which brake the same should be discharged of their offices, if they were the kings officers, and that the high officers of the king should be elected and chosen by their peeres in parlement. The king withstood these petitions a certeine time, yet at length he granted to some of them; but as concerning the election of his officers, he in no wise would consent, but yet he was contented that they should receive an oath in parlement, to do justice to all men in their offices, &c. Upon which article and others, a statute was made and confirmed with the kings seale.

In the meane while, the French king had with his wives woone Lewes of Bavaria, that named himselfe emperor, from further favouring the king of England; in so much that, under a colourable pretense of finding himselfe greaved, for that the king of England had without his knowledg taken truce with the French king, he revoked the dignitie of being vicar in the empire, from the king of England, but yet signified to him, that where the French king had at his request put the matter in controuersie betwixt him and the king of England into his hands, to make an end thereof, if it so pleased the king of England, that he should treat as an indifferent arbitrator betwixt them, he promised to do his endeavour, so as he doubted not, but that by his means he should come to a good agreement in his cause, if he would follow his advice. And to receive answer hereof, he sent his letters by one Eberhard a chapeline of his, the reader of the letters herewith to S. Augustins order, requesting the king of England to advertise him by the same messenger, of his whole mind in that behalf.

The king for answer signified againe by his letters to the emperor, that for the zeale which he had answer, to make an accord betwixt him and his adversarie Philippe of Valois, that named himselfe French king, he could not but much commend him, and for his part he had euer wished, that some reasonable agreement might be had betwixt them: but with his right to the realme of France was cleare and manifest inough, he purposed not to commit it by writing into the doubtful iudgement or arbitrement of anie. And as concerning the agreement which the emperor had made with the French king, because (as he alledged) it was lawfull for him so to do, with without the emperors knowledge he had taken truce with the same French king, he said, if the circumstances were well considered, that matter could not minister any cause to moue him to such agreement: for if the emperor remembred, he had giuen to him libertie at all times to treat of peace, without making the emperor priuie thereto (so that without his assent, he concluded not vpon any finall peace) which he protested that he neuer meant to do, till he might haue his prouident aduise, counsell, and assent thereto. And as concerning the renouing of the vicarship of the empire from him, he toke it done out of time; for it was promised, that no such renouation should be made, till he had obtained the whole realme of France, or at the least, the more part thereof. ¶ These in effect were the points of the kings letters of answer vnto the emperor. Dated at London the thirtieth of Iulie, in the second yeare of his reigne ouer France, and sixteenth ouer England.

The decease of the lord Geoffrey de Scrope, & of the bishop of Lincoln. The queene brought to bed.

This yeare, about midsummer, or somewhat before, at Cant in Flanders, died the lord Geoffrey Scrope the kings iustice, and Henrie bishop of Lincoln, two cheefe counsellors to the king. The queene after hir retorne into England, was this yeare brought to bed in the towre of London of a daughter named Blanch, that died young, and was buried at Westminister. ¶ In this meane while, during the warres betwixt France and England, the French king in fauour of David king of Scotland, had sent men of warre into Scotland, vnder the conduct of sir Arnold Dandeghen, who was after one of the marshals of France, and the lord of Carrentiers, with other, by whose comfort and helpe, the Scots that toke part with king David, did indeuor themselves to recover out of the Englishmens hands, such castles and fortrells as they held within Scotland, as in the Scottish historie ye shall find mentioned, and how about this time, their king the foresaid David returned south of France into Scotland by the French kings helpe, who having long before concluded a league with him, thought by his friendship to trouble the king of England so at home, that he should not be at great leisure to invade him in France.

The commissioners that met at Arras.

But now to tell you what chanced of the meeting appointed at Arras. For the commissioners that shuld there treat of the peace, when the day assigned of their meeting was come, there arrived for the king of England the bishop of Lincoln, the bishop of Dunelm, the earle of Warwike, the erle of Richmond, sir Robert Dartois, sir John of Betnauld, other wise called lord Beaumont, and sir Henrie of Flanders. For the French king, there came the earle of Artois, the duke of Burbon, the earle of Flanders, the earle of Blois, the archbishop of Sens, the bishop of Beauuons, and the bishop of Amers. The pope sent thither two cardinals, Paples and Clermont; these commissioners were in treatie sixtie daies, during the which, manie matters were put forth and argued, but none concluded: for the Englishmen demanded largelie, and the Frenchmen would depart with nothing, sauing with the countie of Pontien, the which was giuen with queene Isabell in marriage to the king of England. So the treatie brake, the commissioners departed, and nothing done, but onelie that the truce was prolonged for two yeares further.

Thus were the wars partlie appeased in some part of France, but yet was the truce but slenderlie kept in other parts, by reason of the duke of Britaine. For whereas contention arose betwixt one Charles de Blois, and John earle of Mountfort, about the right to the duchie of Britaine, as in the historie of France maie more plainelie appeare; the earle of Mountfort, thinking that he had wrong offered him at the French kings hands, who fauoured his aduersarie Charles de Blois, alied himselfe with the king of England. And (as some write) after he had wonne diuerse cities and towne within Britaine, he came ouer into England, and by doing homage to king Edward, acknowledged to hold it of him, as of the soueraign lord thereof, so that he would promise to defend him and that duchie against his aduersaries: which the king promised him to do. After this, the French king made such warres against this earle of Mountfort, that he was at length taken prisoner in the towne of Chaunis, and committed to safe keeping within the castell of Loure at Paris. But his wife being a stout woman, and of a manlie courage, stood by in the quarrell of hir husband, and presented a young sonne which she had by him, vnto such capitains and men of warre as serued hir husband, requiring them not to be dismayd with the infortunate chance of hir husbands taking; but rather like men of god stomachs, to stand in defense of his right, with whatsoeuer happened to him, the same remained in that young gentleman his sonne: meaning that although the enemies should deale tyrannicallie with him, & without regard of his noblenesse practise his ouerthrow; yet there was hope in hir son, as increase of yeares should minister strength and courage, both to be reuenged on his fathers enemies, and to ad an enlargement of glorie and renowne to his present honor by practises of his prowesse: which to be singular the same symmetrie or goodlie proportion of his person and his tolle countenance seemed to testifie; for

This countesse of Mountfort was sister vnto the earle of Flanders, and named Margaret, and not Claudia (as some write.) She was verie diligent in hir businesse, and spared no travell to aduance hir cause, so that she did not onelie the parts of the men of warre, but also of the people of Britaine, the which fauoured hir husband, and lamented the mishap of his taking. She first furnished such cities, towne, castles, and fortrells as hir husband had in possession, with men, munition and vittels, as Kenes, Wimaunt, Guerland, Wainbont, and others. This done, she sent ouer into England, sir Emerie de Clifton, a noble man of Britaine, to require the king of England of succors, with condition, that if it pleased him, hir sonne John should marrie one of his daughters. ¶ The king of England glad to haue such an entrie into France, as by Britaine, thought not to refuse the offer, & thereupon granted to aid the countesse: & with with raising a power, sent the same ouer into Britaine, vnder the conduct of the lord Walter of Spynie, and others: the which at length, after they had continued long vpon the sea, by reason of contrarie winde, arrived in Britaine, in which meane time, a great armie of Frenchmen were sent into Britaine, and had besieged the citie of Harfleur, and finally wonne it by surrender: & were now before the towne of Wainbont, which with strict siege, and busie running of the walles, they were nere at point to haue taken, and the countesse of Mountfort with her selfe, & the few countes of England had not arrived there, even at such time as the Frenchmen were in talke with them within, about the surrender. The lord of Hannie, and the Englishmen arriving at Hanibout thus in time of imminent danger, wherein the countesse, and the other withyn that towne were pressittie beset, greatlie recomforted the said countesse, as she well shewed by hir cherefull countenance in receiuing them. Shortly after their arriuall, a certeine number of the English archers, issuing forth, beat the Frenchmen from an engine which they had reared against the walles, and set fire vpon the same engine. To conclude, the Frenchmen liked the Englishmen so well, that shortly after being wearie of their companie, they raised their siege to get themselves further from them: and in an other part of the countrie indentured themselves to win townes and castels as they did indeed, hauing their armie diuided into two parts, the lord Charles de Blois gouerning the one part, and a Spaniard called the lord Lewes de Spaine the other (which was the same that thus departed from the siege of Hanibout, after the arriuall of the Englishmen) and then winning the townes of Dinant and Guerand, passed into the countrie of Britaine Bissonant, and there not farre from Quimpercozentine, were discomfited by the Englishmen, who followed them thither. Of six thousand Genowais, Spaniards, and Frenchmen, which the lord Lewes de Spaine had there with him, there escaped but a few awaie. A nephew which he had there with him named Alfonse was slaine, howbeit he himselfe escaped, though not without sore hurts.

This yeare, the first of June queene Philip was deliuered of a sonne at the towne of Langley, the which was named Comund, and surnamed Langley of the place where he was thus bozne. Also about the same time was a great infesse kept by king Edward at the towne of Dunstable, with other counterfeited feates of warre, at the request of diuerse yong lords and gentlemen, whereat both the king and queene were present, with the more part of the lords and ladies of the land. The lord Charles de Blois, hauing in the meane time wone Hannes, and other townes, brought his armie backe vnto Hanibout, and there besieged the same, and the countesse of Mountfort within it. But for so much as it was well fortified, and provided of all things necessarie to defend a siege, the Englishmen being returned thither againe after the ouerthrow of the lord Lewes de Spaine, it could not be easilie wone. At length, by the labour of certeine lords of Britaine, a truce was taken for a time, during the which, the countesse of Richmond came ouer into England, to commune with king Edward, touching the affaires of Britaine, who appointed sir Robert Dartois earle of Richmond, the earles of Salisburie, Penbroke, and Suffolke, the lords Stafford, Spenser, and Bourchier, with others, to go with hir ouer into Britaine, who made their promise, so that they might take the sea, to come thither against the time that the truce betwixt the countesse and the lord Charles de Blois should be expired.

There be that write, how the lord Walter de Hannie, toke a truce indeed with the lord Charles de Blois, to indure till Allhallontide next ensuing, but with condition, that if the king of England were contented therewith, then the same to be firme and fullie ratified, otherwise not. Whereupon, when about the beginning of Iulie, the said lord Walter came ouer into England, bringing with him the lord of Alons, and other such prisoners as he had taken, and signified to king Edward what he had concluded touching the truce, the king liked not thereof, and so sent ouer the earles of Northampton and Denonshire, the lord Stafford, and sir William de Billebrie his chapleine, and one of his secretaries, with five hundred men of armes, and a thousand archers, which taking ship, on the vigill of th Assumption of our ladie, sailed forth towards Britaine. The Frenchmen therefore vnderstanding that this succour was coming, appointed the lord Lewes de Spaine, sir Charles Grimaldo, and sir Antonie Dozia, with three thousand Genowais, and a thousand men of armes, embarked in two and thirtie great ships, to lie on the sea in wait to encounter with the English fleet, as the same should approach towards Britaine.

About Easter, the countesse of Mountford with the English armie, appointed to attend hir, toke the sea at Southampton, and at length met with the lord Lewes de Spaine, and his fleet, where betwixt them was fought a sore battell. Of the Englishmen there were six and forty vessels, but the lord Lewes de Spaine had nine great ships, and of more force than anie of those which the Englishmen had, and also he had three gallies. They began to fight about euensong time, and continued till that night parted them, and had gone together againe in the morning, if by a tempest that rose about midnight, the same night, they had not bene scattered in sunder. The Spaniards and Genowais toke a waie with them foure English ships, which being vittellers, were left behind. And because the same Spaniards and Genowais were able to abide the sea better than the Englishmen, by reason of their great ships, they kept the maine sea; but the Englishmen were aduised by their mariners to drawe vnto the land, and so they did, arriuing at a little hauen, not farre from Hannes, where comming on land, they straightwaie made towards that citie, and besieged it, not ceassing to assault it both day and night, till at length they wan it, by giuing the assault in two places at once, whilst an other number of them set vpon it in a third place, where was no suspicion, and so entred.

Hannes won

After this, the most part of the Englishmen departed from Hannes, as some with the countesse, to bring hir vnto Hanibout, and some with the earls of Salisburie, Suffolke, and Coznewall, who went and laid siege to Rennes, so that the earle of Richmond remained in Hannes, with the lords Spenser and Stafford, to keepe it, hauing a certeine number of archers and other men of warre with them. The lord Clifton, and sir Henrie de Leon, which were within Hannes, when it was taken by the Englishmen, and found means to escape, were abashed at the matter, that they had so lost the citie, whereupon they secretly assembled a great power of men thereabouts, and came againe vnto Hannes, and so fiercely assailed the gates and wals, that in the end they entred by more force. The earle of Richmond was sore hurt, but yet he escaped out at a posterne gate, and the lord Stafford with him, but the lord Spenser was taken by sir Henrie de Leon.

Other write otherwise, both of the landing, and also concerning the misfortune of the lord Spenser, alledging letters sent from the earle of Northampton (whome the same authors repute as generall of that armie into Britaine) directed to the king, in which was signified, how that within the octaues of the Assumption of our ladie, they arriued on the coast of Britaine, nere to the towne and castell of Bress, in the which the dutchesse of Britaine with hir children were of the enemies besieged, both by sea and land, by sea with thirtene great gallies, by land by the lord Charles de Blois, the earls of Sauidie and Foiz. But the gallies perceiving the English fleet to be approached vpon them, yet they were aware, so that they were compassed in, to their great danger, thre of the same galleies fled, and so escaped, the residue got by into a river of the same haven, where they that were aboard, left their vessels and fled to the land, and as well they, as the other that held siege before Havre, and such as kept a castell there, not farre off, called Coule forrest, packed awaie without any more ado. The English mariners following the galleies (that were withdrayen to the river, with their small boats and barges, set fire on the galleies, and so burnt them.

Thus all the Englishmen came on land, and leaving the lord Saie captaine in the said castell of Coule forrest, they passe forward into the countrie, and comming to a castell commonlie called Pontfleur Melir, gave an assault thereto, where manie of their men of warre were wounded, and sir James Louell slaine. After this, staing a time for the coming of their confederats, which after a fortnights space came to them on the mondaie, being the moyroto after Michaelmas daie, they heard that the lord Charles de Blois was comming in all hast with a power of three thousand men of armes, twelve hundred Genowais, & a great multitude of commons to raise the siege. Whereupon the earle of Northampton with his armie marched sollic towards them, and choosing a plot of ground convenient for his purpose, fought with his enimies, slue and toke of them at the least three hundred men of armes. The earle of Northampton lost not any noble man in this fight, the lord Edward Spenser onelie excepted.

But now as touching the earle of Richmond, Froissard saith, that he comming to Haribout, after he had thus lostannes, toke the sea, and sailed into England: but by reason of being tossed on the seas, his wounds rankled so, that shortly after his coming to London he died, & was buried in the church of St. Paul. The king of England was sore displeased with his death, and immediatlie after passed over himselfe into Britaine with a great armie: and landing there the nine and twentieth of November, at the same place where the earle of Richmond did land at his arrivall there, not far fromannes, he went straight and besiegedannes, but perceiving that it would not be wone but by long siege, he left the earle of Arundell, and the lord Stafford to continue the siege, whilst he went toannes to aid his people, which still laie at the siege thereof. Before the kings arrivall in Britaine, those that were there under the earle of Northampton, as the lord Hugh Spenser, and the lord Richard Talbot, with their retinues, fought with the Frenchmen nere to Pozeis, where a few Englishmen, scarce five hundred, discomfited a mightie power of Frenchmen, esteemed to be above fiftie thousand, of whome some they slue, and some they toke. Among other was taken the lord Geoffrey de Charnie, accounted for one of the best and sagest knights in France, whome the lord Richard Talbot toke and sent into England.

But now as touching the kings doings, we find, that whilst he remained for this winter season in Britaine, his people forraied the countrie foure daies iournie in length, and two daies iournie in breadth. After his comming toannes, he staied not past five daies, but leaving them whome he found there to continue the siege, he went himselfe to Havre, where he had knowledge, that the lord Charles de Blois was. At his comming thither, he inuironed the citie about with a strong siege, & made manie fierce assaults to the walles and gates, but could not prevail, then leaving certeine of his lords there to continue the siege, he raised with the residue, and went to Dinan, which towe with soze and fierce assaults he lastlie wone, and after that drew againe towardsannes, for that he was informed, how the duke of Normandie was comming downe towards him, with an armie of forty thousand men. Whereupon he sent for them that laie at siege beforeannes to come unto him, and suffered them atannes to keepe their siege still, till they heard other word from him.

The duke of Normandie with foure thousand men of armes, and thirtie thousand other men of warre, comming into Britaine to aid the lord Charles de Blois, was advertised, that the king of England was with the most part of all his power withdrayen toannes, and there laie at siege, soze constraining them within: wherefore he also drew thitherwards, and approaching to the place, incamped with his armie quer against the king of England, inclosing his field with a great trench. The king of England supposing he should have battell, sent unto those which laie at siege beforeannes, commanding them to come from thence unto him: so that by this means all the powers, both of the king of England, and of the duke of Normandie, generall to his father the French king in those warres of Britaine, being assembled beforeannes, had fought some great and bloudie battell, as was supposed, for the whole trial of the right of Britaine, if the cardinals of Cleremont and Peneski, as legats from pope Clement the first, had not taken by the matter, by concluding a truce betwixt them, for the tearme of three yeares.

Commissioners appointed to treat with these cardinals, on the behalfe of the king of England were these, Henrie of Lancaster earle of Derby, William Bohun earle of Northampton, William Montacute earle of Salisbury, Rafe lord Stafford, Bartholomew lord Burghese, Nicholas lord Cantelou, Reginald lord Cobham, Walter lord of Spennie, Maurice lord Berkeley, and maister John Gifford archdeacon of Elie. For the French king, the duke of Burgogne, and Piers duke of Burbon were deputed commissioners. Such diligence was used by the parties, that finally they agreed upon this truce of three yeares, with certeine articles for meane to conclude some small peace, as that there should be sent from either king some personages of their blood and others, unto the court of Rome, with sufficient authoritie, to agree, confirme, and establish upon all controuersies and dissensions betwixt the said kings, according to the agreement of the pope, and such as should be so sent to treat thereof.

It was further agreed, that they should haue libertie to declare and pronounce their arguments and reasons before the pope, but not to haue power to decide and give sentence, but onlie by waie of some better treatie and order of agreement to be made. And these commissioners were appointed to appeare before the pope, afore the feast of saint John Baptist next ensuing, and the pope to dispatch the businesse before Christmasse after, if by consent of the said nobles, the terme were not prozaged. And if it so were that the pope could make no agreement, yet should the truce indure the prescribed terme, to wit, till the feast of S. Michael the archangell, and for the space of three yeares then next ensuing, betwixt the kings of France, England and Scotland, the earle of Heinnault and their allies, as the dukes of Brabant, and of Gelderland, also the marques of Gullikerland, the lord Beaumont, otherwise called sir John de Heinnault, and the people of Flanders, in all their lands and dominions, from the date of the charter made hereof, by all the said terme aforesaid, to be observed, holden and kept. Also, the king of Scots, and the earle of Heinnault were appointed to send certeine persons, as commissioners for them, unto the said court of Rome.

This truce was also accorded to be kept in Britaine, betwixt the said kings and their adherents, in which which countrie, as well as in Guien, and other places, euerie man should remaine in possession of that which he held at the time of concluding this truce, save that the citie of Hannes should be deliuered into the hands of the cardinall, to be kept by them in the popes name, during the truce, and then to dispose thereof, as should seeme to them good. And other articles were compiled in the charter of this truce, so long bare to rehearse, all the which were confirmed with the oths of the said dukes of Burgoigne, and Burbone, on the french kings behalfe; and of the earles of Derby, Portsmouth and Salisbury, the lord Burghers, and the lord of Hannie, for the king of England. In witness whereof, the said cardinals caused the charter to be made, putting thereunto their seales, the nineteenth daie of Januarie, in the yeare 1343 in presence of diuerse prelates, and of the earles of Bullongne, Auferre, Sancerre, Fougny, and Poicien, the lord Piles de Rohers, the lord Ingram de Concie, and the foresaid lords, Cantelowe, Cobham, and Berkeley, with manie other lords, barons, nobles, and gentlemen.

Anno Reg. 17.

The king of England returned home by sea, with a few other ships, to pass by long seas, were marvellously tormented by tempest, so that their ships were scattered and driven to take land at diuerse hauens. The dutchess of Britaine with hir sonne and daughter, came on land in Deuonshire. Sir Piers de Wale, and his sonne sir Henrie Wale, and sir John Kaine knights, were drowned, together with the ship in which they passed. The king escaping verie hardlie, landed at Weymouth, and on the first day of March came to London to the queene. In the quindene of Easter, he held a parlement at Westmynster, in which he created his eldest sonne Edward prince of Wales.

Ambassadors appointed to go to the pope.

When this truce was thus confirmed, manie of the English armie returned home through France, so to passe ouer by the narrow seas into England, but the king himselfe, with a few other, taking their ships to passe by long seas, were marvellously tormented by tempest, so that their ships were scattered and driven to take land at diuerse hauens. The dutchess of Britaine with hir sonne and daughter, came on land in Deuonshire. Sir Piers de Wale, and his sonne sir Henrie Wale, and sir John Kaine knights, were drowned, together with the ship in which they passed. The king escaping verie hardlie, landed at Weymouth, and on the first day of March came to London to the queene. In the quindene of Easter, he held a parlement at Westmynster, in which he created his eldest sonne Edward prince of Wales. In this parlement were diuerse matters talked of, and speciallie concerning wools, and of the assessement of a certeine price of them, more and lesse, according to the seuerall parts of the realme, and of the customes to be made of them, to wit, three marks and an halfe, for euerie sacke to be transported forth of the realme.

Also in the same parlement were ambassadoys appointed forth, such as should go to the pope to treat of peace (as in the charter of the truce among other articles it was contained) whose names follow, John bishop of Excester, Henrie de Lancaster earle of Derby, Hugh le Despenser lord of Glamorgan, cousins to the king, Kate lord Stafford, William de Norwich deane of Lincoln, William Trussell knight, and master Andrew de Wyford a ciuillian. These persons were sent with commission to the pope, to treat with him, not as pope, nor as iudge, but as a priuate person, and a common frend to both parts, to be a meane or mediator, to find out some indifferent end of all controuersie betwixt the parties. The date of their commission was at Westmynster, the foure and twentieth of Maie, in this seauenteenth yeare of the kings reigne.

Moreover, in this parlement a grauous complaint was exhibited, by the earles, barons, knights, burgesses, and other of the commons, for that strangers, by vertue of reseruations and prouisions apostolike, got the best benefices of this land into their hands, and neuer came at them, nor bare any charges due for the same, but diminishing the treasure of the realme, and conuiering it forth, soze indamaged the whole state. The bishops durst not, or would not giue their consents in exhibiting this complaint, but rather seemed to stand against it, till the king compelled them to giue ouer.

Hereupon, a letter was framed by the lords of the temporalitie and commons, which they directed unto the pope in all humble manner, beseeching him to consider of the derogation done to the realme of England, by such reseruations, prouisions, and collations of benefices, as had been practised here in England. And therefore, sith the churches of England had bene founded and endowed by noble and worthy men in times past, to the end the people might be instructed by such as were of their owne language, and that he being so farre off, and not understanding the default, had (like as some of his predecessors more than in times past had bene accustomed) granted by diuerse reseruations, prouisions, and collations, the churches and spirituall promotions of this land unto diuerse persons, some strangers, yea, and enimies to the realme, whereby the monie and profits were carried forth, the cures not prouided for, almes withdrawne, hospitalitie decayed, the temples and other buildings belonging to the churches ruined and fallen downe, the charitie and deuotion of the people soze diminished, and diuerse other greuous enormities thereby growne cleane contrarie to the founders minds: wherefore, upon due consideration thereof had, they signified to him, that they could not suffer such enormities any longer, & therefore besought him whole to reuoke such reseruations, prouisions, collations, to auoid such slanders, mischances, and harmes as might insue, and that the cures might therewith be committed to persons meet for the exercise of the same: further also, beseeching him without delaye, to signifie his intention, sith they meant to imploye their diligence to remedie the matter, and to see that redresse might be had according to reason. The date of these letters was in full parlement at Westmynster, the eight and twentieth of Maie, in the yeare of Grace 1343.

Beside these letters, were other written, and sent from the king, containing in summe, the tenor of the other aboue mentioned, and one sir John Shorwich, knight a graue personage and well seene in the law, was appointed to go with the same, who comming to Auignon, and there presenting his letters in the popes priuate chamber, where the pope sat, with all his cardinals about him, receiued no great courteous welcome, after his letters were once read. And whie? Euen because the contents of the same misliken his mind, tending to the impairing of his vsurped profits & comodities from time to time in this land,

Ambrosius enim sibi totum vendicat orbem, seq. (celum) Christo clamat esse parem.

Now when the knight made answer to such words as he heard the pope utter, and charged him with giuing the deanrie of Worke unto one that was reputed the kings enemie, the pope said; Well, it is not unknowne to vs who made and indited these letters, and we know that thou madest them: but there is one that pincheth at vs, and we shall punish him well inough: we know all. Hereunto he added thus much more, that there was a knight that spake defamorous words of him, and the church of Rome, therewith he seemed highlie offended. To conclude, he said, that he would answer the letters of the king and commons, as touching the points contained in the same. The cardinals, after they had heard these things, departed as if they had bene soze offended and troubled therewith: and the knight taking his leaue of the pope, departed also forth of the chamber, and without anie longer abode, got him awaie toward Burdeaur, about other of the kings business, doubting leass if he had staid longer, he might haue bene kept there against his will. The pope sent answer indeed, but neuertheless, the king proceeded in prohibiting such prouisions, and collations within his realme, on paine of imprisonment and death to the intrudors thereby, as after ye shall perceiue.

This yeare about Whosummer, there were solenne iusts proclaimed by the lord Robert Hoyle, which were holden in Smithfield, where for challengers, came forth one apperelled like to the pope, bringing with him twelue other in garments like to cardinals, which toke vpon them to answer all comers, for three courses. On the defendants side, ran the prince of Wales, with manie earls, barons, knights and esquires innumerable, so that those iusts continued three daies together, to the great pleasure of the beholders.

This yeare, king Edward ordeined a certeine new coine of gold, which he named the floren, that is, the penie of six shillings eight pence, the halfe penie of the value of three shillings foure pence, and the farthing of the value of twentie pence. This coine was ordeined for his wars in France, the gold whereof was not so fine as the noble, which in the fourteenth yeare of his reigne he had caused to be coined. This yeare, the king caused a great number of artificers and labourers to be taken up, whome he set in hand to build a chamber in the castell of Windsor, which was called the round table, the floor whereof, from the center or middle point, vnto the compasse throughout, the one halfe was (as Walsingham writeth) an hundred foot, and so the diameter or compasse round about, was two hundred foot. The expenses of this worke amounted by the weeke, first vnto an hundred pounds, but afterward by reason of the wars that folloved, the charges was diminished vnto two and twentie pounds the weeke (as Thomas Walsingham writeth in his larger booke, intituled, the historie of England) or (as some copies haue) vnto 9 pounds. This yeare also, William Montacute earle of Salisburie conquered the Ile of Man, out of the hands of the Scots, which Ile the king gaue vnto the said earle, and caused him to be intituled, and crowned king of Man. This Ile (as Robert Southwell noteth) was wonne by the Scots, about the second yeare of Edward the second his reigne, who in the yeare before, to wit, anno Christi 1307, had giuen the same Ile vnto Piers de Gaueffon, whom he had al so made earle of Cornewall.

The order of the garter
founded.

Moreover, about the beginning of this eighteenth yeare of his reigne, king Edward held a solenne feast at his castell of Windsor, where betwixt Candlemasse and Lent, were achieved manie martiall feasts, and iusts, toynaments, and diuers other the like warlike pastimes, at the which were present manie strangers of other lands, and in the end thereof, he deuised the order of the garter, and after established it, as it is at this daie. There are six and twentie companions or conferrers of this fellowship of that order, being called knights of the blew garter, & as one dieth or is depriued, an other is admitted into his place. The Ile of England is euer chiefe of this order. They weare a blew robe or mantell, & a garter about their left leg, richlie wrought with gold and pretious stones, hauing this inscription in French vpon it, Honi soit qui mal y pense, Shame come to him that euill thinketh. This order is dedicated to S. George, as chiefe patrone of men of warre, and therefore euerie yeare do the knights of this order keepe solenne his feast, with manie noble ceremonies at the castell of Windsor, where king Edward founded a colledge of canons, or rather augmenting the same, ordeined therein a deane with twelue canons secular, eight peticanons, and thirtene vicars, thirtene clerks, and thirtene choristers.

The knights haue certeine lawes and rules appertaining to their order, amongst the which this is chiefe to be obserued (as Polydor also noteth) that they shall aid and defend one another, and neuer turne their backs or runne awate out of the field in time of battell, where he is present with his soueraigne lord, his lieutenant or deputie, or other capteine, hauing the kings power roiall and authoritie, and wher as his banners, standards, or pennons are spred. The residue of the lawes and rules appertaining vnto this noble order, I doe here purpose to omit, for that the same in another place more conuenient is expessed, so far as may be thought expedient. But now touching these six and twentie noble men & knights, which were first chosen and admitted into the same order, by the first founder thereof, this king Edward the third, their names are as folloiweth.

First the said noble prince king Edward the third, the prince of Wales duke of Cornewall and earle of Chester his eldest sonne, Henrie duke of Lancaster, the earle of Warwike, the capitall de Beuch alias Bus or Bruce, Rafe earle of Stafford, William Montacute earle of Salisburie, Roger lord Mortimer, John lord Lisle, Bartholomew lord Burghesh, the lord John Beauchampe, the lord de Wapin, Hugh lord Courtnie, Thomas lord Holland, John lord Gaie, Richard lord Fitz Simon, sir Miles Stapleton, sir Thomas Malle, sir Hugh Wrottesley, sir Pele Loring, sir John Chandos, James lord Audelie, sir Dtes Holand, sir Henrie Emme, sir Sanctet Dabychcourt, sir Walter Banell. Christopher Okland speaking of the first institution of this honorable order, doth saie, that after foure daies were expired in the said exercises of chivalrie, the king besides the rich garter which he bestowed vpon them that tried maisteries, did also giue them a pretious collar of S S. but whether this collar had his first institution then with the garter he saith nothing, belike it was an ornament of greater antiquitie. Oklands words are these as folloiweth;

concertatoribus ampla Premia dat princeps, baccas induit illis Crura persicelides, quas vnio misit Eous Commendat, flammis interlucente pyropo.
Præterea ex auro puro, quod odorifer Indus Miserrat, inserta donabat iaspide gemma, Siformam species duplicato ex sigmate torques.

The cause and first originall of instituting this order is vncertaine. But there goeth a tale amongst the people, that it rose by this means. It chanced that William Edward finding either the garter of the queene, or of some ladie with whom he was in loue, being fallen from his leg, stooped downe and toke it vp, whereat diuers of his nobles found matter to iest, and to talke their fantasies merilie, touching the kings affection towards the woman, vnto whome he said, that if he liued, it should come so passe, that most high honor should be giuen vnto them for the garters sake: and there vpon shortly after, he deuised and ordeined this order of the garter, with such a posse, whereby he signified, that his nobles iudged otherwise of him than the truth was. Though some may thinke, that so noble an order had but a meane beginning, if this tale be true, yet manie honorable degrees of estates haue had their beginnings of more base and meane things, than of loue, which being orderlie vsed, is most noble and commendable, sith nobilitie it selfe is couered vnder loue, as the poet Ouid aptlie saith, Nobilitas sub amore iacet.

William de Montacute earle of Salisburie king of Man, and marshall of England, was so hurt at the iusts holden here at Windsor (as before ye haue heard) that he departed this life, the more was the pitie, within eight daies after. The king about the same time, to wit, in the quindene of Candlemasse, held a conncell at London, in the which with god aduise and sound deliberation had vpon the complaint of the commons to him before time made, he gaue out out strict commandement, that no man, on paine of imprisonment and death, should in time to come, present or induit any such person or persons, that were so by the pope promoted, without the kings agreement, in prejudice of his royal prerogative. Whereupon, he directed also writs to all archbishops, bishops, abbats, priors, deanes, archdeacons, officials and other ecclesiastical persons, to whom it appertained, inhibiting them in no wise to attempt any thing in prejudice of that ordinance, under pretext of any bulles, or other writings, for such manner of provisions to come from the court of Rome. Other writs were also directed to his sonne the prince of Wales, and to all the Justices within the realme, for to arrest all such as brought into the land any such buls or writings, and to bring them before the kings council or his justices, where they might be punished according to the trespass by them committed.

About the same time, the king ordeined a certeine coine of fine gold, and named it the flozen, which coine was denifed for his warres in France, for the gold thereof was not so fine as was the noble, which in the fourteenth yeare he had caused to be coined: but this coine continued not long. After the feast of the holic Trinitie, the king held a parlement at London, in the which he asked a tenth of the cleargie, and a fiftieth of the laitie, about which demand there was no small altercation, but at length he had it granted for one yeare. At the same time, the archbishop of Canturburie held a convocation of all the cleargie at London, in the which manie things were in talke about the honest demeanour of churchmen, which sildome is obserued, as the addition to Nicholas Trivet saith. About the feast of the Assumption of our labie, the king disanulled the flozens, to the great commoditie of his kingdome, ordeining a greater flozen of halfe a marke, and a lesser of three shillings foure pence, and the least of all of twentie pence, and these were called nobles, and not without cause, for they were a noble coine, of faire & fine gold.

This yeare, on the seauententh daie of Nouember, the pope in Quinion created the lord Lewes de Spaine, ambassado: for the French king, prince of the Isles called Fortunata, for what purpose it was not knowne, but it was doubted, not to be for any god meaning towards the kingdome of England, the prosperitie whereof, the same pope was suspected not greatly to wish. About the beginning of Lent the same yeare, the said pope had sent an archbishop and a bishop, ambassadoys to the king, who met them at Wypping in Kent, and to the end they should not linger long within the realme, he quickly dispatched them without effect of their message. This yeare, shortly after Easter, the duke of Britaine, that had bene detained prisoner by the French king, and escaped out of prison, came ouer into England. And about the same time, the king ordeined the exchange of monies at London, Canturburie, and Poike, to the great commoditie of his people.

About Midsummer, or (as other haue) Michaelmas, the earle of Derby, with the earle of Denbroke, the lord Rafe Stafford, the lord Walter de Manny, the lord John Glete of Codnore, and diuerse other lords, knights, and esquires, to the number of five or six hundred men of armes, and as manie archers, sailed ouer into Gascoine, to assist the kings subjects there against the Frenchmen. This earle of Derby, being generall of the armie, after his arrivall in Gascoine, about the beginning of December, wan the towne of Bergerat by force, having put to flight the earle of Lile, as then the French kings lieutenant in Gascoine, who laie there with a great power, to defend the passage: but being driven into the towne, and having lost the suburbs to the Englishmen, he fled out in the night, and so left the towne, without any souldiers to defend it, so that the townefmen yelded it vnto the earle of Derby, and swore themselves to be true liege men vnto the king of England. After this, the earle of Derby passed further into the countrie, and wan diuerse castles and towne, as Lango, le Lake, Poundurant, Ponguise, Dunach, Lalew, Fosath, Pondair, Beaumont in Aillots, Bounall, Auberoch and Liborne, part of them by assault, and the residue by surrender. This done, he returned to Burdeaur, having left captaines and souldiers in such places as he had wone.

This yeare, the king sent forth a commission vnto certeine persons in euerie countie within the realme, to inquire what lands and tenements cuerie man, aboue five pounds of yeerlie reuenues, being of the laie sex, might dispend; because he had giuen order, that euerie man which might dispend five pounds and aboue, vnto ten pounds of such yeerlie reuenues in land of the laie sex, should furnish himselfe, or find an archer on horsebacke, furnished with armour and weapon accordinglie. He that might dispend ten pounds, should furnish himselfe, or find a demilance or light horseman (if I shall so terme him) being then called a hobler with a lance. And he that might dispend five and twentie pounds, should furnish himselfe or find a man at armes. And he that might dispend fiftie pounds, should furnish two men at armes. And he that might dispend an hundred pounds should find three men at armes, that is, himselfe, or one in his stead, with two other. And such as might dispend aboue an hundred pounds, were appointed to find more in number of men at armes, accordinglie as they should be assessed, after the rate of their lands which they might yeerlie dispend, being of the laie sex, and not belonging to the church.

About this season, the duke of Britaine, having with him the earles of Portsmouth and Drenford, sir William de Killebrie one of the kings secretaries, and manie other barons and knights, with a great number of men of armes, passed ouer into Britaine, against the lord Charles de Blois, where they tarried a long time, and did little good to make any accompt of, by reason that the duke, in whose quarrell they came into those parts, shortly after his arrivall there, departed this life, and so they returned home into England. But after their coming from thence, sir Thomas Dagworth knight, that had bene before, and now after the departure of those lords and nobles, still remained the kings lieutenant there, so behaved himselfe against both Frenchmen and Britains, that the memorie of his worthy doings deserueth perpetuall commendation. Sir John de Beinaut lord Beaumont, about the same time, changed his cote, and leauing the king of Englands service, was reteined by the French king.

In this ninetenth yeare of king Edward I find, that about the feast of the Nativite of saint John Baptist, he sailed ouer into Flanders, leauing his sonne the lord Lionell, warden of the realme in his absence. He took with him a great number of lords, knights, and gentlemen, with whom he landed at Sluse. The cause of his going ouer was, to further a practise which he had in hand with them of Flanders, the which by the labour of Jaques Arteveld, meant to cause their earle Lewes, either to do homage vnto king Edward; or else if he refused, then to disherit him, and to receiue Edward prince of Wales for their lord, the eldest sonne of king Edward.

King Edward promising to make a duke dome of the countie of Flanders, for an augmentation of honour to the countrie, there came vnto Sluse to the king, Jaques van Arteveld, and a great number of other, appointed as counsellors for their chiefest townes. The king with all his nauic lay in the haven of Sluse, where, in his great ship called the Catharine, a council was holden upon this foresaid purpose: but at length, those of the counsellors of the chiefest townes misliked the matter so much, that they would conclude nothing, but required respite for a month, to consult with all the communalitie of the countreies and townes, and as the more part should be inclined, so should the king receiue answer. The king and Jaques Arteueld would faine haue had a shorter date, and a more towardlie answer, but none other could be gotten.

Hereupon the council brake up, and Jaques Arteueld taring with the king a certeine space, after the other inere departed, promised him to persuaade the countrie well inough to his purpose, and suerlie, he had a great gift of eloquence, and had thereby induced the countrie wonderfullie, to consent to manie things, as well in fauour of king Edward, as to his owne aduancement: but this suit which he went now about to bring to passe, was so odious vnto all the Flemings, that in no wise they thought it reason to consent vnto the dissentering of the earle. At length, when Jaques Arteueld should returne vnto Cant, king Edward appointed fure hundred Welshmen to attend him as a gard, for the preservation of his person, because he said, that one Gerard Denise deane of the weauers, an vniquiet man, maliciouslie purposed his destruction.

Captains of these Welshmen were John Patreiers, and William Sturine or Sturrie, and so with this crue of souldiers Arteueld returned vnto Cant, and earnestlie went in hand with his suit in king Edwards behalfe, that either the earle should do his homage to the king of England to whome it was due; or else to forfeit his earldome. Then the foresaid Gerard, as well of his owne mind, as procured thereto by the authoritie of earle Leues, stirred the whole citie against the said Arteueld, and gathering a great power vnto him, came and beset Arteuelds house round about vpon each side, the furie of the people being wonderfullie bent against him, crying; Kill him, Kill him that hath robbed the tresurie of the countrie, and now goeth about to dissenter our noble earle.

Jaques van Arteueld perceiuing in what danger he was, came vnto a window, and spake to that enraged multitude, in hope with faire and courteous words to appease them, but it could not be: whereupon he sought to haue fled out of his house, but the same was broken up, and so manie entred vpon him, that he was found out, and slaine by one Thomas Denise (as some write.) But other affirme, that on a sundaie in the after none, being the 17 of Julie, a cobbler, whose father this Jaques van Arteueld had sometime slaine, followed him, as he was fleeing into a stable where his horses stood, & there with an axe cloue his head asunder, so that he fell downe starke dead on the ground. And this was the end of the foresaid Jaques van Arteueld, who by his wisdom and policie had obtained the whole government of all Flanders. This wofull end was allotted vnto him by destiny, whose decree nothing is able by any shift to auoid, as is notable said of the poet in this distichon;

There were slaine also ten other persons that were of his council, and diuerse of the Welshmen in like manner; but the other escaped, and got awaie vnto king Edward, as yet remaining at Sluse, vnto whome those of Bruges, Cassell, Curtrike, Appres, Aldenard, and other townes, did afterwards send their orators to excuse themselves, as nothing guiltie no; pruie to the death of his friend, and their worthie gouernor Jaques van Arteueld, requiring him not to impute the fault vnto the whole countrie, which the rash and vnaduised Cantiniers had committed, sith the countrie of Flanders was as readie now to do him seruice and pleasure as before, sauing that to the dissentering of their earle they could not be agreeable, but they doubted not to persuaade him to do his homage vnto the king of England, and till then they promised not to receiue him. They put the king also in hope of a marriage to be had, betwixt the sonne of their earle, and some one of the kings daughters. Wherewith the king of England (who was departed from Sluse, in great displeasure with the Flemings) became somewhat pacified in his mood, and so renewed the league edicions with the countrie of Flanders: but the earle would neuer consent to do homage vnto the king of England, but still sticked to the French kings part, which purchased him much trouble, and in the end cost him his life, as after shall appeare.

But now to returne vnto the earle of Derby, whome we left in Gascoigne. He shall vnderstand, that shortly after he was come backe to Burdeaur, from the conquest which he had made of Bergerat, and other townes thereabouts; the earle of Lisle, who (as ye haue heard) was the French kings lieutenant in that countrie, assembled an armie of twelue thousand men, & comming before Auberoch (a towne in Gascoigne) besieged it, soe pressing them within, in somuch that they were in great danger to haue bene taken, if the earle of Derby, hauing knowledge in what case they stood, had not come to their rescue, who with three hundred speares or men of armes, as we maie call them, and six hundred archers, approaching nere to the siege, laid himselfe closelie within a wood, till the Frenchmen in the euening were at supper, & then suddenlie set vpon them in their campe, and discomfited them, so that the earle of Lisle was taken in his owne tent, and soe hurt. There were also taken the earle of Valentinois, and other earles, biconts, and lords of great accompt, to the number of nine, besides those that were slaine. The residue were put to flight and chased, so that the Englishmen had a faire tourne, and wan great riches by prisoners and spoile of the enemies campe.

After this, the earle of Derby, being returned to Burdeaur, and hauing put the captiues in safe keeping, assembled his power, and marching south into the countrie, towards the Rioll (a towne in those parts which he meant to besiege) he wan diuerse townes and castles by the way, as saint Basill, Koch, Millon, Montsegure, Aguilon, & Segart. At length he came to the towne of the Rioll, which he besieged, and laie about it nine weekes yet he could win it, and then was the same towne surrendered into his hands, but the castell was still defended against him for the space of eleuen weekes, at which time being soe oppressed & vndermined, it was yielded by them within conditionallie, that they should depart onelie with their armour. After this, the earle of Derby wan Montpesance, Pauleon, Ville-Franche in Agenois, Airemont, Thomines, the castell of Damascen, and at length came before the citie of Angoulesme the which made appointment with the earle, that if no succors came from the French king within the space of a month, that then the citie should be surrendered to the king of England: and to assure this appointment, they deliuered to the earle fourte and twentie of their chiefe citizens as hostages.

In the meane time, the earle laid siege to Blaues, but could not win it. His men rode abroad into the countrie, to Portaigne, Pirabean, and Annay, but wan little, and so returned againe to the siege of Blaues.

Now when the month was expired, that they of Angouleme should yield, the earle sent his two marshals thither, who receiued the homage and fealty of the citizens, in the king of Englands name, and so they were in peace, and receiued againe their hostages. At length when the earle of Derby saw that he did but lose his time in the besieging of Blaves, which sir Gualchart Pangle, and sir Guillaume de Rochfort, being captiues within, did so valiantlie defend, that he could obtaine no advantage of them, he raised his siege, and returned vnto Burdeaur, hauing furnished such towncs as he had wone in that countie with convenient garisons of men to defend them against the enemies, and to keepe frontier warre, as they should see cause.

Frenchmen discomfited.

The French king being sore moued at the conquests thus atchieued by the earle of Derby, raised a mightie armie, and sent the same forth, vnder the leading of his sonne the duke of Poimandrie, into Gascoigne, to resist the said earle, and to recouer againe those towncs which he had wone in those parts. The duke of Poimandrie being come to Molou, where generall assemble was appointed, set forward with his armie, and winning by the waie Airemount, and Ville Franche in Agenois; at length came to the cite of Angouleme, which he inuironed about with a strong siege, continuing the same, till finally, the capiteine named John Poymell, required a truce to indure for one daie, which was granted, and the same was the daie of the Purification of our ladie, on the which, the same capiteine, with the souldiers of the garrison departed, and left the cite in the citizens hands. The Frenchmen, because they had granted the truce to indure for that daie without exception, permitted them to go their waies without let or berration. The citizens in the morning yielded the cite to the duke. After this, he wan the castell of Damascen, Thonins, and Port St. Marie; Thonins by surrender, and the other two by force of assaults. Then he came to the strong castell of Aiguillon, which he besieged, and late thereat a long season. Within was the earle of Penbrooke, the lord Walter de Marne, sir Franke de Helle, and diuerse knights and captiues, which defended themselves, and the place so stoutlie, that the Frenchmen could win little advantage at their hands.

Whilest the siege continued before this fortreffe, the seneschall of Guien departed from the campe, with eight hundred horsemen, and foure thousand footmen, purposing to win a castell, belonging to a nephew of the cardinall Della Spotte, a twelue leagues distant from Aiguillon. The archdeacon of Anfoz, owner of that castell, went to the Rioll, where the earle of Derby with his armie as then was lodged, to whome he made suit, to haue some power of men to rescue his castell. The earle appointed to him a sufficient number, both of horsemen, and also of English archers, with whome the said archdeacon rode all the night, and the next morning betimes, being the one and thirtieth of Julie, they came to the castell where the Frenchmen were arrived the daie before, and had scerrelie assailed the castell, doing their best to win it by force. But the Englishmen without anie delaie, immediatlie vpon their comming, set vpon the Frenchmen, and gaue them so sharpe and fierce battell, that in the end, the Frenchmen were discomfited: the seneschall with manie other gentlemen were taken prisoners, beside those that were slaine. To conclude, the number of them that were slaine, and taken prisoners in the whole, amounted to foure hundred horsemen, and two thousand footmen. Sir Godfrey de Harecourt being constrained to flee out of France, to auoid the French kings displeasure, came ouer vnto the king of England, who recei-ued him verie sofullie, for he was knowne to be a right valiant and a wise personage. He was brother to the earle of Harecourt, lord of saint Sauour le Vicount, and of diuerse other towncs in Poimandrie. A little before that he fell into the French kings displeasure, he might haue done with the king of France, more than anie other lord within that realme.

In this twentieth peare of his reigne, king Edward vpon complaint of the people made against purueiours of vittels for his houthold (the which vnder colour of their commissions, abused the same, in taking by among the commons all manner of things that liked them, without making payment for the same, further than the said commissions did allow them) he caused inquirie to be made of their misdeemeanors, and such as were found to haue offended, of whome there was no small number, some of them were put to death on the gallowes, and other were fined, so to teach the rest to deale more warlike in their businesse from thenceforth. About the same time, he caused all the iustices within his dominions to renounce and giue ouer all their pensions, fees, and other buying benefites and rewards, which they used to receiue of the lords and great men of the land, as well prelates, as of them of the temporaltie, to the end that their hands being free from gifts, iustice might more frelie haue course, and be of them dulie and vprightlie ministred. Also this peare in the Lent season, the king held a parlement at Westminster, and toke into his hands all the profits, reuenues, and emoluments, which the cardinals held within this land: for he thought it not reason, that they which fauoured the pope and the French king, being his aduersaries, should inioy such commodities within his realme.

After this, in the moneth of Julie following, he toke shipping, and sailed into Poimandrie, hauing established the lord Percie, and the lord Beuil, to be wardens of his realme in his absence, with the archbishop of York, the bishop of Lincolne, and the bishop of Duresme. The armie which he had ouer with him, was to the number of foure thousand men of armes, and ten thousand archers, beside Irishmen, and Welshmen, that folowed the host on foot. The chiefest captiues that went ouer with him were these. First his eldest sonne Edward prince of Wales, being as then about the age of thirteene peares, the earles of Hereford, Poimampton, Arundell, Cornwall, Huntington, Warwike, Suffolke, and Dorset; of barons the lord Mortimer, who was after erle of March, the lords John, Lewes, and Roger Beauchampe; also the lords Cobham, Powbraye, Lucie, Bassett, Barkeley, and Willoughbie, with diuerse other lords, besides a great number of knights and other worthie captiues. They landed by the aduise of the lord Godfrey of Harecourt, in the Ile of Constantine, at the port of Vague saint Maik, nere to saint Sauour le Vicount. The earle of Huntington was appointed to be gouernour of the fleet by sea, hauing with him a hundred men of armes, and foure hundred archers.

After that the whole armie was landed, the king appointed two marshals, the lord Godfrey of Harecourt, and the earle of Warwike, and the earle of Arundell was made constable. There were ordeined three battels, one to go on his right hand, following by the coast of the sea; and another to march on his left hand, vnder the conduct of the marshals; so that he himselfe went in the middell with the maine armie, and in this order forward they passed towards Caen, lodging euerie night together in one field. They that went by the sea, toke all the ships they found in their waie, and as they marched forth thus, that by water & land, at length they came to a towne called Harelew, which was given up, but yet neuer thelesse it was robbed, and much goods found in it. After this they came to Chierburge, which towne they won by force, robbed it, and burnt part of it, but the castell they could not win. Then came they to Hountburge and took it, robbed it & burnt it cleane. In this manner they passed forth, and burnt manie towne and villages in all the countrie as they went. The towne of Carentine was deliuered unto them against the will of the soldiers that were within it. The soldiers defended the castell two daies, and then yelded it up into the Englishmens hands, who burnt the same, and caused the burgesles to enter into their ships. All this was done by the battell that went by the sea side, and by them on the sea together.

On the other side, the lord Godfrie of Harecourt, with the battell on the right hand of the king, rood forth six or seven leagues from the kings battell, in burning and eriling the countrie. The king had with him (beside those that were with the marshals) 3000 men of armes, six thousand archers, and ten thousand men on foot. They left the cite of Constance, and came to a great towne called saint Lo, a rich towne of dyaperie, having manie wealthe burgesles within it: it was sone taken and robbed by the Englishmen vpon their first approach. From thence the king marched streight to Caen, wherein were capitains Rafe earle of Glou and Guines constable of France, & the earle of Tankerulle. These noble men meant to haue kept their defences on the walles, gate, byidge, and riuer, and to haue left the suburbs void, because they were not closed, but onelie with the riuer: but they of the towne said they would issue forth, for they were strong inough to fight with the king of England.

When the constable saw these good willes, he was contented to follow their desire, and so forth they went in good order, and made good face to put their liues in hazard: but when they saw the Englishmen approach in good order, diuided into three battels, & the archers ready to shot, which they of Caen had not sene before, they were sore afraid, and fled awaie toward the towne without any order or arrate, for all that the constable could do to staie them. The Englishmen followed, and in the chase slue manie, and entered the towne with their enemies. The constable, and the earle of Tankerulle took a tower at the byidge foot, thinking there to saue themselves, but perceiving the place to be of no force, nor able long to hold out, they submitted themselves unto sir Thomas Holland. ¶ But here whatsoener Froissard doth report of the taking of this tower, and of the yelding of these two noble men, it is to be proued that the said earle of Tankerulle was taken by one surnamed Legh, ancestor to sir Peter Legh now liuing, whether in the fight or within the tower, I haue not to saie: but for the taking of the said earle, and for his other manlike prowes shewed here and elsewhere in this tournee, king Edward in recompense of his agreeable seruice, gaue to him a lordship in the countie of Chester called Hanley, which the said sir Peter Legh now liuing doth inioy and possesse, as successor and heire to his ancestor the foresaid Legh, to whom it was so first giuen.

But to returne now to the matter where we left. The Frenchmen being entred into their houses, cast downe vpon the Englishmen below in the streets, stones, timber, hot water, and barres of iron, so that they hurt and slue more than six hundred persons. The king was so moued therewith, that if the lord Godfrie of Harecourt had not asswaged his mood, the towne had bene burnt, and the people put to the edge of the sword: but by the treatie of the said lord

Godfrie, proclamation was made, that no man should put fire into any house, nor kille any person, nor force any woman, and then did the townsmen and souldiers submit themselves, and received the Englishmen into their houses. There was great store of riches gotten in this towne, and the most part thereof sent into England, with the fleet which the king sent home with the prisoners, under the guiding of the earle of Huntington, accompanied with two hundred men of armes, and foure hundred archers.

When all things were ordered in Caen as the king could desire, he marched from thence in the same order as he had kept before, burning and eriling the countrie. He passed by Cureur & Rame to Roulers, which the Englishmen sone entered and sacked without mercie. Then went they forth and left Roan, and came to Cisoys, the towne they burnt, but the castell they could not get: they burnt also Alernon, and at Poissie they repaired the byidge which was broken, and so there they passed ouer the riuer of Saine. The power of the Englishmen increased daile, by such numbers as came ouer forth of England in hope to win by pillage. Also manie gentlemen of Normandie, and other of the French nation, which loued not nor ought any god will vnto the French king, came to the king of England, offering to serue him, so that there were in his armie foure thousand horsemen and fiftie thousand footmen with the Normans, and of this number there were thirtie thousand English archers, as Giouan Villani writeth. The English marshals ran abroad fast to Paris, and burnt the Germans in Laie: also Moutroy, and St. Cloud, and petie Bullongne by Paris, & the queenes Burge. In the meane time had the French king assembled a mightie armie vpon purpose to fight with the Englishmen. ¶ The lord Godfrie of Harecourt, as he rode forth with six hundred men of armes, and 13 hundred archers, by aduenture incountered with a great number of the burgesles of Amiens on horsebacke, who were riding by the kings commandement to Paris. They were quickelie assailed, and though they defended themselves manfully for a while, yet at length they were overcome, and eleuen hundred of them slaine in the field, beside those that were taken. The Englishmen had all their cariage and armour. Thus passed forth the king of England, and came into Beaulnois, and lodged nere vnto the cite of Beaunois one night in an abbey called Spelene, and for that after he was dislodged, there were that set fire in the same abbey, without any commandement giuen by him: he caused twentie of them to be hanged that were the first procurers of that fire.

So long the king of England passed forward, that finally he approached nere to the water of Some, the which was large and deepe, and all the byidges broken and the passages well kept, wherevpon he caused his two marshals with a thousand men of armes, & two thousand archers, to go along the riuer, to the end to find some passage. The marshals assailed diuerse places, as at Piqueney, and other where, but they could not find any passage enclosed, capitains with men of warre being set to defend the same, in somuch that the marshals returned to the king, and declared that they had sene and found. At the same instant time was the French king come to Amiens, with more than a hundred thousand men, and thought to inclose the king of England, that he should no waie escape, but be constrained to receiue battell in some place greatlie to his disadvantage.

The king of England well perceiving himselfe in danger, remoued from the place where he was incamped, and marched forward through the countie of of Pontieu and Abuille, approaching unto the good towne of Abuille, and at length by one of the prisoners named Gobin de Grace, he was told where he might passe with his armie ouer the riuer of Some, at a ford in the same riuer, being hard in the bottom, and verie shallow at an eb water. The French king vnderstanding that the k. of England sought to passe the riuer of Some, sent a great baron of Normandie, one sir Godmare du Joy, to defend the passage of the same riuer, with a thousand men of armes, and sir thousand on foot with the Genouaies. This sir Godmare had with him also a great number of them of Sputterell and others of the countrie, so that he had in all to the number of twelue thousand men, one and other, and hearing that the king of England was minded to passe at Blanchetake (which was the passage that Gobin Agace had informed the king of England of) he came thither. When the Englishmen approached, he arranged all his compaignie to defend the passage.

And suerlie when the Englishmen at the lowe water entered the ford to passe ouer, there was a sharpe bickering, for diuerse of the Frenchmen encountered the Englishmen on horsebacke in the water, and the Genouaies did them much hurt, and troubled them soze with their crossbowes: but on the other side, the English archers shot so wholie together, that the Frenchmen were faine to giue place to the Englishmen, so that they got the passage and came ouer, assembling themselves in the field, and then the Frenchmen fled, some to Abuille, some to saint Riquier. They that were on foot could not escape so well as those on horsebacke, insomuch that a great number of them of Abuille, Sputterell, Arras, and S. Riquier were slaine and taken, for the chase indured more than a great league. There were slaine in all to the number of two thousand. When the k. of England had thus passed the riuer, he acquitted Gobin Agace, and all his compaignie of their ransomes, and gave to the same Gobin an hundred nobles, and a good horse, and so the king road forth as he did before. His marshalls road to Crotaie by the sea side, and burnt the towne, and toke all such wines and goods as were in the ships and barks which laie there in the haven.

This was on a fridaie, and both the marshalls returned to the kings host about none, and so lodged all togither about Cressie in Pontieu, where hauing knowledge that the French king followed to giue him battell, he commanded his marshalls to chuse a plot of ground, somewhat to his aduantage, that he might there abide his aduersaries. In the meane time the French king being come with all his puissance vnto Abuille, and hearing how the king of England was passed ouer the riuer of Some, and discomfited sir Godmare du Joy, was soze displeased in his mind: but when he vnderstood that his enemies were lodged at Cressie, and meant there to abide him, he caused all his people to issue out of Abuille, and earlie on the saturdaye in the morning, anon after sunne rising he departed out of the towne himselfe, and marched towards his enemies. The king of England vnderstanding that his aduersarie king Philip still followed him, to giue him battell, & supposing that the same saturdaye he would come to offer it, rose betimes in the morning, and commanded euerie man first to call vpon God for his aid, then to be armed, and to draw with speed into the field, that in the place before appointed they might be set in order of battell. Beginning his enterprise at prayer, or calling vpon God, he was the more fortunate in his affaires, and sped the better in the progresse of his actions, as the issue of the warre showed. A notable example to euerie puiant man, to remember to call vpon God when he purposeth anie thing, for as the poet saith, and that verie christianlic,

Beside this, he caused a parke to be made and closed by the wood side behind his host, in the which he ordeined that all the carts and cariages should be set, with all the horses (for euerie man was on foot.) Then he ordeined three battels, in the first was the prince of Wales, and with him the earle of Warwick, the lord Godfrey of Harecourt, the lord Stafford, the lord de la Ware, the lord Bouchier, the lord Thomas Clifford, the lord Reginald Cobham, the lord Thomas Holland, sir John Chandos, sir Bartholomew de Bzowash, sir Robert Peuill. They were eight hundred men of armes, and two thousand archers, and a thousand of other with the Welsh men. In the second battell was the earle of Northampton, the earle of Arundell, the lords Ros and Willoughbie, Basset, S. Albine, Apulton, and others. The third battell the king led himselfe, hauing with him seauen hundred men of armes, and two thousand archers, and in the other battell were to the number of eight hundred men of armes, and twelue hundred archers. Thus was the English armie marshalled according to the report of Froissard. When euerie man was gotten into order of battell, the king leapt vpon a white hobbie, and rode from ranke to ranke to view them, the one marshall on his right hand, and the other on his left, desiring euerie man that daie to haue regard to his right and honour. He spake it so courteously, and with so good a countenance, that euen they which before were discomfited, toke courage in hearing him speake such sweet and louing words amongst them. It was nine of the clocke per euer he had thus visited all his battels, & thereupon he caused euerie man to eat and drinke a little, which they did at their leisure.

The French king, before he approached nere to his enemies, sent forth foure skilfull knights to view the demeanour of his enemies, the which returning againe, made report as they had seene, and that so much as they could gesse, the Englishmen ment to abide him, being diuided into three battels, readie to receiue him and his puissance, if he went forward in purpose to assaile them. Here was the French king counselled to stay and not to giue battell that day, but to aduise all things with good deliberation and regard, to consider well how and what way he might best assaile them. When by the marshalls were all men commanded to staie, and not to go anie further, they that were foremost and next to the enemies tarried, but they that were behind would not abide but rode forth, and said they would not staie till they were as far as the foremost: and when they before saw them behind come forward, then they marched on also againe, so that neither the k. nor his marshalls could rule them, but that they passed forward still without order, or anie good arraie, till they came in sight of their enemies: and as sone as the foremost saw their enemies, then they reculed backe, whereof they behind had maruell, and were abashed, supposing that the foremost compaignie had bene fighting. Then they might haue had some to haue gone forward, if they had bene minded. The commons, of whome all the waies betwixt Abuille and Cressie were full, when they saw that they were nere their enemies, they toke their swords and cried; Downe with them, let vs flea them all. There was no man, though he were present at the towne, that could imagine or shew the truth of the euill order that was among the French partie, Gioué Villani saith, that when they should toine in battell, the Englishmen were 30000. archers English & Welsh, beside other footmen with axes & iavelins, and not fullie 4000 horsemen.

It was nine of the clocke yer euer he had thus visited all his battels, & thereupon he caused euerie man to eat and drinke a little, which they did at their leisure.

The French king, before he approached nere to his enemies, sent forth foure skillfull knights to view the demeanour of his enemies, the which returning againe, made report as they had seene, and that forso much as they could gesse, the Englishmen ment to abide him, being diuided into three battels, readie to receiue him and his puissance, if he went forward in purpose to assaile them. Here was the French king counselled to stay and not to giue battell that day, but to aduise all things with good deliberation and regard, to consider well how and what way he might best assaile them. When by the marshals were all men commanded to staie, and not to go anie further, they that were foremost and next to the enemies taried, but they that were behind would not abide but rode forth, and said they would not staie till they were as far as the foremost: and when they before saw them behind come forward, then they marched on also againe, so that neither the K. nor his marshals could rule them, but that they passed forward still without order, or anie good arraie, till they came in sight of their enemies: and as soon as the foremost saw their enemies, then they reculed backe, whereof they behind had maruell, and were abashed, supposing that the foremost companie had bene fighting. When they might haue had some to haue gone forward, if they had bene minded. The commons, of whome all the waies betwixt Abuille and Cressie were full, when they saw that they were nere their enemies, they toke their swords and cried; Downe with them, let vs see them all. There was no man, though he were present at the toynie, that could imagine or shew the truth of the euill order that was among the French partie, Giouo Villani saith, that when they should to the battell, the Englishmen were 30000. archers English & Welsh, beside other footmen with axes & iavelins, and not fullie 4000 horsemen.

partie, and yet they were a marvellous great number.

The Englishmen which beheld their enemies thus approaching them, prepared themselves at leisure for the battell, which they saw to be at hand. The first battell, whereof the prince was ruler, had the archers standing in maner of an herse, and the men of armes in the botome of the battell. The earle of Northampton and the earle of Arundell with the second battell, were on a wing in good order, ready to comfort the princes battell if need were. The lords and knights of France came not to the assemble together, for some came after, in such hast and euill order, that one of them troubled another. There were of Genouaies crossbowes to the number of twelue or fiftene thousand, the which were commanded to go on before, and with their shot to begin the battell; but they were so werie with going on foot that morning six leagues armed with their crossbowes, that they said to their constables; We be not well used, in that we are commanded to fight this daie, for we be not in case to do any great feat of armes, we haue moze need of rest. These words came to the hearing of the earle of Alanson, who said; A man is well at ease to be charged with such a sort of rascals, that faint and faile now at most need.

Raine and an eclipse.

Also at the same instant there fell a great raine, and an eclipse with a terrible thunder, and before the raine, there came sieng ouer both armies a great number of crows, for feare of the tempest coming: then anon the aite began to wax cleare, and the sunne to shine faire and bright, which was right in the French mens eyes, and on the English mens backs. When the Genouaies were assembled together, and began to approach, they made a great leape and crye, to abash the Englishmen, but they stood still and stirred not at all for that noise. Then the Genouaies the second time made an other leape and huge crye, and stepped forward a little, and the Englishmen remoued not a foot. The third time againe the Genouaies leapt, and pelled, and went forth till they came within shot, and sterclie therewith discharged their crossbowes. Then the English archers slept forth one pale, and let sie their arrowes so wholie and so thicke together, that it seemed to snowe. When the Genouaies felt the arrowes percing their brads, armes and bycastis, manie of them cast downe their crossbowes, and cut the strings, and returned discomfited. When the French king saw them flee awate, he said: Slea these rascals, for they will let and trouble vs without reason.

The Gen-
ouaies.

The battell is begun.

When ye might haue seene the men of armes hant dalyt in amongst them, and killed a great number of them, and euer the Englishmen shot where they saw the thickest prease: the sharpe arrowes ran into the men of armes, and into their hories, and manie fell horse and man amongst the Genouaies, and still the Englishmen shot where they saw the thickest prease, and when they were once downe they could not recover againe. The throng was such that one ouerthrew another; & also amongst the Englishmen, there were certeine of the footmen with great knives, that went in amongst the men of armes, and killed manie of them as they laie on the ground, both earles, barons, knights, and esquires. The valiant king of Bohem being almost blind, caused his men to fasten all the reins of the bridles of their hories ech to other, and so he being himselfe amongst them in the foremost ranke, they ran on their enemies.

The king of Boheme.

The lord Charles of Boheme sonne to the same king and late elected emperour, came in good order to the battell, but when he saw how the matter went awrie on their part, he departed and saued himselfe. His father by the means aforesaid went so far forward, that ioining with his enemies he fought right valiantlie, and so did all his companie: but finalie being entred within the prease of their enemies, they were of them inclosed and slaine, together with the king their master, and the next daie found dead lieng about him, and their hories all tied ech to other. The earle of Alanson came right orderlie to the battell, and fought with the Englishmen, and so did the earle of Flanders also on his part. These two lords costed the English archers, and came to the princes battell, and there fought right valiantlie a long time. The French king perceiuing where their banners stood, would faine haue come to them, but could not, by reason of a great hedge of archers that stood betwixt them and him. This was a perillous battell and soe foughten: there were few taken to mercie, for the Englishmen had so determined in the morning.

Alanson.

Certeine Frenchmen and Almaines perforce opened the archers of the princes battell, and came to fight with the men of armes hand to hand. When the second battell of the Englishmen came to succor the princes battell, and not before it was time, for they of that battell had as then inough to do, in somuch that some which were about him, as the earle of Northampton, and others sent to the king, where he stood aloft on a windmill hill, requiring him to aduance forward, and come to their aid, they being as then soe laid to of their enemies. The king hereby demanded if his sonne were slaine, hurt, or felled to the earth: No (said the knight that brought the message) but he is soe matched. Well (said the king) returne to him and them that sent you, and saie to them that they send no moze to me for any aduventure that falleth, so long as my son is alieue, for I will that this tourne be his, with the honoz thereof. With this answer the knight returned, which greatlie incouraged them to do their best to win the spurs, being half abashed in that they had so sent to the king for aid. At length when it drew toward euening, and that the Frenchmen were beaten downe and slaine on ech hand, king Philip as it were by constraint departed out of the field, not hauing as then past three score persons about him, of whome the lord John of Heinault was one, by whose persuation he chesclie consented to ride his waie for his owne safegard, when he saw the losse was such as on that daie it could not be recovered.

The slaughter of the Frenchmen was great and lamentable, namelic for the losse of so manie noble men, as were slaine at the same battell, fought betwene Cressie and Boy on the saturday next following the feast of saint Bartholome being (as that preare tell) the 26 of August. Among other which died that daie, these I find registred by name as chesfest, John king of Boheme, Rafe duke of Loz raine, Charles of Alans brother germane to king Philip, Charles earle of Blois, Leues earle of Flanders, also the earle of Harecourt, brother to the lord Gessrie of Harecourt, with the earles of Auverre, Amurle, and saint Poule, beside diuerse other of the nobilitie. The Englishmen neuer brake out of their battels to chase any man, but kept themselves together in their wards and ranks, and defended themselves euer against such as came to assaile them. This battell ended about euening.

When the Frenchmen were clearely overcome, and those that were left alieue fled and gone, so that the Englishmen heard no moze noise of them, king Edward came downe from the hill (on the which he stood all that day with his helmet still on his head) and going to the prince, embraced him in his armes, and kissed him, saleng; Faire sonne, God send you good perseverance in this your prosperous beginning, you haue have noble acquit your selfe, you are well towarde to have the governance of a realme committed to your hands for your valiant doings. The prince inclined himselfe to the earth in honouring his father, as he best could. This done, they thanked God together with their souldiers for their good adventure. For so the king commanded, and willed no man to make any boast of his owne power, but to ascribe all the praise to almightie God for such a noble victorie; learning herein to be affected as Dario was in the foure and fortieth psalme; for he also referreth the hapie successe of warre, and all victorie, unto almightie God, and not to the strength of a multitude of men, saying:

Tu nos ab hoste liberabis, sternis solo in fensa nobis agmina.

Non ergo saepe iure te cantabimus?

Will. Nostre salutis vindicem?

¶ On the sundae in the morning, there was such a mist, that a man could not see an acre by day before him. Then by the kings commandement there departed from the host five hundred speares and two thousand archers, to trie if they might heare of any Frenchmen gathered together in any place nere unto them.

On the same morning there were departed out of Abule and St. Requier in Pontieu, the commons of Roan and Beannais, with other that knew nothing of the discomfiture the daie before. These met with the Englishmen, supposing they had bene Frenchmen, and being fiercelie assailed of them, after soze fight, and great slaughter, the Frenchmen were discomfited and fled, of whome were slaine in the hedges & bushes, more than seven thousand men. The archbishop of Roan, and the grand prior of France, ignorant also of the discomfiture the day before, & supposing (as they were informed) the French should not have soughten till that sundae, were likewise incountried (as they came thitherward) by the Englishmen, with whome they fought a soze battell, for they were a great number, but yet at length they were not able to susteine the puissant force of the Englishmen, and so the most part of them were slaine, with the said archbishop and grand prior, and few there were that escaped.

On that sundae morning, the Englishmen met with diuerse Frenchmen, that had lost their waie on the saturday, and wist not where the king nor their captains were become. They were all slaine in manner, so manie as the Englishmen could meet with, in so much that of the commons and footmen of the cities and good towne of France (as was thought) there were slaine this sundae foure times as manie as were slaine on the saturday in the great battell. When those Englishmen that were sent abroad thus to view the countrie, were returned againe, and signified to the king what they had seene and done, and how there was no more appearance of the enimies, the king to search what the number was of them that were slaine, and upon the view taken, it was reported unto him, that there were found dead eleven princes, foure score baronets, 12 hundred knights, and more than thirtie thousand other of the meaner sort. Thus was the whole puissance of France vanquished, and that chieflie by force of such as were of no reputation amongst them, that is to say, the English archers, by whose sharpe and violent shot the victorie was achieved, to the great confusion of the French nation. ¶ Of such price were the English bowes in that season, that nothing was able to withstand them; whereas now our archers couet not to drawe long and strong bowes, but rather to shoot compasse, which are not meet for the warres, nor greatlie to be feared, though they come into the field.

The king of England with his armie kept still his field, untill monday in the morning, and then dislodged, and came before Portuereil by the sea, and his march was towards Hedon. The next daie they road toward Bullongne, & at William the king and the prince incamped, and tarried a whole daie to refresh their people, and on the wednesday being the thirtieth day of August, he came before the strong towne of Calis, and there planted his siege, and received battises betwene the towne and the river, and caused carpenters to make houses and lodgings of great timber, which were covered with reed & brome, so manie and in such order, that it seemed a new towne, and in it was a market place appointed of purpose, in the which the market was daile kept of vittels, & all other necessarie things everie tuesday and saturday, so that a man might have bought what he would of things brought thither out of England & Flanders. ¶ But now, for so much as we have spoken of this iourne and invasion made by king Edward into France, in this nineteenth yere of his reigne, accordinglie as we have gathered out of Froissard, and diuerse other authors, I have thought good to make the reader partaker of the contents of a letter written by a chapleine of the said king, and attendant about him in the same iourne, conteining the successe of his proceedings after his departure from Poissie, which letter is inserted with others in the historie of Robert de Auesburie, and Englished by maister John Fox as followeth.

A letter of W. Northboure the kings confessor describing the kings voiage into France.

Mutations premised. ¶ We give you to vnderstand, that our soueraigne lord the king came to the towne of Poissie the daie before the Assumption of our ladie, where was a certeine bridge ouer the water of Saine broken downe by the enimie, but the king tarried there so long, till that the bridge was made againe. And whiles the bridge was in repairing, there came a great number of men at armes, and other souldiers well armed, to hinder the same. But the earle of Northampton issued out against them, and slue of them more than a thousand, the rest fled awaie: thanks be to God. And at another time, our men passed the water (although with much trauell) and slue a great number of the common souldiers of France, about the citie of Paris, and countrie adioining, being part of the French kings armie, and throughlie well appointed: so that our people have now made other good bridges upon our enimies, God be thanked, without any losse and damage to vs. And on the morrow after the Assumption of our ladie, the king passed the water of Saine, and marched toward Poissie, which is a towne of great defense, and stronglie walled, and a marvellous strong castle within the same, which our enimies kept. And when our bauntgard was passed the towne, our reargard gaue an assault thereunto, and took the same, where were slaine more than three hundred men at arms of our enimies part.

part. And the next daie following, the earle of Suffolke, and sir Hugh Spenser, marched forth vpon the commons of the countrie assembled and well armed, and in fine discomfited them, and slue of them more than two hundred, & took thre score gentlemen prisoners, beside others.

And after that, the king marched toward grand Williers, and while he was there incamped, the kings bantgard was descried by the men at armes of the K. of Boheme: wherupon our men issued out in great hast and ioined battell with them, but were inforced to retire. Notwithstanding, thanks be vnto God, the earle of Northampton issued out, and rescued the horsemen with the other soldiers: so that few or none of them were either taken or slaine, sauing onlie Thomas Talbot, but had againe the enimie in chase within two leagues of Amiens: of whome we took eight, and slue twelue of their best men at armes: the rest being well horsed, took the towne of Amiens. After this the king of England marched toward Mountise, vpon Bartholomew day, and came to the water of Some, where the French king had laid siue hundred men at armes, and thre thousand footmen, purposing to haue kept and stopped our passage: but thanks be to God, the K. of England and his host entered the same water of Some, where neuer man passed before, without losse of any of our men: and after that incountered with the enimie, and slue of them more than 2000, the rest fled to Abuille, in which chase were taken manie knights, esquiers, & men at armes. The same day sir Hugh Spenser took the towne of Crotaille, where he & his soldiers slue 400 men at armes, & kept the towne, where they found great store of bittels.

The same night incamped the king of England in the Forrest of Cressie vpon the same water, for that the French kings host came on the other side of the towne, nere vnto our passage: but he would not take the water of vs, & so marched toward Abuille. And vpon the fridaie next following, the king being still incamped in the said Forrest, our scuriers descried the French K. which marched toward vs in foure great battels: and hauing then vnderstanding of our enimies (as Gods will was) a little before the euening tide, we drew to the plaine field, and set our battels in arraie: and immediatlie the fight began, which was soze and cruell, & indured long, for our enimies behaved themselves right noble. But thanks be giuen vnto God, the victorie fell on our side, & the king our aduersarie was discomfited with all his host & put to flight: where also was slaine the king of Boheme, the duke of Lorraine, the earle of Alanson, the earle of Flanders, the earle of Blois, the earle of Harcourt, with his two sons, the earle of Daumarle, the earle de Peuers, and his brother the lord of Cronard, the archbishop of Nismes, the archbishop of Sens, the high prior of France, the earle of Sauoie, the lord of Moles, the lord de Guies, le seigneur de Saint Mouant, le seigneur de Kolinburgh, with six earles of Almaine, and diuerse other earles, barons, knights, and esquiers, whose names are vnknowne. And Philip de Valois himselfe, with an other marques, which was called lord elector among the Romans, escaped from the battell. The number of the men of armes which were found dead in the field, beside the common soldiers and footmen, were a thousand siue hundred, fortie and two: and all that night the king of England with his host aboad armed in the field, where the battell was fought.

On the next morrow, before the sunne rose, there marched towards vs another great host nightie & strong, of the Frenchmen: but the earle of Northampton, and the earle of Suffolke issued out against them in thre battels, & after long and terrible fight, them likewise they discomfited by Gods great helpe and grace (for otherwise it could neuer haue bene) where they took of knights and esquiers a great number, and slue aboue two thousand, pursuing the chase thre leagues from the place where the battell was fought. The same night also the king incamped himselfe againe in the Forrest of Cressie, and on the morrow marched toward Bullongne, and by the way he took the towne of Staples: and from thence he marched toward Calis, where he intendeth to plant his siege, and laie his batterie to the same. And therefore our souereigne lord the king willethe and commandeth you, in all that euer you may, to send to the said siege bittels conuenient. For after the time of our departing from Caen, we haue trauelled through the countrie with great perill & danger of our people, but yet alwaies had of bittels plenty, thanks be to God therefore. But now (as the case standeth) we partlie need your helpe to be refreshed with bittels. Thus fare you well. Written at the siege before the towne of Calis, the fourteenth daie of September.

But now touching the siege of Calis, and to retorne where we left, ye shall vnderstand, that (as ye haue heard) the English campe was furnished with sufficient prouision of meat, drinke, aparell, munition, and all other things necessarie: and oftentimes also the soldiers made roads and forraies into the borders of France next adioining, as towards Guines, and saint Omer, ye euen to the gates of that towne, and sometime to Bullongne. Also the earle of Northampton fetched a bottie out of Arthois, and as he returned toward the host, he came to Terrouan, which towne the bishop had fortified and manned, belieuering the custodie thereof vnto sir Arnold Dandrehen: for when he heard the Englishmen approached, he durst not tarrie within the citie himselfe, but got him to saint Omers. Sir Arnold stood ballantlie to his defense, and would not yeld, till by verie force the Englishmen entered the citie, slue the soldiers, and took their capteine the said sir Arnold prisoner. The citie was put to sacke, and after set on fire. And when the Englishmen were departed, there came a number of Flemings from the siege, which they had laid laid before S. Omers, and began a new spoile, and fired such houses belonging to the canons and other, which the Englishmen had spared. Thus were those confines in most miserable case, for no house nor other thing was in safegard, but such as were contained within closure of strong towones and fortresses.

The king of England would not assaile the towne of Calis by giving anie assault to it, for he knew he should but lose his labour, and waste his people, it was so strong of it selfe, and so well furnished with men of warre. Capteine thereof also was one Sir John de Wienne, a valiant knight of Burgoigne, having with him diverse other right hardie and expert capteins, knights, and esquiers. When the said Sir John de Wienne saw the manner of the English host, and what the kings intention was, he constrained all the poze and meane people to depart out of the towne. The king of England perceiuing that this was done of purpose to spare vittels, would not drive them backe againe to helpe to consume the same, but rather pitied them; and therefore did not onelic shew them so much grace to suffer them to passe through his host, but also gaue them meat and drinke to dinner, and moreover two pence sterling to euerie person: which charitable deed won him much praise, and caused manie of his enemies to praise right hartlie for his good successe and prosperitie. A most notable example of pitie and compassion, teaching other to be in like sort affected, and also to know, that

The French king meaning to raise the siege from Calis, which the king of England kept there, sent for his sonne the duke of Bourmandie, which had line long at the siege of Aiguillon, and now by commandement of his father left it soze against his will. In this meane while, the earle of Derby remained in the citie of Burdeaur, and there had held him during all the time that the siege laie before Aiguillon. When he once understood that the siege was raised, and that the duke of Bourmandie had broken by his campe, he sent into Gascoigne for all knights and esquiers that held of the English part. Then came to Burdeaur the lord Dalbret, the lord de Lespare, the lord de Kofam, the lord of Goussident, the lord of Dumiers, and a great sort more of the lords and nobles of Gascoigne, so that the earle had twelve hundred men of armes, two thousand archers, and three thousand other footmen. They passed the riuer of Garon, betwixt Burdeaur and Blaie, and toke their waie to Zandonge, so to go vnto Poitiers, and toke by the waie the towne of Spicabell by assault: they wan also the towne and castell of Aunat, Surgieres and Benon. Also they toke Parauant in Poictou by force, they burnt also the towne of Lusignan, but the castell they could not win. Moreover, they did win the bidge, towne, and castell of Tailburge, and slue all that were found within it, because a knight of the English part was slaine in the assaulting. From thence the earle of Derby went and laid siege to saint John Dangelie, which was yelded to him by composition.

At first he made three assaults, but could not win it, and so from thence he came to Bourge saint Parment, the which was wonne by force, and all that were within it slaine; and in like manner the towne of Pontreuil Bonin was wonne, and the most part of them within slaine, that toke vpon them to defend it, which were 2000 coiners of monie that wrought in the mint, which the French king kept there. From thence he passed forward with his host, and finally came before the citie of Poitiers, which was great and large, so that he could not besiege it but on the one side. The third daie after his comming thither, he caused the citie to be assaulted in three places, and the greatest number were appointed to assaile the weakest part of the citie. As then there were no expert men of warre within Poitiers, but a great multitude of people unskillfull and not vled to any feats of warre, by reason whereof the Englishmen entered in at the weakest place. When they within salued the citie wone, they fled out at other gates, but yet there were slaine to the number of seauen hundred persons, for all that came in the Englishmens waie were put to the sword, men, women, and children. The citie was sacked and rifled, so that great store of riches was gotten there, as well of the inhabitants as other that had brought their goods thither for safegard of the same. The earle of Derby laie there ten or twelve daies, and longer might haue laie, if his pleasure had so bene, for there was none that durst go about to disquiet him, all the countrie trembled so at his presence.

The citie of Poitiers won by force.Saint John Dangelie.

At his departure from Poitiers he left the citie void, for it was too great to be kept: his souldiers and men of warre were so pestered with riches, that they wist not what to do therewith: they esteemed nothing but gold and silver, and feathers for men of warre. The earle visited by the waie as he returned homewards to Burdeaur the towne of saint John Dangelie, and other fortresses which he had wonne in going towards Poitiers, and having furnished them with men, munition, and vittels necessarie, at his comming to Burdeaur he brake vp his host, and licencing his people to depart, thanked them for their paines and good seruice. All this while the siege continued still before Calis, and the French king amongst other deuises which he imagined how to raise the k. of England from it, procured the Scots to make warre into England, insomuch that Dauid king of Scotland, notwithstanding the truce which yet indured betwixt him and the king of England, vpon hope now to do some great exploit, by reason of the absence of king Edward, intangled thus with the besieging of Calis, he assembled the whole puissance of his realme, to the number of forty or threescore thousand fighting men (as some write) and with them entered into England, burning, spoiling, and wasting the countrie, till he came as far as Durham.

The lords of England that were left at home with the quene for the sure keeping and defense of the realme, perceiuing the king of Scots thus bold to inuade the land, and in hope of spoile to send forth his light horsemen to harrie the countrie on each side him, assembled an host of all such people as were able to beare armour, both prests and other. Their general assemble was appointed at Newcastle, and when they were all together, they were to the number of 1200 men of armes, three thousand archers, and seauen thousand other, with the Welshmen, and issuing out of the towne, they found the Scots ready to come forward to encounter them. Then euerie man was set in order of battell, and there were foure battels ordeined, one to aid another. The first was led by the bishop of Durham, Gilbert de Minfreulle earle of Aragos, Henrie lord Percie, and the lord Henrie Scrope: the second by the archbishop of Yorke, and the lord Rafe Beuill: the third by the bishop of Lincoln, John lord Spowbray, and the lord Thomas de Rokelie: the fourth was governed by the lord Edward Balioll capteine of Berwike, the archbishop of Canturburie, and the lord Ros: beside these were W. lord d'Incourt, Robert de Wgle, and other. The quene was there in person, and went from ranke to ranke, and encouraged hir people in the best manner she could, and that done she departed, committing them and their cause to God the giuer of all victorie.

gin the battell, and likewise did the Englishmen, and therewith the archers on both parts began to shot: the shot of the Scots did little hurt, but the archers of England soze galled the Scots, so that there was an hard battell. They began at nine of the clocke, and continued still in fight till none. The Scots had sharpe and heaute ares, & gaue with the same great and mightie strokes, howbeit finally the Englishmen by the helpe of God obtained the victorie, although they lost manie of their men. There were diuerse of the nobles of Scotland slaine, to the number of seven earles, beside lords. The king was taken in the field soze wounded, for he fought valiantlie. He was prisoner to an esquier of Northumberland, who as sone as he had taken him, rode out of the field with him, accompanied onlie with eight of his seruants, and rested not till he came to his owne castell where he dwelled, being thirtie miles distant from the place of the battell.

There was taken also beside him, the earles of Fife, Sutherland, Wighton, and Wenteth, the lord William Douglas, the lord Mescie, the archbishop of S. Andrewes, and another bishop, with sir Thomelin Foukes, and diuerse other men of name. There were slaine of one and other to the number of 15 thousand. This battell was fought before the citie of Durham at a place called Penils crosse, vpon a saturday next after the feast of saint Michaell, in the yeare of our Lord 1346. Of this ouerthrow Christopher Ok-

He that will see more of this battell, may find the same also set forth in the Scottish historie, as their writers haue written thereof. And for so much as by the circumstances of their writings, it should seeme they kept the remembrance of the same battell per seclie registred, we haue in this place onlie shewed what other writers haue recorded of that matter, and left that which the Scottish chronicles write, to be seene in the life of king David, without much abridging thereof. The Englishmen after this victorie thus obtained, took the castles of Roxburgh and Berwick, and also without any resistance subdued the countries of Anandale, Galloway, Mers, Tindale, and Eskike forest, extending their marches forth at that time vnto Tokburnes Beth, and Solway hedge, and after vnto Earlinkips, and crosse Caue.

The queene of England being certeinly informed that the king of Scots was taken, & that John Copland had conueied him out of the field, no man understood to what place, she incontinently wrote to him, commanding him forthwith to bring his prisoner king David vnto hir presence: but John Copland wrote to hir againe for a determinate answer, that he would not deliver his prisoner the said king David vnto any person lining, man or woman, except onlie to the king of England, his souereigne lord and master. Whereupon the queene wrote letters to the king, signifieng to him both of the hapie victorie chanced to his people against the Scots, and also of the demerit of John Copland, in detaining the Scottish king. King Edward immediatly by letters commanded John Copland to repaire vnto him where he late at siege before Calis, which with all convenient speed he did, and there so excused himselfe of that which the queene had found hirselfe grieved with him, for detaining the king of Scots from hir, that the king did not onlie pardon him, but also gaue to him five hundred pounds sterling of yearelie rent, to him & to his helres for ever, in reward of his good service and valiant prowes, and made him esquire for his bodie, commanding him yet vpon his returne into England to deliver king David vnto the queene, which he did, and so excused himselfe also vnto hir, that she was therewith satisfied and contented. Then the queene, after she had taken order for the safe keeping of the king of Scots, and good gouernment of the realme, took the sea and sailed ouer to the king hir husband still lieng before Calis.

Whilest Calis was thus besieged by the king of England, the Flemings which had latelie before beene besieged Betwine, and had raised from thence about the same time that the battell was fought at Cressle, now assemble together againe, and doing what damage they might against the Frenchmen on the borders, they laie siege vnto the towne of Aire. Whereouer, they wrought so for the king of England (certeinly requiring their friendship in that behalfe) that their souereigne lord Lewes earle of Flanders being as then about fiftene yeares of age, fianced the ladie Isabell daughter to the king of England, more by constraint indeed of his subiects, than for any good will he bare to the king of England: for he would often saie, and openlie protest, that he would neuer marrie hir whose father had slaine his: but there was no remedie, for the Flemings kept him in maner as a prisoner, till he granted to followe their aduise. But the same weeke that the mariage was appointed to be solemnized, the earle as he was abroad in hawking at the hearon, scale awate and fled into France, not skaieng to ride his horse vpon the spurs till he came into Arthois, and so dishonorablely disappointed both the king of England, and his owne naturall subiects the Flemings, to their high displeasure.

While the king late thus before Calis, diuerse lords and knights came to see him out of Flanders, Brabant, Heinault, and Almaine. Amongst other came the lord Robert of Namur, and was retained with the king as his seruant, the king giuing him three hundred pounds sterling of yearelie pension out of his coffers to be paid at Bruges. During the time that the siege thus continued before Calis, the lord Charles de Blois, that named himselfe duke of Britaine, was taken before a castell in Britaine, called la Roch Darien, and his armie discomfited, cheslie by the aid of that valiant English knight sir Thomas Dagworth, who had bene sent from the siege of Calis by king Edward to assist the countesse of Pontfort and other his friends against the said Charles de Blois, that with a gret armie of Frenchmen and Britains, had the same time besieged the said castell of Roch Darien, constraining them within in such forceable manner, that they stood in great need of present succours. The said sir Thomas Dagworth aduertised hereof, with three hundred men of armes, and foure hundred archers of his owne retinues, beside certein Britaines, approached to the siege, and on the 20 of June earlie in the morning, a quarter of an houre before day, suddenly set vpon the enemies, who hauing knowledge of his coming, were readie to receiue him as the day before, but being now surprised pised thus on the sudden, they were greatlie amazed: for they that were within Roch Darlen, as soon as the appearance of daie had discovered the matter unto them, so that they might know their friends from their enemies, they issued forth, and holpe not a little to the atchiuing of the victorie, which was clerelie obtained before sunne-rising, and the French armie quite discomfited, greatlie to the praise of the said sir Thomas Dagworth and his companie, considering their small number, in comparison of their aduersaries, who were reckoned to be twelue hundred good men of armes, knights, and esquires, beside six hundred other armed men, two thousand cross-bowes, six hundred archers of the countrie of Wistaine, and footmen of commons innumerable.

There were taken, besides the lord Charles de Blois naming himselfe duke of Britaine, diuerse other lords and men of name, as monsieur Guie de la Maall sonne and heire to the lordla Maall, which died in the battell, the lord of Rocheford, the lord de Beaumanoir, the lord of Nolache, with other lords, knights, and esquires, in great numbers. There were also the said lord de la Maall, the Count of Rohan, the lord of Chasteau Brian, the lord de Spalles street, the lord de Quintin, the lord de Rouge, the lord of Meruall and his sonne, sir Rafe de Pontford, and manye other worthie men of armes, knights and esquires, to the number of betwixt sir and seven hundred, as by a letter written by the said sir Thomas Dagworth, and registred in the historie of Robert de Auesburie both appeare.

In this meane while, king Philip hauing daile woord how the power of his enimie king Edward did increase by aid of the Easterlings and other nations, which were to him allied, and that his meitwinth Calis were brought to such an extreme point, that without speedie rescue they could not long keepe the towne, but must of force render it ouer into the hands of his said enimie, to the great prejudice of all the realme of France, after great deliberation taken vpon this so weightie a matter, he commanded euerie man to meet him in their best arraile for the warre, at the feast of Pentecost in the citie of Amiens, or in those marches. At the date and place thus appointed, there came to him Dues duke of Burgoyne, and the duke of Berryman die eldest sonne to the king, the duke of Orleans his yongest sonne, the duke of Burbon, the earle of Fflais, the lord Lois de Sautie, the lord John of Beffault, the earle of Arminacke, the earle of Foixell, and the earle Valentins, is, with manie others.

Their noble men being thus assembled, they tooke councell which waie they might passe to giue battell to the Englishmen: it was thibright the best waie had bene through Flanders, but the Flemings in fauor of the king of England denied, not onlie to open their passages to the Frenchmen, but also had leuied an armie of an hundred thousand men of wine and o- ther, and laid siege to Aire, and burnt the countrie all about. Whereon there were manie sharpe bickerings and force incontinents betwixt the Flemings and such Frenchmen as king Philip sent forth a- gainst them both, now, whilst the french armie late about Amiens, and bello before, during all the time that the siege lay at Calais, for all the french towins upon the frontiers were fortified with strong garri- sons of souldiers, as the saint Omers, Arras, Bul- longne, Aire and so forth, and those men of war were ever readie upon occasion to attempt sundrie exploits. After this, when the armie of the Flemings was broken-up, and returned home, or rather dri- uen into parts, and lodged along on the frontiers, the french king with tith thousand men one and other came for ward, taking his way through the countrie called la Belme, and so by the countrie of Frankberge, came streight to the hill of Sangate, betwixt Calis and Calant.

The king of England had caused a strong castell to be made betwene the towne of Calis and the sea, to close by that passage, and had placed therein three score men of armes, and two hundred archers, which kept the haven in such sort that nothing could come in nor out. Also considering that his enemies could come neither to succour the towne, nor to annoie his host, except either by the downes alongst the sea side, or else aboue by the high waie, he caused all his nauie to dwale alongst by the coast of the downes, to stop by that the Frenchmen should not approch that waie. Also the erle of Derby being come thither out of Guen, was appointed to keepe Hewland bridge, with a great number of men of armes and archers, so that the Frenchmen could not approch anie waie, vnlesse they would haue come through the marshes, which to do was not possible.

Fiftene hundred of the commons of Tourne man a tower, which the Englishmen had made and kept for the impeachment of the Frenchmens passage by the downes, but that notwithstanding, when the marshals of France had well viewed all the passages and streets through the which their armie must passe, if they meant to fight with the Englishmen, they well perceived that they could not come to the Englishmen to giue them battell, without the king would lose his people, wherevpon (as Froissard saith) the French king sent the lord Geoffrey de Charnie, the lord Eustace de Ribamont, Guie de Pele, and the lord de Beaufieu vnto the king of England, which required him on their maisters behalfe to appoint cer-teine of his counsell, as he would likewise appoint certeine of his, which by common consent might adiuse betwene them an indifferent place for them to trie the battell vpon: wherevnto the king of England answered, That there he was and had bene almost a whole yeare, which could not be unknowne to his aduersarie their maister, so that he might haue come soner if he would: but now, sith he had suffered him there to remaine so long, without offer of battell, he meant not to accomplish his desire, nor to depart from that, which to his great cost he had brought now at length to that point, that he might easilie win it. Wherefore if the French be, nor his host could not passe those waies which were closed by the English powier, let them take some other passage, (said he) if they thinke to come hither.

In this nicane while came two cardinals frō pope Clement, to treat a peace betwixt the two kings, whereupon commissioners were appointed, as the dukes of Burgoigne and Burbone, the lord Lewis de Saincte, and the lord John de Heinault, other wise called lord Beaumont, on the French part: and the earles of Derby and Northampton, the lord Reginald Cobham, and the lord Walter de Sparritie, on the English part. These commissioners and the legates (as intreators betwene the parties) met and continued thre daies together, but agreed not vpon any conclusion; and so the cardinals departed; and the French king perceiving he could not haue his purpose, brake by his host and returned to France, bidding Calis farewell. After that the French king with his host was once departed from Sangate, without ministering any succour to them within the towne, they began to sue for a parley, which being granted, in the end they were contented to yield, and the king granted to releue them and the towne on these conditions; that fir of the chiefe burgeses of the towne should come forth bareheaded, barefooted, and barelegged, and in their shirts, with halthers about their necks, with the keys of the towne and castell in their hands, to submit themselves simple to the kings will, and the residue he was contented to take to mercie.

This determinate resolution of king Edward being intimated to the commons of the towne, assembled in the market place by the sound of the common bell before the capteine, caused manie a weeping eie amongst them: but in the end, when it was perceived that no other grace would be obtained, sir of the most wealthie burgessees of all the towne agreed to hazard their liues for the safegard of the residue, and so according to the prescript order deuilled by the k. they went forth of the gates, and were presented by the lord Walter de Spannie to the king, before whom they kneled downe, offered to him the keies of the towne, and besought him to haue mercie vpon them. But the king regarding them with a fell countenance, commanded straight that their heads should be stricken off. And although manie of the noble men did make great intreatance for them, yet would no grace be shewed, untill the queene being great with child, came and kneled downe before the king hir husband, and with lamentable chere & weeping eies intreated so much for them, that finallie the kings anger was asswaged & his rigo: turned to mercie (for so that he gaue the prisoners vnto hir to do hir pleasure with them. Then the queene commanded them to be brought into hir chamber, and caused the halters to be taken from their necks, clothed them anew, gaue them their dinner, and bestowing vpon ech of them sir nobles, appointed them to be conueied out of the host in safegard, and set at libertie.

Thus was the strong towne of Calis yielded vnto the hands of king Edward, the third of August, in the yeare 1347. The capteine the lord John de Calicene, and all the other capteins and men of name were staied as prisoners, and the common soldiers and other meane people of the towne were licenced to depart and void their houses, leauing all their armes and riches behind them. The king would not haue any of the old inhabitants to remaine in the towne, save onlie a priest, and two other ancient personages, such as best knew the customes, lawes and ordinances of the towne. He appointed to send ouer thither amongst other Englishmen, there to inhabit, 36 burgessees of London, and those of the wealthiest sort, for he meant to people the towne onelie with Englishmen, for the better and more sure defense thereof. The king and queene were lodged in the castle, and continued there, till the queene was deliuered of a daughter named Spargaret.

The cardinals, of whome ye heard before, being come as legats from pope Clement to moue communication of peace, did so much in the matter, that a truce was granted betwixt the realme of England & France, for the terme of twelue moneths, or two yeares (as Froissard saith.) But the English chronicle and Iacobus Meir seeme to agree, that this truce was taken but for nine moneths, though afterwards the same was proroged. To the which truce all parties agreed, Britaine excepted, for the two women there would not be quieted, but still pursued the war the one against the other. After that this truce was accorded, the king with the queene his wife returned into England, and left as capteine within Calis one sir Americ de Hauie an Italian knight, or (as other booke haue) he was but capteine of the castle, or of some one of the towers of that towne, which seemeth more like to be true, than that the king should commit the whole charge of the towne vnto his goernement, being a stranger borne, and therefore Iacobus Meir is the more to be credited, that writeth how sir Americ of Hauie was left but in charge with the castell onelie, and that the towne was committed to the keeping of the lord John Beauchampe, and Leues his brother.

But now that there was a peace thus concluded betwixt the two kings, it seemed to the English people that the summe brake forth after a long cloudie season, by reason both of the great plentie of althings, and remembrance of the late glorious victories: for there were few women that were housekeepers within this land, but they had some furniture of household that had bene brought to them out of France, as part of the spoile got in Caen, Calis, Carenten, or some other good towne. And beside household stuffe, the English maidens and matrones were bedecked and trimmed vp in French womens iewels and apparell, so that as the French women lamented for the losse of those things, so our women rejoiced of the gaine. In this 22 yeare, from Whidsummer to Whistmasse for the more part it continuallie rained, so that there was not one day and night drie together, by reason thereof great floods ensued, and the ground therewith was sore corrupted, and manie inconueniences ensued, as great sicknesses, and other, in somuch that in the yeare following in France the people died wonderfullie in diuerse places. In Italie also, and in manie other countries, as well in the lands of the infidels, as in christendome, this grievous mortalitie reigned to the great destruction of people. About the end of August, the like death began in diuerse places of England, and especiallie in London, continuing so for the space of twelue moneths following. And vpon that ensued great barrenesse, as well of the sea, as the land, neither of them yielding such plentie of things as before they had done. Where vpon vittels and cozne became scant and hard to come by.

About the same time died John Streteford archbishop of Canturburie, after whome succeeded John Wifford, who liued not in that dignitie past ten moneths, and then followed Thomas Becketwardin, who deceased within one yeare after his consecration, so that then Simon Alip was consecrated archbishop by pope Clement the first, being the 53 archbishop that had sit in that seat. Within a while after, William archbishop of Yorke died: in whose place succeeded John Torbie, being the 44 archbishop that had gouerned that church. Moreover in this 23 yeare of king Edwards reigne, the great mortalitie in England still continuing, there was a practise in hand for reconering againe of Calis to the French kings possession. The lord Gessrie of Charnie lieng in the towne of S. Omers, did practise with sir Amuric de Hauie, to be receiued into the towne of Calis by the castell, secretly in the night season. The Italian gaue care to the lord Gessrie his sute, and to make few words, couenanted for the summe of twentie thousand crownes to betraie the towne vnto him, in such sort as he could best deuise.

Here writers varie: for Froissard saith that king Edward had information hereof, before that sir Americ de Hauie uttered anything himselfe; but the French chronicles, and also other writers affirme, that the Italian aduertised the king of all the drift and matter betwixt him & the lord Gessrie of Charnie, before he went through with the bargain. But whether by him or by other, truly it is the king was made priue to the matter of haunting Bowser in Essex (where he kept the feast of Whistmasse) & there vpon departing from thence, he came to Dover, and the daie before the night of the appointment made for the deliuerie of the castell of Calis (hauing secretly made his provision (he took shipping, and landed the same night at Calis, in so secret manner, that but few of the towne understood of his arrival. he brought

The day & houre of Charnie being couenanted

The lord Goeffrie de Charnie being couenanted that he should be receiued into Calis the first night of the new yeare, departed from S. Dimers, where he had assembled five hundred speares, the last day of December toward night, and so in secret wise he passed forth, till about the middelt of the next night after, he approached nere to Calis, and sending an hundred men of armes to take possession of the castell, and to paie the Italian his twentie thousand crownes, came to the posterne of the castell, where sir Amerie de Paule hauing let downe the posterne bridge, was ready to bring them in by the same posterne, and so the hundred men of armes entered, and sir Edward de Kentie deliuered to the Italian his twentie thousand crownes in a bag, who then he had cast the crownes into a coffer (for he had no leisure to tell them) he brought the Frenchmen into the dungeon of the castell, as it were to possesse them of the cheefest strength of the fortreffe. Within this dungeon or tolower was the king of England closelie laid, with two hundred men of armes, who issued out with their swords and ares in their hands, crying Hannetie to the rescue, for the king had so ordeined, that both he and his sonne should fight vnder the banner of the lord Goffrie de Charnie. as cheefe of that enterprise.

The king crieth Hannie to the rescue.

Then were the Frenchmen greatly abashed, in such wise, that perceiuing how no defense might aduance them, they yielded themselves without any great shew of resistance. Herewith the Englishmen issued out of the castell into the towne, and mounted on horsebacke, for they had the French prisoners horses, and then the archers roode to Bullongne gate, where the lord Gessrie was with his banner before him of gules thre scutcheons siluer. He had great desire to be the first that should enter the towne: but shortly the king of England with the prince his son was readie at the gate, vnder the banner of the lord Walter de Armannie to assaile him. There were also other banners, as the earles of Stafford and Suffolke, the lord John Pontacut brother to the earle of Salisburie, the lord Beauchampe, the lord Berkley, and the lord de la Mare. When the great gate was set open, and they all issued forth crying Armannie to the rescue. The Frenchmen perceiuing that they were betrayed, alighted from their horses, and put themselves in order of battell on foot, determining to fight it out like valiant men of war. The king perceiuing this, caused his people likewise to be set in order of battell, & sent thre hundred archers to Pethelande bridge, to distresse those Frenchmen, which he heard should be there. This was carele in the morning but incontinently it was daie: the Frenchmen kept their ground a while, and manie feats of armes were done of both parts, but the Englishmen neuer increased out of Calis, and the Frenchmen diminished, so that finally they were overcome, as well in the one place, as in the other.

waie, and there fought fiercelie together. The Frenchmen did behaue themselves right balliantlie, and especially sir Eustace de Ribamont: he strake the king that daie twise vpon his knees, but finallye he was taken prisoner by the king himselfe. The lord Gesstrie of Charnie was also taken prisoner, and wounded right sore, but the king of his noble courage caused him to be dressed by surgeons, and tenderlie looked vnto. There were slaine, sir Henric de Blois, and sir Depin de la Mare, with other, to the number of sir hundred. Monsieur de Memozance escaped with great danger. Froissard saith, that this battell was fought in the yeare 1348, vpon the last of December, towards the next morning being Betweyres daie: but (as Auesburie & Walsingham haue, who begin the yeare at our ladie day) this enterprise chanced 1349, and so consequentie in the 23 yeare of this kings reigne. All the prisoners were brought to the castell of Calis, where the 14. the next night gaue them a supper, & made them right hartie cheare, and gaue to sir Eustace de Ribamont a rich chaplet of pearles, which he then did weare on his owne head, in token that he had best deserued it for his manfull prowes shewed in the fight, & beside that in fauour of his tried balliance, he acquit him of his ranfome, and set him at libertie. 30 About the end of August the death in London ceased, which had bin so great & vehement within that citie, that ouer & beside the bodie buried in other accustomed burieng places (which for their infinit number cannot be reduced into account) there were buried that yeare dailie, from Candlemasse till Easter, in the Charterhouse yard of London, moze than two hundred dead corpses. Also this yeare, by the earnest sute of the two cardinals which were sent (as ye haue heard) from pope Clement the first, a peace was concluded for one yeare. There met nere unto Calis for the treatie of this peace, the foresaid two cardinals, as mediatoz; and for the king of England, the bishop of Norwich tresuroz and high chancelloz of the realme, with others came thither as commissioners; and in like maner for the French king, there appeared the bishop of Lion, and the abbat of S. ¶ This yere in August died Philip de Valois the French king. Here is to be noted, that all those that were bozne, after the beginning of that great mortallitie whereof ye haue heard, wanted foure cheeke teeth (when they came to the tyme of growth) of those which the people before that tyme commonlie used to haue, so that they had but 28. In this 24 yere of this kings reigne, there was a combat fought in liffes within the kings palace of Westminster, betwixt the lord John, bastard sonne to Philip king of France, & a knight of the towne of Wyres in Flanders; but the bastard had the vpper hand, and vanquished his aduersarie. ¶ About the feast of the decollation of saint John Baptist, king Edward aduertised of a fleet of Spaniards returning forth of Flanders, that was laden with clothes and other riches, assembled a conuenient power of men of armes and archers, & at Sandwich toke the sea with them, sailing forth, till vpon the coast of Winchelsie he met with the Spaniards, and there assailed them; so that betwixt him and those Spaniards, there was a fore fight, and long continued, to the great losse of people on both parts; but in the end, the bright brame of victorie shone vpon the English sailles, so that all the Spaniards were slaine, for they were so proud and obstinat (as Walsingham affirmeth) that they would not yeld, but rather chose to die, & so they did indeed.

pope.

About the beginning of August, sir Raoull de Cafoys, and diuerse other knights and esquires, to the number of sir score men of armes, fought before a castell called Aukon, with sir Thomas Dagworth, and there slae the same sir Thomas, and to the number of one hundred men of armes with him. There were sent solenne messengers this yeare vnto Auignon, for the establishing of a peace, mentioned betwixt the king of England and France, at the sute of the pope, so that king Edward should haue resigned his title and claime to the crowne of France, and the French king should haue giuen ouer vnto him the whole duchie of Guien, to hold the same free lie, without knowledging of reloit or superioritie, or doing any manner of homage for the same: but such delays were made, and the sute so prolonged by the pope, that the earle of Derby, who with others was sent to him about this matter, returned without speach of his purpose for the which he went.

In the five and twentieth yeare of king Edwards reigne, the Frenchmen hauing laid siege vnto the towne of saint John Dangel, the lord Dalbrets son, hauing assembled sir hundred men of armes, Gascoignes and Englishmen, meant to worke some feat for reliefe of them within, wher vpon, as he was marching through the countrie of Faindorge nere vnto Faints the eighth of Aprill, or (as other haue) the first, he was encountered by the lord Guie de Bell, one of the marshals of France, & other French lords, where at length, the Frenchmen were discomfited, manie also slaine, and diuerse taken prisoners, of which number was the said marshall, with his brother the lord William, and sir Arnold de Wandzeben, beside others, to the number of 300 men of armes, but yet the siege remained, till for want of vittells the towne was rendered to the Frenchmen.

The same yeare in October, an English archer of the garrison of Calis, named John of Wancaster, by licence of the lord deputie of Calis, toke with him threescore persons men of armes and archers, and in the night that goth before the feast daie of S. Vincent, in the last quarter of the same night, he coming to the castell of Guines, found as well the watch as others fast all ye, where vpon he passed a water that adioined to the castell, wading vp to the girde, and so came to the wall, where he & his companie rearing vp ladders, mounted by the same so secretly, that slaieng the watch, being not past thre or foure persons that were on the wals, they entred the castell, and finding the Frenchmen asleep, slae those that vpon their wakening made any defence, and toke the residue, whome they suffered to depart: and by this meanes they wane the castell, finding great store of vittells within, and so as they found it, they kept it to the king of Englands vse. The French histories declare, that one Guiliam de Beauconroy that was capitaine of this castell, betrayed the place to the Englishmen, for a summe of monie, and when the French king required restitution because the truce was not yet expired, he was shifted off with this forged answer, that nothing was excepted by the assurance of the truce, concerning things that should be bought and sold. The Frenchman that betrayed it, was shortly after put to execution at Amiens.

In this yeare were the first pices of siluer called grotes and halfe grotes of foure pence & two pence the pice stamped by the kings appointment, through the counsell of William de Edington bishop of Winchester lord treasurer. Before that time, there were no other coines, but the noble, halfe noble, and quarter noble, with the pices of siluer called sterlings. Bicause these new pices wanted of the weight of the old sterling coine, the pices as well of vittells as of other wares, did daily rise, and seruants and workemen waring more craftie than before time they had bene, demanded great wages. This yeare, vpon the euen of the Assumption of our lodie, sir John Bentlie knight, as then lord warden of Britaine, fought with the lord Guie de Bell, marshall of France (latelie ransomed out of captiuitie) in the parts of Britaine, nere to a place called Pouron, betwixt Rennes and Blureimell, where the said marshall was slaine, together with the lord of Briquebeke the Chateline of Beauuais, and diuerse other both Britains and Frenchmen.

In the seven and twentieth yeare of his reigne, king Edward held a parlement at Westmynster, after the feast of Easter, in which an ordinance was deuised, what wages seruants and laborers should be allowed, prohibiting them to receiue aboue the rate which they were accustomed to take before the yeare of the great mortalitie. Seruants and laborers were indeed growen to be more subtil than before time they had bene, but by reason of the pices of things were enhanced, it is like they demanded greater wages than they had done before time: and one cause of the dearth was imputed to the new coine of monie, being of lesse weight in the value thereof, than before it had bene, so that the bishop of Winchester being lord treasurer, who had counselled the king to ordaine those grotes and halfe grotes, was euill spoken of amongst the people. In this parlement there were statutes also made, that clothes should in length and in breadth through the realme, beare the same assise, as was ordeined in the parlement holden at Potheampton. Also, that all weares, milles, and other lets, should be removed forth of riuers, that might be any hinderance of ships, boats, or lighters to passe by and downe the same. But these good ordinances toke little or none effect, by reason of bybes that walked abroad, and frendship of lords and great men, that sought rather their owne commoditie, than the common-wealths.

Shortly after the feast of Pentecost, the earle of Derby and Lancaster was made duke of Lancaster, and Rafe lord Stafford was created earle of Stafford. Whereas there had bene a treatie betwixt the lords of Britaine, and the king of England, not onelie for the deliuerance of the lord Charles de Blois, but also for the matching of his eldest sonne in marriage with one of king Edwards daughters, and so to inioy the dukedome in peace: this matter was so far forwarde, that in the yeare last passed, the said lord Charles, leauing two of his sonnes and a daughter in pledge for the payment of fortie thousand liours, agreed vpon for his ransome; he was permitted to returne into Britaine to prouide that monie: and withall, to procure a dispensation, that his eldest sonne might marrie with one of king Edwards daughters, notwithstanding that other wise they were within the degrees of consanguinitie, prohibiting them to marrie. Here vpon this yeare about Michaclmas, he returned into England with the same dispensation: but because about the same time the Britains had taken by stealth an Island with a castell therein, that the Englishmen had kept, & put all those which they found round therein, to the sword, the said lord Charles, or ther wife duke of Britaine, lost the kings favour, so that he would heare no more of anie such alliance, by waie of marriage, as had bene communed of before: by reason whereof the Britissh lords, that were in great number come ouer with the lord Charles de Blois, were constrained to returne home, without achyving anie part of their purpose, leauing the said lord Charles and his chyldren behind them still here in England.

On the fourth day of September, the duke of Bunswike and the duke of Lancaster should haue fought a combat in Paris, about words the duke of Lancaster should speake, in derogation of the duke of Bunswikes honor, for the which the said duke had appealed him in the court of France: but when they were ready to haue tried it, and were on horse backe with their speares in hand within the lists, at point to haue runne together, the French king caused them to staie, and taking on him the matter, made them friends, and agreed them. This yeare the king by ad-uise of his counsell remoued the mart or staple of wools from the towne in Flanders, and caused the same to be kept at Westminster, Chichester, Lin-colne, Wythowe, Canturburie and Hull. This was done in despite of the Flemings, because they held not the cournants and agreements which they had made with the king, in the life time of Jaques Arteweld, by whose prouision the said mart or staple had bene kept in sundrie townes in Flanders, to their great aduantage and commoditie.

Sir Walter Bentlie, vpon his comming ouer from Britaine, where he had bene the kings lieutenant, was committed to the tower; where he remained prisoner for the space of twelue moneths, because he refused to deliuer by the castels within his gouernement, vnto sir John Auenell knight, being appointed to receiue the same, to the vse of the lord Charles de Blois, at the same time when the treatie of agreement was in hand, betwixt the king, and the said lord Charles. But after, when it was perceiued what damage might haue ensued by deliuerie of those castels, sir Walter was set at libertie vpon suerties yet they were bound for his forth comming, and that he should not depart the realme: at length, he was receiued againe into the kings fauour. In the summer of this seauen and twentieth yeare, was so great a drought, that from the latter end of March, fell little raine, till the latter end of Iulie, by reason whereof, manie inconueniences ensued: and one thing is speciallie to be noted, that come the yeate following ward scant, and the pryce began this yeare to be greatlie enhanced. Also beanes and muttons wared deere for the want of grasse, and this chanced both in England and France, so that this was called the deere summer. The lord William duke of Bauere or Bawarie, and earle of Zeland, brought manie shipps into London, fraught with wye, for relafe of the people, who otherwise had, through their present pining penurie, if not utterly perished, yet pitti-fully pined.

In the eight and twentieth yeare of king Edwards reigne, vpon a treatie that was holden by commisi-oners, appointed by the two kings of England and France, after Easter, they were in manner fullie a-gred vpon a peace, so that nothing wanted, but putting vnto their seals. In the articles whereof it was contained, that the king of England should inioy all the lants of his dukedome of Aquitaine, without holding the same of anie by homage, or reiozt, and in consideration thereof he should resigne all his claime to the crowne of France. Wherevpon were ambassadors sent from either king, vnto the pope, and a truce taken, to indure till the feast of saint Iohn Baptis in the yeare next following. Ambassadors for the king of England were these: Henrie duke of Lancaster, John earle of Arundell, the bishops of Dorwich and London, and the lord Cuie de Brian. For the French king, the archbishop of Rouen lord chancelor of France, the duke of Bourbon, and others: but when the matter came to be heard before the pope about Christmasse, all went to smoke that had bene talked of: for the Frenchmen denied that the articles were drawne according to the meaning of their commissioners, and the pope also winked at the matter, so that the English ambassadors (when they saw that nothing would be concluded) returned home all of them) the bishop of Dorwich excepted who departed this life there) and so their iourne came to none effect.

This yeare, the tenth of Februarie, there rose a sore debate betwixt the scholers and townsmen of Wynford. The occasion rose by reason of the falling out of a scholer with one that sold wine: for the scholer perceiuing himselfe euill used, potwized the wine on the drawers head, knocking the pot about his pate, so as the bloud ranne downe by his eares. Wherevpon began a sore fraie betwixt the scholers and townes-men, which continued for the most part of two daies together. There were twentie townsmen slaine, beside those that were hurt: but at length, there came a great number of countymen from the villages next adioining, to aid the townsmen, entring the towne with a blacke banner, and so fiercelie assailed the scholers, that they were constrained to flee to their houses and hofels, but their enemies pursuing them, brake vp their doores, entered their chambers, thus diuerse of them, and threw them into pyries, tare their bookes, and bare awaie their goods. The scholers herewith toke such displeasure, that they departed the Vniuersitie: those of Sperton colledge, and other the like colledges onelie excepted.

The bishop of Lincolne inhibited preachers to celebrate diuine seruice in presence of anie laie man within that towne of Wyndford; and the king sending his iustices thither, to take knowledge of this dis-orderlie riot, there were diuerse, both of the townes-men and scholers indicted, and certeine of the burgesses committed to ward. This yeare, the first sun-daie in Lent, the king held a roiall iustice at Wood-stoke, for toy of the quenes purifying, after the birth of his first sonne, the lord Thomas, whome the bishop of Durham (named Thomas) held at the fontfome: he was borne the seauenth of Januarie last past. In the parlement holden at Westminster this yeare after Easter, the king toke vpon him to make an end of the quarrell betwixt the scholers and townsmen of Wyndford, and sauing to euerie man his right, pardoned the scholers of all transgressions: and this he signified into euerie shire, by writs directed to the shiriffes, they to proclame the same for moze notice of the thing. And so in the summer following, the Uniuersitie began againe to flourish, students reso-ring thither from each side, and falling afresh to their academicall exercises, which they needed not to haue discontinued, if either partie, I meane the townes-men or scholers, would haue tolerated and borne one with another, and not so rashlie haue undertaken the reuenge of one anothers wrath and iniurie; but,

Oderunt pacem fultu certamina quarunt.

In this parlement, the procelle of the iudgement had and made against Roger Spottimer, late earle of March, was reuoked, aduillated, and made void, so that the lord Roger Spottimer was restored to the title and possessions of the earledome of March, as couline and heire to his grandfather the said erle of March. Wherevpon, to this parlement came the bishop of Carpentras, and the abbat of Clugnie, being sent from pope Innocent the first, to make sure to have the truce prolonged betwixt the two kings, of England and France, to whom the king himselfe in person, made this resolute answer, that he would not agree to any longer truce; for that, when diuerse times, at the Frenchmens suite, he had consented to have truce by mediation of two cardinals, sent to him about the same matter, his aduersaries in the meane time, whilst such truces indured, had done much harme and damage by subtil practises to persons and places beyond the sea, that were vnder his rule and gouernement, yet he said he would deliberate hereof with his counsell, and after intimate his pleasure to the pope, and to them of France by messengers which he would send ouer for that purpose: and so these ambassadoys within foure daies after their comming, were thus dispatched with answer. Herewith in this parlement it was ordeined, that the prince of Wales, being as then about foure and twentie yeares of age, should passe ouer into Gascoigne, and haue with him a thousand men of armes, and two thousand archers, with a great number of Welshmen.

About the same time the king caused fortie ships to be provided, rigged, and made ready at Rotherhithe, furnished with vittels for one quarter of a yere, and euerie of the said ships had principall streamers of the duke of Lancasters armes, who was appointed with a great power of chosen men of armes and archers to passe to the sea with the same ships, but few or none of his companie knew whither; howles they had none. He had with him two of the kings sonnes, Lionell of Antwerpe, and John of Cant, the elder of them being about sixtene yeares of age. Also, there went with him the earles of Northampton, March, and Stafford, beside manie lords, barons, & knights. On the tenth of Iulie, he made saile to Greenewich, and there and at Sandwich he staid, till the Assumption of our ladye, the wind for the most part continuing all that while at west and south, contrarie to his iourne, as it might appeare. At length with much difficultie he came to Winchellie, & after to the Wight. It was thought, that the dukes purpose was to passe into Normandie, to ioint with the king of France, who was at variance with the French king. But after it was knowne by espials that they were made friends, the duke of Lancaster doubting crooked measures, and hauing with him no horsemen, returned home without further attempt.

Record. Tur.

On saint Benelmes daie being fridaye, and the 17 of Iulie, master Humfrie Carleton professor of diuinitie, and John Carleton the younger, doctor of the lawes, on the behalfe of the Vniuersitie of Oxford, and John saint Fridelwilde maister, John Beresford, and John Porton, burgesses of the said towne of Oxford, on the behalfe of the communalitie of the same towne, came before the kings counsell at Westminister in the counsell chamber there, nere to the erchebisher, where the allegations on both parties being heard, and vpon request made, that it might please his maiesties counsell, according to the submissions by both parties made vnto the king and to his counsell, to take order in the matter in controuersie betwixt them, concerning the late tumult and business which had chanced in the said towne, by the disorder of the communalitie of the same, and breaking downe, and burning vp of houses, in taking auaite the bookes and other goods of the said masters and scholars, & in committing other transgressions. The counsell hauing consideration thereof, to auoid the debate that might haue ensued to the said towne, made this end betwixt them, that the said towne (John Beresford, being in the kings prison, and Robert Lardiner onlie excepted) should be bound to

pate vnto the said masters and scholars, dammified in the said tumult and business, for amends, and reformation of iniuries and losses sustained (death and maiime excepted) two hundred and fiftie pounds, beside the goods taken and bozne auaite, to be restored againe, and this monie to be paid to the said chancelor, masters and scholars, on that side the mondaie next before the feast of saint James, or else sufficient suerties put in for the payment thereof, at certeine termes, as the parties should agree vpon: and in respect thereof, the said John Beresford, and John Porton, shall be released out of prison of the Marshalsea, at the baile of the said maister, and of Robert de Spenkes, and John Dimmoks, till the next sessions of gaole deliuerie, with condition, that the said summes of monie be paid, or suerties put in for the payment thereof, as before is said, or else the bodies of the said John Beresford, & John de Porton, shall be returned to the said prison, within thre daies after the feast of Peter ad Vincula, there to remaine in manner as before they did.

It was also ordeined by the counsell, with the assent of the said Humfrie and John Carleton, that all and euerie manner of persons of the said towne of Oxford, and the suburbs of the same, indicted and arraigned of the felonies and transgressions before mentioned, that should yeld themselves to the kings prison to be tried by law, and also all other that were at that present in prison, which the said Humfrie and John de Carleton should name (John de Beresford and Robert Lardiner excepted) might be let to baile, vpon sufficient suerties, that should undertake for them, bodies for bodies, to appeare at the next sessions of gaole deliuerie, there to be tried, according to the order of law. And further it was ordered, that all such goods and cattels as were taken and carried auaite from the said masters and scholars in the said tumult and business, by the men of the said towne and suburbs, in whose hands, and in what places soeuer within the said towne and suburbs, by inquisitions, informations, or other meanes, they should or might be found, should be deliuered to the said chancelor, and procurators of the said Vniuersitie, to be by them restored vnto those persons, to whom they belonged. This was the effect of the order taken at that day and place, before the said fathers, John archbishop of Yorke primate and chancelor of England, William bishop of Winchester lord treasurer, Thomas de Beames lord keeper of the priue seale, and Dauid de Wolloze master of the rolles, Henrie de Angelbie clearke, and other of the kings counsell then and there present.

The prince of Wales (as ye haue heard) being appointed to passe ouer into Gascoigne, set forward from London the last daie of Iune, and comming to Wilmouth, where his nauie was appointed to be made ready, he staid there, for want of convenient wind and weather a long time after. Finally, hauing with him the earles of Warwick, Suffolke, Salisburie & Oxford, also the lord John Chandlers, sir Robert Anols, sir Franke de Hall, the lord James Andelle, with diuerse other of the nobilitie, and of men of armes and archers a great number, then in parlement to him assigned, he set forth from Wilmouth on the daie of the practises of our ladye. They were in all thre hundred saile, and finding the wind prosperous, they passed ouer into Gascoigne, where of the Gascoignes they were iustlie received. In August, the Englishmen that were in Britaine, warring against the Frenchmen, that took part with the lord Charles de Blois, the maite of them, & took the lord of Beaumanoir, the vicount of Roan, and diuerse other. readie at Sandwich, passed over to Calis with the same. There went over with him his two sonnes, Lionel of Antwerp earle of Ulster, and John of Gaunt earle of Richmond. He found at Calis a thousand men of armes that came to serve him for wages, forty of Flanders, Brabant, and Almaine, so that he had about three thousand men of armes, and two thousand archers on horsebacke, beside archers on foot a great number. The cite of London had sent to him five hundred men of armes, and five hundred archers all in one sute of luerie, at their owne costs and charges. On the second of November, he set from Calis, marching south towards saint Omers, wasting the countrie by the waie as he passed.

The French king being at the same time within the towne of saint Omers, sent the lord Boucicaut unto the king of England, that under colour of communication, he might view the kings powder, who made such report thereof, upon his returne backe to the French king, that he determined not to fight with the king of England, but rather to passe before him, and so to destroye vittels, that for want thereof, the king of England should be constrained to returne. And as he determined, so it came to passe, for the vittels were so cut off, that the Englishmen for three full daies together, drank nothing but water. When therefore king Edward had followed his enemies so farre as Heiden, where he brake the parke, and burnt the houses within and about the parke, although he entered not into the towne nor castell, at length, for default of vittels, he returned backe, and came againe to Calis on saint Martins day, being the tenth after his setting forth from thence.

The morrow after being thursdai, and the twelfth of November, the constable of France, and other Frenchmen, came to the end of the cause of Calis, with letters of credence, offering battell on tuesday next following unto the king of England, in presence of the duke of Lancaster, the earles of Northampton, and the lord Maltr de Hannie, who in the kings behalfe declared to the constable, that the king of England, to eschew shedding of blood, would fight with the French king bodie to bodie, so to trie their right: and if he liked not of that match, then if he would chuse three or foure knights to him that were nearest to him in blood, he should chuse the like number. But when this offer would not be accepted, the English lords offered battell the next day, being friday, or else on saturday following, at the Frenchmens choice: but the constable of France and his companie, continuing in their first offer, refused both those daies. Then the English lords accepted the daie by them assigned, with condition, that if they brought not king Edward to give battell that day, they would yield themselves prisoners, so that the Frenchmen would likewise undertake for their king. The constable having no answer readie, staid a while, and after battell refused to make any such covenant. Finally, when the English lords perceived their adversaries, not to meane battell, as their words at the first pretended, they brake off, and both parties returned home. The king of England staid till the tuesday, and paid the strangers their wages, and so came backe into England. On the first of November, whilst the king was thus abroad in Picardie, the Scots beinge in the morning of that daie, came privately to Berwick, entered by stealth into the towne, and takinge three or foure Englishmen, took it, with all the goods and persons within it, those excepted, which got to the castell.

In a parliament summoned this yeare, the morrow after the feast of saint Edmund the king, the lords and commons granted to king Edward five fillings of everie sacke of wolle, that should be carried over the sea, for the space of six yeares next ensuing. By this grant it was thought, that the king might dispend a thousand markes sterling a day, such bent of wools had the English merchants in that season. The parlement being ended, the king about saint Andrews tide set forward towards Scotland, and held his Christmasse at Newcastle. About which time by letters sent from the prince, the king was advertised of his proceedings after his arrivall in Gascoigne, where beinge received of the nobles, and other the people of that countrie (as before ye have heard) he declared to them the cause of his thither comming, and took advise with them how to proceed in his businesse, and so about the tenth of October, he set forward to passe against his enemies, first entering into a countrie called Juliske, which together with the fortresses yielded to him, without any great resistance. Then he rode through the countie Armignac, wasting and spoiling the countrie, and so passed through the lands of the vicounts de la Riviere, and after entered into the countie de l'Estac, and passing through the same, came to the countie of Cominiges, finding the towne of saint Patrain void, being a good towne, and one of the best in that countrie.

After this, he passed by the land of the earle of Aile, till he came within a league of Tholouse, where the earle of Armignac, being the French kings lieutenant in those parts, and other great lords and nobles were assembled. The prince with his armie tarried there two daies, and after passed over the river of Garonne, and after over an other river thereabouts, a league about Tholouse, lodging that night a league on the other side of Tholouse, and so they passed thorough Tholouse, daile takinge townes and castels, wherein they found great riches, for the countrie was verie plentifull. Upon Alhalloves even, they came to castell Jaudarie, and from thence they took the waie to Carcasson, into the which a great number of men of armes and commons were withdravne. But upon the approach of the Englishmen, they slipped away, and got them to a strong castell that stood nere at hand. The third day after, the Englishmen burnt the towne, and passing forth, traupied all the countrie of Carcassonois, till they came to the towne of Barbonne. The people there were fled into the castell, in which the vicount of Barbonne was inclosed, with five hundred men of arms. The prince staid there two daies. The pope sent two bishops towards the prince, to treat with him of peace, but because the prince would not hearken to any treatie without commission from his father, they could not get any safe conduct to approach nearer.

The prince havinge advertisements here, that his enemies were assembled, and followed him, he turned backe to meet them, but they had no will to abide him: for although the earle of Armignac, the constable of France, the marshall Clermont, and the prince of Orange, with divers other nere to Tholouse, made some shew to impeach the prince his passage, yet in the end they withdrew, not without some losse, for the lord Bartholomew de Burghesch, sir John Chandois, the lord James Audelay, and sir Thomas Felton, being sent forth to view them, furnished with two hundred of their men of armes, and took of them five and thirtie. After this, they had no mind to abide the English power, but still shanke away, as the prince was readie to follow them, and so he perceivinge that the Frenchmen would not give him battell, he withdrew towards Burdeaur, after he had spent eight weekes in that his journey, and so comming thither, he wintered there, whilst his captives in the meane time took divers townes and castels abroad in the countrie. And now to the end ye may have more plaine information of the princes doings in those parties, I haue thought good to make you partakers of a letter or two, written by sir John Winkfield knight, attendant on the prince there in Gascoigne.

The copie of sir Iohn Winkfield's letters.

My lord, as touching the newes in these parts, may it please you to vnderstand, that all the earles, barons, baronets, knights, and esquiers, were in helth at the making hereof, and my lord hath not lost either knight or esquier in this boiage, except the lord John Lille, who was slaine after a strange manner with a quarrell, the third day after we were entered into our enemies countreys, he died the fiftenth of October. And please it you to vnderstand, that my lord hath ridden through the countreie of Arminac, and hath taken many fensed townes, and burnt and destroyed them, except certeine which he hath fortified. After this, he marched into the vicountie of Rouergne, where he toke a good towne named Pleasance, the chiefest towne of that countreie, which he hath burnt and destroyed, with the countreie round about the same. This done, he went into the countie d'Alstrike, wherein he toke manie townes, waiked and destroyed all the countreie. After this, he entred into the countie of Cominge, and toke manie townes there, which he caused to be destroyed & burnt, together with all the countreie abroad. He toke also the towne of S. Matan, which is the chiefest towne of that countreie, being as large in compasse as Norwich.

Afterward, he entered into the countie of Lille, and toke the most part of the fensed townes therein, causing diuerse of them to be burnt and destroyed as he passed. And after entring into the lordship of Tholouse, we passed the riuer of Girond, and an other a league aboue Tholouse, which is verie great: for our enemies had burnt all the bridges, as well on the one side of Tholouse, as the other, except the bridges with in Tholouse, for the riuer runneth through the towne. And the constable of France, the marshall Cleremont, and the earle of Arminac, were with a great power within the towne the same time. And Tholouse is a great towne, strong, faire, and well walled, and there was none in our host that knew the fowd there: but yet by the grace and goodnesse of God we found it. So then we marched through the seignorie of Tholouse, & toke manie good townes inclosed, and burnt and destroyed them, and all the countreie about.

Then we entred into the seignorie of Carcason, and we toke manie good towns, befoze we came to Carcason, which towne we also toke, which is greater, stronger, & fairer than Poze. And as well this towne as all other townes in the countreie were burnt and destroyed. And after we had passed by manie iournies through the countreie of Carcason, we came into the seignorie of Parbon, and we toke manie townes, and waiked them, till we came to Parbon, which towne was holden against vs, but it was wone by force, and the said towne is little lesse than London, and is situated vpon the Greekish sea, for that the distance from the said towne vnto the Greekish sea is not past two leagues, and there is an hauien and a place to arrive at, from whence the water cometh by to Parbon. And Parbon is not but eleuen leagues distant from Mountpellier, & eightene from Eguemortz, & thirtie from Auignon. And may it please you to vnderstand, that the holie father sent his messengers to my lord, that were not past seuen leagues fro him, and they sent a sergeant at armes, that was sergeant at armes attendant on the doze of our holie fathers chamber, with their letters to my lord, praieng him to haue a safe conduct to come to declare to his highnesse their message from the holie father, which was to treat betwixt my L. and his aduersaries of France: and the said sergeant was two daies in the host befoze my lord would see him, or receiue his letters. And the reason was, bicause he had vnderstanding, that the power of France was come forth of Tholouse toward Carcason, so that my lord was driuen to turne backe towards them suddenly, and so did.

On the third daie when we should haue come vpon them, they had knowlege giuen befoze day, and so retiring, got them to the mounteins, halting fast toward Tholouse: and the countreie people that were their guides to lead them that waie, were taken as they should haue passed the water. And bicause the popes sergeant at armes was in my keeping, I caused him to examine the guides that were taken, and for that the guide which was thus examined, was the constables guide, and his countreiman; he might well see and know the countenance of the Frenchmen vpon this examining him. And I said to the same sergeant, that he might well declare to the pope, and to all them of Auignon, that which he had heard or seen. And as touching the answer which my lord made to them that were sent to treat with him, you would be well apaid if you vnderstood all the manner: for he would not suffer in any wise that they should come neerer vnto him. But if they came to treat of any matter, he would that they should send to the king his father: for my lord himselfe would not do any thing therein, except by commandement from my lord his father.

And of my lords turning backe to follow after his enemies, and of the passage of the riuer of Garonne, and of the taking of castels and townes in this iourne, and of other things which he hath done against his enemies, in pursuit of them in this iourne, being things right worthy and honorable, as manie know verie well, in like manner maner as sir Richard Stafford, & sir William Burton can more plainlie declare, than I to you can write, for it were too much to put in writing. And my lord rode thus abroad in the countrie of his enemies eight whole weekes, and rested not past eleven daies in all those places where he came. And know it for certeine, that since this warre began against the French king he had neuer such losse or destruction as he hath had in this iourne: for the countreies and good townes which were wasted at this iourne, found to the king of France euerie yeare more to the maintenance of his warre than halfe his realme hath don beside, except the exchange of his monie which he maketh euerie yeare, and the advantage and custome which he taketh of them of Poitou, as I can shew you by good remembrances which were found in diuerse townes in the receiueurs houses: for Carcason and le Moignes, which is as great as Carcason, and two other townes in the coasts of Carcason, found to the king of France yereleie wages for a thousand men of armes: and beside that 100000 old crowns to mainteine the war.

And know you, that by the remembrances which we found, that the townes in Tholouse which are destroyed, and the townes in the countrie of Carcason, and the towne of Marbonne and Marbomois did find euerie yeare with the sums aforesaid, in aid of his war, foure hundred thousand old crownes, as the burgeses of the great townes & other people of the countrie which ought to know it, haue told vs. And so by Gods assistance if my lord had wherewith to mainteine this warre, and to make the kings profit and his owne honor, he should well enlarge the English marches, and gaine manie faire places: for our enemies are greatlie astonished. And at the making hereof, my lord hath appointed to send all the earles and baronets to abide in certeine places on the marches, to make roads, and to annoie his enemies. Now my lord, at this present I know none other newes to send, but you may by your letters command me as yours to my power. My right honorable lord, God grant you good life, ioy, and health, long to continue. Written at Burdeaux, the tuesdaie next before Chyristmasse.

The tenor of an other letter written by sir John Wingfield, directed to sir Richard Stafford knight, who had beene in Gascoigne, and there leaving his familie, was now returned into England.

Ight deare sir, and right louing friend, touching newes after your departure, you may vnderstand, that there be taken and yielded five townes inclosed, to wit, pozt saint Marie, Cleirac, Tonings, Burgh, saint Pierre, Chastell Sacret or Sarrat and Brassake. Also seauentene castels, to wit, Coillier, Baset, Lemnake, two castels called Boloines, which ioine the one nere to the other, Mounicy, Uirech, Frechenet, Moutender, Budeschales, Mounpoun, Moutanac, Valeclare, Cenamont, Leistrake, Blallac, Cont Destablillon, and Mouniwell. And will it please you to know that my lord John Chandois, my lord James Audley, and your men that are with them, and the other Gascoignes that are in their companie, & my lord Baldwin Butetort, & that companie, & my lord Reignold Cobham, take the said towne, which is called Chastell Sacret or Sarrat, by assault: and the ballard of Lille which was capteine of the said towne was also slaine there, as they assaulted it, being stricken with an arrow throught the head: and my lord Reignold is returned backe toward Languedocke: and my lord Baldwin towards Brassake, with their companies: and the lords John & James, and those of their companie remaine in Chastell Sarrat, and haue bittels plentie of all sorts to serue them between this and Midsummer, except fresh fish and cabages as they haue certified vs by letters, wherefore ye need not take care for your men.

And there be in that towne more than three hundred glaives, and three hundred yeomen, and a hundred and fiftie archers. And they haue rid befoze Agen, and burnt and destroyed all their milles, and haue burnt and broken downe all their bridges that lie ouer Garon, and haue taken a castell without the same towne, and haue fortified it. And monsieur John Darminake, and the seneschall of Agenois, which were in the towne of Agen, would not once put forth their head, nor anie of their people, and yet haue they bene twise befoze that towne. And monsieur Bulgaud was come, and monsieur Ernald de Spaine, and Gri-moton de Chambule, with three hundred glaives, and three sergeants Lombards, and they are in the towne of Mulschake, which is in Cressie, and it is but a mile from Chastell Sarrat or Sacret, and a league from Bressake, and ye may well thinke that there will be good companie one with another.

And further may it please ye to know, that monsieur Bartholomew is at Conisake with six score men of armes of my lords house, & six score archers, & the capitall de Buche or Beuf, the L. Monferrant, & the L. of Crotonie, which haue with them 300 glaives, & six score archers, and two hundred sergeants, beside them which are in Caillbourgh, Tanne, and Rochford, so that when they are together, they may be well six hundred glaives, and at the making hereof, they were vpon a iourne towards Antou and Poitou, and the earles of Suffolke, Orford, and Salisburie, the lord of Mulseden, monsieur Ellis de Bomiers, and other Gascoignes, with the which are well more then five hundred glaives, and two hundred sergeants, and three hundred archers, and they were at the making hereof hereof toward the parties of Hostredame de Rochemade, and haue bene forth aboute twelue daies, and were not returned at the sending of these presents. My lord John Chandois, my lord James, and my lord Baldwin, and those which be in their companie are also forth upon a tourne toward their parties: my lord Reinold and those of the household, with the Gascoigns which be in their companie, are also forth upon a tourne towards their parties.

The earle of Warwike hath bene at Comings & Clerake, to take those towne, and at the making hereof was gone towards Hermende to destroe their vines, and all other things which he can destroe of theirs. My lord is at Leiboine, and the lord of Bomiers at Fronlak, which is but a quarter of a leage from Leiboine: and my lords people lie as well at saint Millon, as at Leiboine, and monsieur Berard de Bret is there with him, and my lord looketh for newes which he should haue, and according to the news that he shall haue, he will behaue himselfe: for as it seemeth, he standeth much on his honor. At the making hereof, the earle of Arminac was at Auignin, and the king of Aragon is there also: & of all other parties which haue bene in diuerse places (whereof you know) I can not certifie you at the making hereof. Right dære sir, other thing I can not send vnto you, but that you remember your selfe to send newes to my lord prince as soone as in anie wise you may, and so the Lord grant you god life and long. Written at Leiboine the 21 of Januarie.

¶ These letters haue I thought good to make the reader partaker of, as I find them in the chronicle of Robert Auesburie, to the end ye may perceiue how other writers agree therewith, with the same letters may serue as a touchstone to trie the truth of the matter. And so now I will returne to speake of the kings doings in the north part where we left him. On the fourteenth of Januarie. Edward hauing his armie lodged nere the towne of Bertwike, and his nauie readie in the haven to assaile the Scots that were within the towne, he entered the castell which the Englishmen had in their hands, the lord Walter de Spannie being their capitaine, who had gotten certeine miners thither from the forest of Deane, and other parts of the realme, which were busie to make passage vnder the ground by a mine, through which the Englishmen might enter into the towne. Hereupon, when the Scots perceiued in what danger they stood, and knew that they could not long defend the towne against him, they surrendered it into his hands without further resistance.

In the Scottish histories it is recorded, that when those which were within the towne of Bertwike, heard how that an armie of Englishmen came to the succours of the castell, they raced the walles and burnt the houses of the towne, and so departed with all the spoile which they had gotten there. But how soeuer it was, king Edward being againe possessed of the towne, he set men a worke to repaire it, and passing forth to Norburge, there met with him the rightfull king of Scots Edward Balioll, who transferred & resigned all the right, title and interest, which he had or might haue to the crowne and realme of Scotland into king Edwards hands: which resignation he confirmed by his letters patents thereof made and giuen vnder his hand and seale, dated the 25 of Januarie 1356, requiring king Edward to perseuere in pursute of his title to the crowne.

King Edward hauing thus receiued the resignation and release of the crowne of Scotland, marched forth with his armie, till he came to Haddington, burning and destroiering the countie on each side round about him, as he passed. And whilst he late there, abiding for his ships, his men of warre were not idle, but ranged abroad in the countie, and did all the damage to their enemies that they could devise. At length his armie which he had at the same time on the sea, arrived on that coast, and landing, spoiled a church of our ladie, called the White kirke: but being returned to their ships, there arose such a tempest and belement north wind, that manie of their vessels rushing and beating against the banks and sands, were drownded together with the men that were within them, for displeasure whereof king Edward fell to the spoile of the countie againe, not sparing one place more than another: by reason whereof, as well abbets as all other churches and religious houses both in Haddington, in Edenborough, and thorough all other the parts of Louthian, where soeuer he came, were desaced and put to sacke. At length when he had accomplished his will, and so set things in order, he returned backe into England with the foresaid Edward Balioll in his companie, whome he kept with him, for doubt least he should reuel, and procure some new trouble. In the moneth of Iulie the duke of Lancaster being sent to the aid of the duke of Aquarre, came into Constantine, which is a portion of Normandie, & there ioined with the lord Philip of Aquarre, brother to the king of Aquarre, and with the lord Godfrie de Harecourt, the which being returned into France, and restored to the French kings fauour, was latelie againe reuelled, upon displeasure taken for the death of his nephew the lord John de Harecourt, as in the French histories ye may read more at large. They were in all about the number of foure thousand fighting men, and being assembled together, they went to Lisieure, to Dizec, to Ponteau, & rescued the castell there, which had bene besieged by the lord Robert de Hotetot master of the crossbowes in France, more than two moneths: but now hearing that the Englishmen and Pauarais approached, he departed from thence, leaving behind him for haile his engins and artillerie.

The duke of Lancaster passed forward vnto Breteuil, which he caused to be relieved and furnished with necessarie things as was conuenient. And then leaving the citie of Courceur, which was as then in the Frenchmens hands, latelie yielded to them after a long siege, he went forward with the lord Philip de Aquarre in companie till they came to Bernueil in Perch, and there took both the towne and castell, and robbed the towne and burnt a great part thereof. The French king, who had assembled a mightie armie, being aduertised of these matters, hasted forward towards the duke of Lancaster, fullie purposing to giue him battell. The duke and the lord Philip de Aquarre, hauing knowledge that the French king followed them, withdrew towards the towne of the Eagle, and the king still went after them, till he came to Liebenf two leages from the towne of the Eagle, and there it was shewed to him that he could not follow his enemies any further, by reason of the thicke forests, which he could not passe without great danger of his person and losse of his people. Then returned he with all his host, and took from the Pauarais the castell of Milliers, and also the castell of Breteuil, which was yielded to him after two moneths siege.

Frailard,
The prince of Wales inuaded the French dominions.

About the same time, that is to say, in Julie, the prince of Wales, having assembled an armie of men of warre, to the number of eight thousand, entered into the French dominions, and first passing through Auvergne, at length he came into the countie of Berrie, waisting and burning the townes and villages as he went, taking easie iournies for the better relafe of his people, and destruction of his enemies; for when he was entered into anie towne that was sufficientlie storied of things necessarie, he would tarie there two or three daies to refresh his soldiers and men of warre, and when they dislodged, they would strike out the heads of the wine vessels, and burne the wheat, oates and barlie, and all other things which they could not take with them, to the intent their enemies should not therewith be susteined and nourished.

After this, they came before the citie of Burgess, and there made a great skirmish at one of the gates, and there were manie feats of armes done. The host departed from thence, without doing anie more, and comming to a strong castell called Moldone, they fiercely assailed it, but could not win it: the gentlemen within defended the walles and gates so manfullie. When passed they forward, and came to Wierzon, a great towne and a good castell, but it was nothing stronglie fortified; and therefore was it wonne perforce, the people within it being not sufficient to resist the valiant puissance of the Englishmen. Here they found wine and other vittels in great plentie, and hereupon they taried there three daies to refresh themselves at ease. But before they departed, the prince had advertisement given him that the French king was come to Chartres, with an huge assemble of men of warre, and that all the townes and passages about the river of Loire were closed and kept. When was the prince counselled to returne and passe by Touraine and Poictou, and so that waie to Bourdeaux.

returneth.

The prince following their advice that thus counselled him, set forward toward Remozentine. The French king had sent into that countie to keepe the frontiers there, the lord of Craon, the lord Bonchivault, and the hermit of Chaumont, the which with three hundred men of armes had followed the Englishmen sir daies together, and could never find anie convenient occasion to set upon them: for the Englishmen governed themselves so sagelie, that their enemies could not lightlie assaile them, but to their owne disadvantage. One day the Frenchmen laid themselves close in an ambush nere to the towne of Remozentine, at a marvellous streit passage, by which the Englishmen must needs passe.

On the same daie there were departed from the prince's battell, by licence of the marshalls, certeine captains, Englishmen and Gascoignes, as the lord Bartholomew de Warghersee, or Burwalche (as some write him) the lord of Aquident Gascongne, monseigneur Petiton de Courton, the lord de la Mare, the lord Basset, sir Daniel Bassellew, sir Richard Bonchardon, sir Roell Loxing, the young lord Spenser, and two of the Danzeticourts, sir Edward, and another, who having with them two hundred men of armes, went forth to run before Remozentine, that they might view the place. They passed forth along by the Frenchmen which lay in ambush, as ye have heard, and they were not aduised of them, and they were no sooner passed, but that the Frenchmen brake out, and galloped after the Englishmen with great randon, having their speares in their rests.

The Englishmen and the Gascoignes hearing how they were come galloping after them, turned, and perceiving them to be their enemies, stood still to abide them. The Frenchmen couragiously gaue the charge, and the Englishmen as valiantlie defended them, so that there ensued a great skirmish, which continued a long while, so that it could not be easilie iudged who had the better, nor on which side the fortunate issue of the present conflict would then fall (so mutabilis alea Martis)

till that the battell of the English marshalls approached, the which when the Frenchmen saw comming by a wood side, they fled straightwaies towards Remozentine, and the Englishmen followed in chase so fast as their horses might beare them, and entered the towne with the Frenchmen: but the French lords and the one halfe of their companie got into the castell, and so saved themselves. The prince hearing what had happened, came into the towne, and there lodged that night, sending sir John Chandois to talke with the capitaines of the castell, to know if they would yeeld: and because they refused so to do, on the next morrow he caused his people to give an assault to the place, which continued the most part of the day, but yet missing their purpose, he commanded that they should draw to their lodgings, and rest them for that night.

In the morning as soone as the sunne was up, the marshalls caused the trumpets to sound, and those that were appointed to give the assault againe, prepared themselves to it. The prince himselfe was present personallie at this assault, so that the same was enforced to the uttermost: but when they saw that by assaults they could not win the castell, they devised engines, wherewith they cast wild fire into the base court, and so set it on fire, which increased in such vehement sort, that it took into the couering of a great tower, which was couered with reed: and then they within perceiving they must either yeeld or perish with fire, came downe and submitted themselves to the prince, who as prisoners received them. The castell of Remozentine being thus wonne and defaced with fire, the prince left it void, and marched forth with his armie as before, destroying the countie, and approached to Amboise and Touraine. The French king came forwards toward the prince, and at Amboise heard how the prince was in Touraine, meaning to returne through Poictou. He was daile advertised of the prince's doings by such as were appointed to coast him ever in his iourne.

Then came the king to Vaie in Touraine, and his people were passed the river of Loire at sundrie passages, where most convenientlie they might. They were in number twentie thousand men of armes, of noble men there were sir and twentie, dukes and earles, beside a great number of other lords and barons: the fourie sonnes of the king were there, as the lord Charles duke of Normandie, the lord Lewis after duke of Anjou, the lord John after duke of Berrie, and the lord Philip which was after duke of Burgongne. The French king doubting least the prince should escape by speedie iournies out of his countie, before he could come to give him battell, remoued to Chaunignie, and there passed the river of Creuse by the bridge, supposing that the Englishmen had bene before him, but they were not. Some of the Frenchmen taried behind at Chaunignie for one night, and in the morning followed the king. They were about two hundred men of armes under the leading of the lord Craon, the lord Raoul de Courie, and the earls of Joignie. They chanced so incounter with certeine of the auant courours of the English armie, which remoued that day from a little village fast by. Those Englishmen were not past three score men of armes, but well horsed, and therefore perceiving the great number of the Frenchmen, they fled towards the prince's battell, which they knew was not farre off. Capitaines of the Englishmen were two knights of Frenchmen distressed.

The Frenchmen beholding them in this wise to flee, rode after a maine, and as they followed in chase, they came on the princes battell before they were aware. The lord Maoull of Coucie went so far forward with his banner, that he entred under the princes banner, and fought right valiantlie, but yet he was there taken, and the earle of Joignie, also the viscount of Wyce, the lord Chauvignie, and diuerse other, so that the most part of those Frenchmen were either taken or slaine, and verie few escaped. The prince understood by the prisoners, that the French king was so farre advanced forward in pursute of him, that he could not auoid the battell. When he assembled his men together, and commanded them to keepe order, and so rode that day being saturdaye from morning till it was toward night, & then came within two leagues of Poitiers: and herewith sending forth certeine captains, to search if they could heare where the king was, he incamped himselfe that night in a strong place amongst hedges, vines, and bushes. They that were sent to discover the countrie, rode so far, that they saw where the French king with his great battell was marching, and setting by on the taile of the Frenchmen, caused all the host to stir: whereof knowledge being given to the king, the which as then was entring into Poitiers, he returned againe, and made all his host to do the like, so that it was verie late per he and his people were beset in their lodgings that night. The English curours returning to the prince, declared that they had seene and done. So, that night, the two armies being lodged within a small distance either of other, kept strong and sure watch about their campes.

The ordering of the French battell.

On the morrow after being sundae, and the eighteenth date of September, the French king caused his host to be divided into three battels or wards, and in each of them were sixtene thousand armed men, all mustered and passed for armed men. The first battell was gouerned by the duke of Orleans, wherein were six and thirtie banners, and twise as manie persons. The second was led by the duke of Borgerdie and his brethren, the lord Helmes & the lord John. The third the French king himselfe conducted. And while these battels were setting in arraye, the king caused the lord Eustace de Ribamont, and two other noble men to ride on before, to see the dealing of the Englishmen, and to aduise of what number they were. Those that were thus sent, rode forth and beheld the order of the Englishmen at good leisure: and returning, informed the king, that as they could lodge, the enemies were about two thousand men of armes, foure thousand archers, and fiftene hundred of others, and that they were lodged in such a strong place, and so well fenced with ditches and hedges, that it would be hard assaulting them therein.

The cardinal of Piergozt.

The cardinal of Piergozt the popes legat, as then lying in the citie of Poitiers, came that morning to the king, and required him to abstaine from battell, till he might understand whether the prince would condescend unto such conditions of peace as he himselfe should thinke reasonable, which if it might be brought to passe, the same should be more honorable for him, than to aduenture so manie noble men as were there with him at that present in hazard of battell. The king was contented that the cardinal should go to the prince, and see what he could do with him. The cardinal rode to the prince, and talked with him till he was contented to come to a treatie. The cardinal returned to the French king, and requested of him that a truce might be granted till the next daies sun-rising: which truce obtained, he spent that daie in riding to and fro betwixt them.

The prince of Wales contented to come to a treatie.

The prince offered to render into the kings hands all that he had wonne in that volage, as well townes as castels, and also to release all the prisoners, which he or any of his men had taken in that tournee: and further he was contented to haue bene sworn not to beare armour against the French king within the terme of seuen yeares next following. But the French king would not agree therunto: the uttermost that he would agree unto, was this, that the prince and an hundred of his knights should yield themselves as prisoners unto him, otherwile he would not haue the matter taken up. But it was the French kings hap after (notwithstanding his hautes) to be taken captiue, as Okland noteth, saying, seruilia sub iuga missus

Discret ut domino regi parere Britanno.

But the prince in no wise could be brought to any such unreasonable conditions, and so the cardinal could not make them friends, although he travelled earnestlie betwixt them all that daie. When it drew towards night, he returned toward Poitiers.

The Englishmen were not idle, whilst the cardinal was thus in hand to bring the parties to some good agreement, but cast great ditches, and made hedges, and other fortifications about the place where their archers stood, and on the next morning, being mondaie, the prince and his people prepared themselves to receive battell, as they had done before, having passed the day before and that night in great defect of necessarie things, for they could not stir abroad to fetch forrage or other provisions without danger to be surprised of their enemies. The cardinal came againe earlie in the morning unto the French king, and found the French armie ready in order of battell by that time the sunne was up, and though he offered to sell in hand to exhort the king to an agreement, yet it would not be. So he went to the prince, and declared to him how he could do no good in the matter, and therefore he must abide the hazard of battell, for ought that he could see: wherewith the prince was content, and so the cardinal returned into Poitiers.

There is to be remembered, that when (as Thomas Walsingham writeth) this cardinal of Piergozt was sent from the pope to traine betwixt the parties for a peace to be had, and that the pope exhorted him verie earnestlie to shew his uttermost diligence and indouour therein: at his setting forth to go on that message, the said cardinal (as was said) made this answer: Spott blessed father (said he) either we will persuade them to peace and quietnesse, either else shall the verie Christians crye out of it. What this he spake not of himselfe, as it was supposed, but being a prelate in that time, he prophesied what should follow: for when the English at Poitiers had befallen all their arrows upon their enemies, they take up pebles from the place wher they stood, being full of those kind of bones, and applying to their enemies, they threw the same with such violence on them, that lighted against their helmets, armor, and targets, they made a great ringing noise, so that the cardinals prophesie was fulfilled, that he would either persuade a peace, or else the Christians should crye out thereof.

The mostie prince like a courageous chieftaine, when he saw that he must needs fight, required his people not to be abashed at the great number of their enemies, with the which he did not consist in the multitude of men, but where God would send it: and if it fortuned that the tournee might be theirs and his, they should be the most honored people of the world: and if they should die in that righteous quarrell, he had the king his father and also his brethren, in like case as they had friends and kinsmen, that would take their reuenge. And therefore he desired them that that due to them themselves like valiant men of warre; and for his part he trusted in God and Saint George, they should be in his power no less than these of the like words did this most gentle prince speak, which greatly comforted all his people.

There were with him at earles, barons, knights, folke, Salisbury, Stafford, of lords, Cobham, Spenser, Audley, Berkeley, Walter, Gyllen, de la Zate, Wadellon, Burtois, Felton, Malloy, and diuerse other: also sir John Chandos, by whom he was much counselled, sir Richard Stafford, sir Richard of Benbury, and manie other knights and valiant equeires of England. Moreover, there was of Gascoigne, the capitall of Bur or Beuf, the lords of Brumes, Buguenrie, Chaumont, de Lelpare, Kolen, Goussierant, Landuras, the Countess of Le strad of Lescard, and other: and of Heinaut, sir Co face Dauberticourt, sir John de Busselles, and o ther strangers. All the princes companie passed not the number of eight thousand men one and other, of the which as Iacobus Meir saith, three thousand were archers: though Froissard (as I haue rehearsed be fore) reporteth the number of archers to be more, as in one place six thousand, and in an other place four thousand.

The French king hauing in his armie three scoie thousand fighting men, whereof there were more than three thousand knights, made so sure account of vic toire, as anie man might of a thing not yet had, con sidering his great puissance, in regard to the small number of his aduersaries: and therefore immedi atlie after that the cardinall was departed, he caused his battels to march forward, and approaching to the place where the Englishmen stood readie to receiue their enemies, caused the onset to be giuen. There were certeine French horsemen, to the number of three hundred, with the Almaines also on horsebacke appointed to breake the arraie of the English ar chers, but the archers were so defended and compas sed about with hedges and ditches, that the horse men of the French part could not enter to do their feat, and being galled with the sharpe shot of the English bowes, they were ouerthrowne horse and man, so that the batward of the Frenchmen, wherein was the duke of Athens, with the marshalls called France, the lord John de Cleremont, and the lord Arnold Dandzehen or Ddenhen, began to disorder within a while, by reason of the shot of the archers, to giue with the helpe of the men of armes, amongst whom in the forefront was the lord James Audley, to performe a vow which he had made, to be one of the first setters on.

There was the lord Arnold Dandzehen taken pri soner, and the lord John de Cleremont slaine, so that the noble probesse of the said lord James Audley, breaking through the Frenchmens battell with the slaughter of manie enemies, was that day most ap parant. The losall constancie of the noble earles of Warwicke and Suffolke, that fought so stoutlie, so earnestlie, and so fiercelie, was right manifest. And the prince himselfe did not onelie fulfill the office of a noble cheefteine, but also of a right valiant and ex pert souldiour, attempting what sooner any other hardie warrior would in such cases haue done. Yet ther was this battell quicklie dispatched, noz easilie brought to end; but it was fought out with such ob stinate earnestnesse, that three times that date were the Englishmen diuine to renew the fight, through the multitude of enemies that increased and came still vpon them.

Finallie, the marshalls battell was quite discom fited: for the Frenchmen and Almaines fell one vpon an other, and could not passe forth; and those that were behind, could not get forward, reculed backe:

and when the marshalls battell being on horsebacke hauing killed the Englishmen with great disaduan tage, and was in the end beaten backe, the king bat telle of the which of Rouen and Calcutt came forward, and likewise smitten the Englishmen, but could not preuaile. The archers shot so fiercelie, that to conclude the Frenchmen behing, vnderstanding the discomfite of the marshalls battell, and how their followers before could not enter vpon their enemies, they opened and ran to the horsemen, in whom they did put more trust for their safegard by galloping on then afoot, than in their manlike hands, for all their late braverie and great boasts. One thing more dis couraged the Frenchmen, that was this, that the those Englishmen that were within the cloies of their campe, there were certeine men of armes on horsebacke, with a number of archers also on horse backe, appointed to coast vnder the count of a mou taine, adioining to the place, where they thought to strike into a fide of the duke of Aquitaines battell, so that with the feruour hereof, and with the contin all shot of the English archers, the Frenchmen not knowing where to turne themselves, sought to saue their liues by flight.

The prince of Wales, perceiving how his enemies (for the more part of them) were fleeing awaie as men discomfited, sent out his horsemen as well on the one hand as on the other, and he himselfe with his whole power of footmen rushed forth, and manfullie assailed the maine battell of the Frenchmen, where the king himselfe was, who like a valiant prince would not flee, but fought right manfullie: so that if the fourth part of his men had done halfe their parts as he did his, the victorie by likelihood had rested (as Froissard saith) on his side: but he was forsaken of his three sonnes, and of his brother the duke of Ayle ance, which fled out of the battell with cleare hands.
Finallie, after huge slaughter made of those noble men, and other which abode with him even to the end, he was taken, and so likewise was his pongest sonne Phillip, and both put in great danger to haue bene murthered after they were taken, by the English men and Gascoignes, struing who should haue the king to his prisoner, where in deed a knight of Flan ders or rather Artois, borne in saint Omers, called sir Denise Doybecke, took him, but he was straight waies taken from the same sir Denise by other that came in the meane season, better provided (belike) of strength, and lead him awaie vncursed.

There were slaine in this battell, of noblemen, the dukes of Burbon and Athens, the marshall Cleme mont, sir Geoffrey Charnie that bare the cheefe stan dert of France, the bishop of Chalons, sir Cusace de Ribamont, with diuerse other to the number of eight hundred lords, knights, and gentlemen of name. In all there died on the French part six thou sand of one and other. The chase was continued euen to the gates of Poitiers, and manie slaine and bea ten downe in the street before the gates, which the ci tizens had closed, for doubt least the Englishmen should enter with them that fled thither for safegard.
There were taken besides the king and his sonne, the lord Jaques de Burbon earle of Douthen, brother to the duke of Burbon that was slaine there, the erle of Ew, the lord Charles his brother earle of Long uile, the archbishop of Sens, the earles of Wandosme, Salesburgh, Wentadoze, Tankerville, Estampes, and Dampmartine: also Archembald Doyglas a noble man of Scotland, sonne to the honorable lord William Doyglas that was killed in Spaine, the marshall Dandzehen or Ddenhen (as Iacobus Meir saith) with others to the number of seuentene hundred earles, lords, knights, and gentlemen, be side those of the meane sort; so that the Englishmen

The meeke and comfortable oration of the English prince to the French king being taken prisoner.

Most noble king, there is no cause wherefore your grace should be pensive, though God this day did not consent to follow your will.
For your noble prowess and dignitie totall, with the supreme tyte of your kinglie maiestie, remaineth whole and inviolate, and what soever may rightlie be called yours; so that no violent force of time shall blot out or diminish the same. The almightie God hath determined that the chauce of war shall rest in his disposition and will as all other things. Your elders haue atchieued both by land & sea manie noble ences-pises. The whole compasse of Europe, all the east parts of the world, all places and countreies, both far & nere, are full of monuments, witnessing the noble victories attained by the French people.

The cause of goodlie liuing and religion, the dignitie and prebeminence of christia-nitie hath bene defended and augmented by you, against the most mightie and puissant capteins of the infidels, enemies to the said christian religion. All ages shall make mention of your worzhie praises, no nation there is but shall confesse it selfe bounden at one time or other for benefits receiued at your hands; nether is there any people but such as hope to be hereafter bounden to you for reliefe and benefits, to proceed from you in time to come. One or two battels happilie haue chanced among so manie triumphs otherwise than you would haue wished; chance would it should be so, which may inflexible and make weake the power of hostes, armor, and weapon; your inuincible courage and roiall magnanimitie lieth in your power to reteine; neither shall this day take any thing from you or yours. And this realme of France which hath procreat and brought forth and noxi-ded to many of my noble progenitors, than extreme in good meaning towards her, as for the trust of mine elders, and toward your majestie, if you will vouchsafe that I should glorie in that name, a most humble kindman. There are many occasions of loue and friendship betwixt you and my father, which I trust shall take place, for I know all his thoughts, and inward meanings: you shall agree and come to an attachment right easilie together, & I pray God he neuer take me for his sonne, except I have you in the same degree of honor, re-uerence, and faithfull loue, which I owe towards him.

20 The king (as reason would) acknowledged this to proceed of great heartesse shewed toward him in the prince, and thanked him accordingly. And the prince performing in deed that which he spake with word, The french ceased from further bling of fire, & other indama-ging of the french dominions; and taking his waie through the countreies of Poictou and Saintonge, by easie iournies, he and his people came to Blate, and to passed ouer the water to Burdeaur in good safetie with all their riches and prisoners. The prince gave to the lord James Aubelie (who had receiued in the battell manie sore wounds) fise hundred marks 30 of pearellie reuenues assigned forth of his lands in England. The which gift the knight granted as frelie as he had receiued it vnto foure of his esquiers, which in the battell had bene euer attendant about his person, without whose aid & valiant support, he knew well that he had bene slaine sundrie times in the same battell by his enemies, and therefore thought it a dutie of humanitie and gratitude to make them a friends with some tempozall recompense, that had saved his life, than the which nothing is more deere, 40 nor of greater price in the world, as the poet saith, nihil est vita pretiosius ipsa.

When the prince heard that he had so done, he marvelled what his meaning was therby, and caused him to be brought before his presence, and demanded of him wherefore he had so lightlie giuen awaie that reward which he had bestowed upon him, and whether he thought that gift too meane for him or not. The lord Audelie so excused himselfe in extolling the good seruice done to him by his esquires, through 50 whome he had so manie times escaped the dangers of death, that the prince did not onelie confirme the resignation of the five hundred marks giuen to the esquires, but also rewarded the lord Audelie with six hundred marks more of like yearelie reuenues, in maner and forme as he had receiued the other.

When the newes of this great victorie came into England of the overthrow of the Frenchmen, and taking of the French king, ye may be sure there was great ioy shewed by outward tokens, as bonfires made, feasts and bankets kept, thzough the whole realme. Likewise the Gascoignes and Englishmen being come to Burdeaux, made great reuell and pastime there, spending freelie that gold and siluer which they had wonne in the battell of Poitiers, and elsewhere in that iournie. ¶ This yeare in Aprill the prince of Wales took shipping with his prisoners at Burdeaux, and on the first of Maie arriued at Paimouth. On the foure and twentieth day of Maie he was with great honour iostfullie receiued of the citizens into the citie of London, and so conuied to the palace of Westminster, where the king sitting in Westminster hall, receiued the French king, and after conueied him to a lodging appointed for him, where he laie a season; but after he was removed to the the Hauoie, which was at that time a goodlie house, pertaining to the duke of Lancaster, though afterwards it was burnt and destroyed by Wat Tyler, Jacke Straw, and their companie. In this place the French king late, and kept house a long time after.

In the winter following were rotall iustices holden in Smithfield, at the which were present the kings of England, France, and Scotland, with manie great estates of all their three kingdoms, of the which the more part of the strangers were as then prisoners. It was reported, that the French king could not so dissemble nor cloake his inward thought, but that there appeared some tokens of græce in his countenance, whilste he beheld these warlike pastimes. And when the king of England, & his sonne prince Edward with comfortable words required him after supper to put all pensive cares out of his fantasie, and to be merrie and sing as other did, he should make this answer with a smiling countenance, alluding to the complaint of the Israelites in time of their captiuitie vnder the gentiles, & saieing, Quomodo cantabimus canticum in terra aliena?

About the same time there came ouer into England two cardinals, the one called Calixtus being bishop of Alba (commonlie named the cardinal of Perregos); and the other named Nicholas intituled cardinal of S. Vitale or (as Froissard saith) of Dargell, they were sent from pope Innocent the first, to intreat for a peace betwixt the kings of England and France; but they could not bring their purpose to any perfect conclusion, although they remained here for the space of two yeares; but yet onelie by good means they procured a truce betwene the said kings, and all their assistants, to indure from the time of the publication thereof, vnto the feast of S. John Baptist, which should be in the yeare 1359: out of the which truce was excepted the L. Philip of Flandres, and his alies, the countesse of Flanders, and the whole duchie of Britaine.

Anon after, the French king was removed from the Hauoie vnto the castell of Windsor with all his household, and then he went on hunting and hauing there about at his pleasure, and the lord Philip his sonne with him, all the residue of the prisoners abode still at London, but were suffered to go by and dole, and to come to the court when they would. In the same yeare the duke of Lancaster besieged the citie of Kenes in Britaine, in the title of the countesse of Richmond, & his young sonne John of Pontfort, that claimed to be duke of Britaine. Those that were within the citie, as the vicount of Rohan, and Bertham de Claiquin (who as then was a lustie young bachelor) and others defended themselves manfully for a time, but yet at length they were compelled to render the citie into their enemies hands.

About the same time two Franciscane friers were burnt at London, for matters of religion. Pope ouer quene Isabel, mother vnto king Edward the third, departed this life the seauen and twentieth daie of August, and was buried the seauen and twentieth daie of September, in the church of the friers minors at London, not yet dedicated. David king of Scotland, wherlie after the truce was concluded betwixt England and France, was set at libertie, paying for his ransome the summe of one hundred thousand marks (as Fournon saith) but whether he meant Scottish or sterling monie, I cannot saie. He also was bound by covenant now vpon his deliuerance, to cause the castles in Pidesdale to be raised, which were knowne to be euill neighbors to the English borderers, as Dunfrise, Dalwinton, Spott, Dunferme, and nine other.

His wife quene Ione made such earnest sute to his brother king Edward for his husbands deliuerance, that king Edward was contented to release him vpon the payment of so small a portion of monie, and performance of the covenants, for the raising of those castles; although Froissard saith, that he was covenanted to paie for his deliuerance within the tearme of ten yeares, five hundred thousand nobles, and for certie of that payment to send into England sufficient hostages, as the earles of Douglas, Murray, Mar, Sutherland, and Fife, the baron of Wescie, and sir William Camoisse. Also he covenanted neuer to weare armour against king Edward, within his realme of England, nor to consent that his subjects should so do: and further should vpon his returne home, do the best he could to cause the Scots to agree that their countrie should hold of him in fee, and that he and his successors, kings of Scotland, should do homage to the king of England, and his successors for the realme of Scotland.

In this two and thirtieth yeare, as witneseth the French chronicles, sir Robert Knolles, James Dipe, and one Thomlin Foulke, with other capitaines and men of warre as souldiours to the king of Flandres vpon the tenth day of March earlie in the morning scaled the walles of the citie of Auxerre, and beheaded them so manfully, that they were masters of the towne before the sunne was vp. They got exceedingly much by the spoile of that citie, and by ransoming the prisoners which they took there. At length after they had remained eight daies in that citie, and taken their pleasures of all things within it, they wrought so with the citizens, that to haue possession of their citie againe, and to haue it saved from fire, they agreed to giue to sir Robert Knolles, and to his companie, fiftie thousand motons of gold, which amounted to the summe of twelue thousand and five hundred pounds sterling or there about; and yet was it agreed, that the Englishmen should burne the gates, and throwe downe the walles in diuers places. In April next ensuing, the towne of Daubignie sir le Petre was likewise wone by the Englishmen; and the second daie of Maie Chastellon sir Loigne was taken by the said sir Robert Knolles, and put to sacke as the other were. From thence they went to Newcastle vpon Loire. Thus did the Englishmen and other, in title of the L. of Flandres, greatly indamage the realme of France, daile winning townes and castles, ransoming the people, and wasting the countries in most miserable wise, as in the historie of France you may read more at large.

In this meane while there was talke of peace betwixt the king of England, and the king of France, and articles thereof draue in this forme, that the whole countries of Gascoine, Guien, Poitou, Touraine, Raintonge, Piergourd, Quercie, Limosin, Angoulmois, Calis, Guines, Bullogne, and Ponthieu, should remaine to the king of England wholte without doing homage or paying anye relæse for the same: but on the other part, he should renounce all his right, which he might by anye manner of meane claime to the countries of Normandie, Anjou, or Maine. And further, that the French king should paie a certie summe of monie for his ransome, and deliuer sufficient pledges for the same, and so depart into France. These articles were sent ouer into France, that the three states there might confirme them, which they refused to do. Wherevpon when the truce ended, the warres were againe renewed. The king held this yeare the feast of S. George at Windsor; in more sumptuous manner than euer it had bene kept before.

In the same yeare also, frier John Lisle bishop of Elic, being (as he took it) somewhat wronged by the ladie Blanch de Wake, and other that were of his counsell, when the last yere against the kings will unto the popes court, where exhibiting his complaint, he caused the pope to excommunicate all his adversaries, sending to the bishop of Lincolne and other of the cleargie, that if they knew any of them so excommunicated to be dead and buried, they should draw them out of their graues: which was done.

And because some of those that were excommunicated were of the kings counsell, the king took such displeasure therewith, that he grauously disquieted the prelats. Whereupon there were sent from the court of Rome on the behalf of the bishop of Elic, certaine persons, which being armed, met the bishop of Rochester lord treasurer, delivering to him letters from the pope, the contents of the which were not knownen, and forthwith they shanke a waite: but the kings seruants made such pursue after them, that some of them they took, and bringing them before the kings iustices, vpon their arraignment they were condemned, and suffered death on the gallows.

Great discord rose also about this time, or rather afore, betwixt the cleargie, and the four orders of friars, as in the booke of acts & monuments set forth by master John Fox ye may read more at large. In this yere John of Gant earle of Richmond, come to the king, the nineteenth day of Maie married the ladie Blanch daughter to Henrie duke of Lancaster at Reading; and because they were cousins within the degrees of consanguinitie, forbidden by the church lawes to marrie, a dispensation was procured of the pope to remoue that obstacle and let. In this yere the king set workemen in hand to take downe much old bildings belonging to the castell of Wind-sore, and caused diuerse other faire and sumptuous works to be erected and set vp, in and about the same castell, so that almost all the masons and carpenters that were of any accompt within this land, were sent for, and imployed about the same works, the ouerser whereof was William Wickham the kings chaplain, by whose aduise the king took in hand to repare that place, the rather in deed because he was borne there, and therefore he took great pleasure to bestow cost in beautifying it with such buildings, as may ap-peare euen vnto this daie. Moreover, this yere in the Rogation wake was solemn iusts enterprised at London, for the maior and his four and twentie brethren as challengers did appoint to answer all comers, in whose name and stead the king with his four sonnes, Edward, Lionel, John, and Edmund, and nineteene other great lords, in secret manner came and held the field with hono, to the great pleasure of the citizens that beheld the same. ¶ We haue heard how the Frenchmen refused the peace, which was accorded betwixt k. Edward & their king, as then prisoner here in England. Whereupon k. Edward determined to make such warre against the realme of France, that the Frenchmen with all their harts should be glad to condescend and agree to reason: and first he commanded all manner of Frenchmen (other than such as were prisoners) to auoid out of England. He also appointed the French king to be remoued from the castell of Hertford, where he then remained, vnto the castell of Somerton in Lincolneshire, vnder the gard and conduct of the lord William Deincourt, being allowed fourtie shillings the day for the wages of two and twentie men at armes, twentie archers, & two watchmen: as thus, for himselfe and sir John Kirketon baronets, either of them four shillings the daie; for three knights, sir William Collevill (in place of the lord Robert Collevill, that could not trauell himselfe by reason of sickness) sir John Deincourt, and sir Sacre de Rochfort, ech of them two shillings the daie; seuentene esquiers ech of them twelue pence the day, eight archers on horse backe curie of them six pence the day, and twelue archers on foot three pence, and the two watchmen either of them six pence the day, which amounteth in the whole vnto nine and thirtie shillings the day; and the od twelue pence was allowed to the said lord Deincourt to make vp the summe of 40 shillings. ¶ This haue I noted the rather, to giue a light to the reader to consider how chargeable the retaining of men of war in these daies is, in respect of the former times, But now to our purpose.

The king meaning to passe ouer himselfe in person into France, caused a mightie armie to be mustered and put in a readinesse, and sent before him the duke of Lancaster ouer to Calis with foure hundred speares, and two thousand archers, where the said duke joined with such strangers as were alreadie come to Calis in great numbers, and togither with them entered into the French dominions, and passing by saint Omers & Bethune, came to Pount saint Cloie, a goodlie abbey and a rich, two leagues distant from Arras, and there the host tarried foure daies, and when they had robbed and wasted all the countrie thereabout, they rode to Waile, and there made a great assault, at the which a baronet of England was slaine with diuerse other. When the Englishmen saw they could win nothing there, they departed, and following the water of Some, came to a towne called Cherlie, where they passed the riuer, and there tarried Alhallowen daie, & the night following.

On the same daie the duke of Lancaster was aduertised, that the king was arrived at Calis the seuenteenth daie of October, commanding him by letters to draw towards him with all his companie.
The duke according to the kings commandement obedied, and so returned toward Calis. The king being there arrived with all his power, took counsell which way he should take. Some aduised him first to inuade Flanders, and to reuenge the inurious dealing of the earle and the Flemings: but he would not agree to that motion, for he purposed fullie either by plaine force to make a conquest of France, or else to terrie to destruye and wast the countrie throughout with fier and sword. Whereupon he set forwards the fourth of Nouember, and passing through the countries of Arthois, and Wermendois, he came before the citie of Reims. There went ouer with him in this iournie, & with the duke of Lancaster, his four sonnes, Edward prince of Wales, Lionel earle of Ulster, John earle of Richmond, and the lord Edmund his yongest sonne. Also there was Henrie the said duke of Lancaster, with the earles of March, Warwicke, Suffolke, Hereford (who also was earle of Northampton) Salisburie, Stafford, and Oxford, the bishops of Lincolne, and Durham, and the lords Berke, Beuill, Spenser, Kirkibson, Kosse, Pannie, Cobham, Botobray, de la Mare, Willoughbie, Felton, Basset, Fitzwater, Charleton, Audelie, War-watch, and others, beside knights and esquiers, as sir John Chandois, sir Stephan Goullanton, sir Rowell Loxing, sir Hugh Hastings, sir John Wille, sir Richard Pemburze, and others.

The siege was laid before Reims about saint Andrewes tide, and continued more than seuen weekes: but the citie was so well defended by the bishop and the earle of Porcien, and other capitaines within it, that the Englishmen could not obtaine their purpose, and so at length, when they could not haue forrage nor other necessarie things abroad in the coun-trie for to serue their turne, the king raised his field, and departed with his armie in god order of battell, taking the way through Champaigne, and so passed by Chaalons, and after to Perrie on the riuer of

After the king had rested there fixe dates, and that his men were well refreshed with the wines and other such things, which they found in that towne in good plenty, he remoued and dreyd towards Burgonie, coming to a towne called Guillon or Aguilon, where he lay from Thursday vnto Friday, having good provision of all manner of vittels by the means of an esquier of his called John Alanfon, which had taken the towne of Flaignic not farre thence, wherein was great store of bread and wine and other vittels: and still the marshals rode forth, and oftentimes refreshed the host with new provision. The Englishmen had with them in their carriages, tents, pavillions, milles, ouens, and forges; also boates of leather cunninglie made and deuised, able to receiue three men a pece, and to passe them ouer waters and riuers. They had at the least six thousand carts with them, and for euerie cart foure horses which they had out of England.

In this meane while, the Frenchmen made certeine beffels forth to the sea, vnder the gouernance of the earle of St. Paule, the which vpon the fiftieth daie of March landed earlie in the morning at Winchellie, and before sunne rising entred the towne, and finding the inhabitants vnprovidid to make anie great resistance, fell to and sacked the houses, flue manie men, women and also childzen, and after set fier on the towne; and vpon knowledg had that the people of the countie next adioining were assembled, and comming to the rescue, he caused his men to draw to their ships, and so they taking their pillage and spoile with them, got them aboard, not without some losse of their companie, which were slaine in the towne by such as resisted their violence. Whiles the king laie at Aguilon, there came to him Ansaume de Salians chancelor of Burgonie, Jacques de Vienne, and other lordes of the countie, being sent from their duke, to agree with the king for the sparing of the lands and seignories appertaining to the duchie of Burgonie.

The chancelor, and the other Burgognian lordes found the king so agreeable to their request, that a composition was made betwixt him and the countie of Burgonie, so that he should make to them an assurance for him, and all his people, not to ouerrun or indamage that countie, during the space of three yeres, and he to haue in readie monie the summe of two hundred thousand flozens of gold, which sterling monie amounted to the summe of fixe and thirtie thousand pounds. When this agreement was ingrossed vp in writing, and sealed, the king dislodged, and all his host, taking the right waie to Paris, and passing the riuer of Ponne, entered into Castinois, and at length by easie iournies, vpon a tuesday being the last of March in the weeke before Easter, he came and lodged betwene Pont le Herie, and Chartres, with his people in the countie thereabouts.

Here the duke of Normandie made meanes for a treatie of peace, which was laboured by a frier called Simon de Langres prouinciall of the friers Jacobins and the popes legat: he did so much, that a treatie was appointed to be holden on good friday in the palcedrie of Longegimew, where appeared for the king of England the duke of Lancaster, the erls of Warwike and Northampton, with sir John Chandois, sir Walter de Manny, and sir William Cheinie knights: and for the French king thither came the earle of Gu constable of France, and the marshall Bouciquant, with other; but their treatie came to none effect: wherefore the king vpon the tuesday in the Easter weeke remoued nether vnto Paris, and vpon the friday following, being the tenth of April, by procurement of the abbat of Clugnie newlie come from pope Innocent the first, the foresaid commissioners esloones did meet to treat of an agreement, but nothing they could conclude, the parties in their offers and demands were so farre at ods.

Vpon the sundaie next following, a part of the kings hoste came before the cite of Paris, and inhabited themselves in a field fast by saint Marcellus, abiding there fro morning till thre of the clocke in the after none, to see if the Frenchmen would come forth to giue battell: but the French would not taste of that beffell. For the duke of Normandie (well considering what losse had ensued within few yeres past vnto the realme of France, by giuing battell to the Englishmen, and taught by late triall and feeling of smart to dread imminent danger, for would not suffer anie of his people to issue forth of the gates, but commanded them to be readie onelie to defend the walles and gates, although he had a great power of men of warre within the cite, beside the huge multitude of the inhabitants. The Englishmen to prouoke their enemies the soner to saile forth, burnt diuerse parts of the suburbs, and rode cuen to the gates of the cite. When they perceived that the Frenchmen would not come forth, about thre of the clocke in the afternone they departed out of the field and withdrew to their campe, and then the king and all the English host remoued towards Chartres, and was lodged at a place called Dones. Thither came to him the bishop of Beaumont then chancelor of Normandie, with other, and so handled the matter with him, that a new daie of treatie was appointed to be holden at Bretignie, which is litle more than a mile distant from Chartres, vpon the first day of Maie next ensuing.

In which daie and place appointed, the foresaid duke of Lancaster, and the said earles and other commissioners met with the said bishop, and other French lords and spirituall men to him allocated, on the behalfe of the duke of Normandie then regent of France, to renew the former communication of peace, in full hope to bring it to a good conclusion; but cause king Edward began to frame his imagination more to accord with his aduersaries, than he had done of late, chiefelie for that the duke of Lancaster with courteous words and sage persuasions, aduised him not to forsake such reasonable conditions as the Frenchmen were contented now to agree vnto, sith that by making such manner of warre as he had attempted, his soldiers onelie gained, and he himselfe lost but time, and consumed his treasures and further he might warre in this sort all the daies of his life, before he could attaine to his intent, and lose perhaps in one daie more than he had gained in twentie yeres.

Such words spoken for the wealth of the king and his subiects, conuerted the kings mind to fanse peace, namelie by the grace of the Holie-ghost chiefe woorker in this case. For it chanced on a daie, as he was marching not farre from Chartres, there came such a storme and tempest of thunder, lightening, haile and raine, as the like had neuer bene scene by anie of the English people. This storme fell so hideous in the kings host, that it seemed the world should haue ended: for such vnreasonable great stones of haile fell from the skie, that men and horses were slaine therewith, so that the most hardie were abashed. There perished thousands thereby, as some have written. Then the king rememb'ring what reasonable offers of agreement he had refused, upon remorse of conscience (as by some writers should appeare) asked forgiveness of the damage done by sword and fire in those parts, and shalbe determined to grant unto indifferent articles of peace, for release of the christian inhabitants of that land: and so shortly after, by the good diligence of the commissioners on both parts, an unitie and final peace was accorded, the conditions whereof were compiled in fortie and one articles, the chiefe thereof in effect were these.

1 First that the king of England should haue and enioy (ouer and beside that which he held already in Gascoigne and Guien) the castell, citie, and countie of Poitiers, and all the lands and countrie of Poitou, with the fee of Tonnars, and the lands of Belleuile; the citie and castell of Raintes, and all the lands and countrie of Raondonge on both sides the riuer of Charent, with the towne and fortreffe of Rochell, with their appurtenances; the citie and castell of Agenois; the citie and castell of Bergerot, and all the land and countrie of Perigueur; the citie and castell of Limoges, and all the lands and countrie of Limosin; the citie and castell of Cahors, and the lordship of Cahorsin; the castell and countrie of Tarbe; the lands countrie and countie of Bigorre; the countie, countrie, and lands of Gaure; the citie and castell of Angoleme; and the countie, land, and countrie of Angolemois; the citie, towne and castell of Rodair; and all the countie, and countrie of Rouergne; and if there were in the dukie of Guien any lords, as the earles of Foiz, Armynache, Alisc, and Perigueur, the vicounts of Carmain, and Limoges, or other holding any lands within the foresaid bounds, it was accorded that they should do homage and other custumarie seruices due for the same unto the king of England.

2 It was also agreed, that Calis and Guines, with the appurtenances, the lands of Pontrenill on the sea with the countie of Ponthieu, wholie and entirle should remaine unto the king of England. All the which countreies, citie, townes, and castels, with the other lands and seignories, the same king should haue and hold to him and his heires for ever, even as they were in demaine or fee, immediatlie of God, and free without recognizing any maner souereintie to any earthly man. In consideration whereof, king Edward renounced all such claimes, titles and interest as he pretended unto any part of France, other than such as were comprised within the charter of covenants of this peace first agreed upon at Bretigne aforesaid, and after confirmed at Calis, as appeareth by the same charter dated there the foure & twentieth daie of October, in the peare of our Lord 1360.

3 It was also covenanted, that the French king should paie unto the king of England thirtie hundred thousand crownes in name of his ransom: for assurance of which payment, & performance of all the covenants aforesaid mentioned, and other agreed upon by this peace, the dukes of Breance, Anion, Berrie, and Wurbon, with diuerse other honorable personages, as earles, lords, and burgesses of euerie good towne, some were appointed to be sent ouer hither into England to remaine as hosages.

4 It was further agreed, that neither the French king nor his successors should aid the Scots against the king of England or his successors; nor that king Edward nor his heirs kings of England should aid the Flemings against the crowne of France.

5 And as for the title or right of the dukie of Britaine, which was in question betwene the earles of Blois and Mountfort, it was accorded, that both kings being at Calis, the parties should be called before them, and if the two kings could not make them friends, then should they assigne certeine indifferent persons to agree them, and they to haue halfe a yeeres respit to end the matter: and if within that terme those that should be so appointed to agree them, could not take by the matter betwixt the said earles, then either of the might make the best purchase for himselfe that he could, by helpe of friends, or otherwise; but alwaies provided, that neither of the kings nor their sonnes should so aid the said earles, whereby the peace accorded betwixt England and France, might by any meanes be broken or infringed. Also, to whether of the said earles the dukie of Britaine in the end chanced to fall by sentence of iudges, or otherwise, the homage should be done for the same unto the French king.

All these ordinances, articles and agreements, with manie mo (which here would be too long to rehearse) were accorded and ratified by the instruments and seales of the prince of Wales on the one part, and of the duke of Normandie regent of France on the other part, as by their letters patents then sealed further appeared, bearing date, the one at Loures in Normandie the sixteenth daie of Maie in the peare of Grace 1360, and the other at Paris the tenth day of the same moneth, and in the peare aforesaid.ouer & beside this, both the said princes toke on them a solemne oth, to see all the same articles and covenants of agreement thoroughlie kept, mainteined and performed. This done, king Edward imbarbed himselfe with his four sonnes and the most part of his nobles at Hunden the twentieth daie of Maie, and so sailed into England, leauing behind him the earle of Marbrike to haue the gouernement of all the men of warre which he left behind him, either in Guien or in any other place on that side the sea.

Where died in this iourne diuerse noble men of this land, as the earles of March and Wyford, the lord John Graie then steward of England, and the lord Geoffrey de Saie, with diuerse other. The eight of Julie next ensuing, the French king hauing licence to depart, landed at Calis, and was lodged in the castell there, abiding till the king of England came thither, which was not till the ninth day of October next after. On the foure and twentieth daie of October, both the kings being in two traucers and one chappell at Calis, a masse was said before them, and when they should haue kissed the par, either of them in signe of greater friendship killed the other, & there they were solemnelie swozne to mainteine the articles of the same peace; and for moze assurance thereof, manie lords of both parts were likewise swozne to mainteine the same articles to the bittermost of their powers. Whilste these kings late thus at Calis, there was great banquetting and chere made betwixt them.

Also the duke of Normandie came from Bullongne to Calis, to visit his father, and to see the king of England, in which meane time two of king Edwards sonnes were at Bullongne. Finallie, when these two kings had finished all matters in so good order and forme that the same could not be amended nor corrected, and that the French king had deliuered his hosages to the king of England, that is to saie, six dukes, beside earles, lords, and other honorable personages, in all to the number of eight and thirtie: on the morrow after the taking of their othes, that is to saie on the five and twentieth daie of October, being sundaie, the French king was shels deliuered, and the same daie before none he departed from Calis, and rode to Bullongne. The king of England brought him a male foreward on his waie, and then toke leaue of him in most louing maner. The prince atten-attended him to Ballongne, where both he and the duke of Normandie with other were effrons swoone to hold and mainteine the foresaid peace without all fraud or colourable deceit: and this done, the prince returned to Calis. Thus was the French king set at libertie, after he had bene prisoner here in England the space of foure yeares, and as much as from the nineteenth daie of September, unto the five and twentieth of October. When the king of England had finished his businesse at Calis, according to his mind, he returned into England, and came to London the ninth daie of November.

Thus haue we hard the originall beginning, the procelle, and issue of sundrie conflicts and battels, and speciallie of two, one of John the French king vnluckilie attempted against England; the other of David the Scottish king as vnforsunately ended. For both kings were subdued in fight, vanquished, and taken prisoners; with a great number of their noblemen, whereas they were in hope to haue gone awaite with the conquest, and to haue had renoume for their reward. Of which ouerthrow giuen to both these kings, with the clemencie of king Edward (in whose hands though their liues laie to be disposed as he list, yet he was so far from violating the same, that he shewed himselfe a wonderfull fauourer of their estates, and in fine not onelie put them to their reasonable ransoms, but restored them to their roialties, from the which their sinister lot had deposed them) Christopher Okland hath left this remembred:

wonders.

In this foure and thirtieth yeare of king Edward, men and castell were destroyed in diuerse places of this realme, by lightening and tempest; also houses were set on fier and burnt, and manie strange and wonderfull sights saene. The same yeare Edward prince of Wales married the countesse of Kent, which before was wife vnto the lord Thomas Holland: and before that, she was also wife vnto the erle of Salisbury, and diuorced from him, and wedded to the same lord Holland. She was daughter vnto Edmund earle of Kent, brother to king Edward the second, that was beheaded in the beginning of this kings reigne, as before we haue heard. And because the prince and she were within degrees of consanguinitie forbidden to marrie, a dispensation was gotten from the pope to remoue that let. In this yeare also was a great death of people (namelie of men, for women were not so much subiect thereto.) This was called the second mortallitie, because it was the second that fell in this kings daies.

A great death.

In Marl.
The priuat of Edmarch departed thus h.e.

This yeare also by the death of Richard fitz Kase priuat of Ardmac, that departed this life in the court of Rome; and also of Richard Wilminton deceased here in England, the discord that had continued for the space of thre or foure yeares betwixt them of the cleargie on the one part, and the foure orders of friers on the other part, was now quieted and brought to end. Moreover, this yeare appeared two castles in the aire, of the which the one appeared in the southeast, and the other in the southwest, out of which castles about the houre of none sundrie times were seene hosts of armed men (as appeared to mans sight) issuing forth, and that host which sailed out of the castell in the southeast seemed white, and the other blacke. They appeared as they should haue fought either against other, and first the white had the upper hand, and after was overcome, and so banished out of sight.

About the same time, the souldiours which were discharged in France and out of wages, by the French king by of the warres, assembled together, and did much hurt in that realme, as in the French histories we may read. Their chiefe leaders were Englishmen and Gascoignes subiects to the king of England. The king assembled the states of his realme in parliament at Westminster in the feast of the Conuersion of S. Paule, and there was declared vnto them the tenor and whole effect of the peace concluded betwixt England and France, wherewith they were greatly pleased, and hereupon the nobles of the realme, and such Frenchmen as were hostages, came together at Westminster church on the first saturday of Lent next following: and there such as were not already sworn, receiued the oth for performance of the same peace, in a right solemne manner, hauing the tenor of their oths written in certeine scrolls; and after they had taken their oths vpon the sacrament and masse booke, they deliuered the same scrolls vnto certeine notaries appointed to receiue and register the same.

The mortallitie yet during, that noble duke Henry of Lancaster departed this life on the euen of the Annunciation of our ladie, and was buried at Leicester. John of Gaunt the fourth son to the king, who had married his daughter the ladie Blanch, as before we haue heard, succeeded him in that dutchie as his heire in right of the said ladie. The same yeare also died the lord Reginald Cobham, the lord Walter fitz Warren, and thre bishops, Worcester, London, and Ely. This yeare vpon the fifteenth day of Ianuarie there rose such a passing wind, that the like had not bene heard of in manie yeeres before. It began about euenlong time in the south, and that with such force, that it ouerthrow and blew downe strong and mightie buildings, as towres, steeples, houses and chimnies. This outrageous wind continued thus for the space of six or seauen daies, whereby euen those buildings that were not ouerthrowne and broken downe, were yet so shaken, that they without repairing were not able long to stand. After this folowed a verie wet season, namelie in the summer time and haruest, so that much coine and haie was lost and spoiled, for want of seasonable weather to gather in the same.

The lord Lionell the kings sonne went ouer into Ireland, to be deputie to his father there, and was created duke of Clarence, and his brother Edmund was created earle of Cambridge; also Edward prince of Wales was by his father king Edward inuested duke of Guen, and did homage vnto his father for the same, in like manner and forme as his father and other kings of England were accustomed to do for the said dutchie to the kings of France. And afterwards about the feast of Candlemasse next ensuing, the said prince sailed into Gascoigne, and arrived at Burdeaur, taking vpon him the gouernment and rule of the countrie. Moreover this yeare, the five first daies of Maie, were kept roiall iusts in Smithfield by London, the king and queene being present, with a great multitude of the nobles and gentlemen of both the realms of England and France; at which time came hither Spaniards, Cipriots, and Armenians, requiring aid of the king against the infidels, that sore molested their confines. The staple of wols was this yeare remoued to Calis.

Also the firste of October, a parlement began, that was called at Westminster, which continued till the feast daie of S. Michael, on which daie, the king at that time fiftie yeares then past, was borne; whereupon, as it were in the yeare of his iubilie, he shewed him himselfe more gracious to his people, granting pardon to offenders, and revoking outlawes. Moreover, it was ordeined in this parlement, that no maner of person, of what estate or degree soever he was, the king, the quene, and dukes onelie excepted, should have any pursuers of vittels, nor should take by any thing without readie payment, and those that from thenceforth did contrarie to this ordinance, should be extremelie punished. There was granted to the king in this parlement six and twentie shillings eight pence of euerie sacke of wool that was to be transported over the sea, for thre yeares next ensuing.

Furthermore, at the sute of the commons it was ordeined and established by an act in this parlement devised, that men of law should plead their causes, and write their actions and plaints in the English tongue, and not in the French, as they had bene accustomed to do, ever since the Conquerors time. It was ordeined also, that scholmasters should teach their scholars to construe their lessons in English, & not in French, as before they had bene used. The king shewed so much curtesie to the French hostages, that he permitted them to go over to Calis, and there being nere home, to purchase friendship, by oft calling on their friends for their deliuerance. They were suffered to ride to and fro about the marches of Calis, for the space of foure daies together, so that on the fourth daie before sunne setting, they returned into Calis againe. The duke of Anjou turning his libertie to serue his owne turne, departed from thence, and went home into France, without making his fellowes priuie to his purpose.

This yeare a parlement was called by the king, which began the ninth of October, from the which none of the noble men could obtaine licence to be absent. In this parlement all rich ornaments of gold and siluer used to be weorne in kirtles, girdels, cotes, rings, or otherwise, to the setting forth of the bodie, were prohibited, except to such as might dispend ten pounds by yeare. Moreover that none should weare any rich clothes or furies, except they might dispend an hundred pounds by yeare. Moreover it was enacted, that labourers and husbandmen should not use any deintie dishes, or costly drincks at their tables. But these, and such other acts as were devised and established at this parlement, toke none effect, as after it appeared. In this yeare, there came into England to speake with king Edward concerning their weightie affaires, thre kings, to wit, the king of France, the king of Scotland, & the king of Cyprus: they were honorablie receiued, and highlie feasted.

The king of Scotland, and the king of Cyprus after they had dispatched their business for the which they came, turned backe againe; but the French king fell sicke, and remained here till he died, as in the next yeare ye shall heare. He arrived here in England, about the latter end of this yeare, and came to Eltham (where king Edward as then laie) on the foure and twentieth day of Januarie, and there dined. After diner, he took his horse and rode toward London, and upon Blakhe heath, the citizens of London clad in one kind of liuerie, and verie well horsed, met him, and conueied him from thence through to London, to the Savoy, where his lodging was prepared.

About the beginning of March, in this eight and thirtieth yeare, the forenamed French king fell into a grievous sicknesse, of the which he died the eight day of April following. His corpes was conueied into France, and there buried at S. Denise: his erexques were kept here in England in diuerse places right solemnlie, by king Edwards appointment.

This yeare, by reason of an extreme sore frost, continuing from the seven and twentieth day of September last passed, unto the beginning of April, in this eight and thirtieth yeare (or rather from the seventh day of December till the nineteenth day of March, as Wallingham and other old writers do report) the ground laie untild, to the great hinderance and losse of all growing things on the earth. This yeare on Michaelmasse day, before the castell of Aulroy, not far distant from the citie of Tannes in Britaine, a sore battell was fought betwixt the lord Charles de Blois, and the lord John of Mountford. For when there could be no end made betwixt these two lords, touching their title unto the duchie of Britaine, they renewed the wars verie hotlie in that countrie, and procured all the aid they might from each side. The king of France sent to the aid of his consine Charles de Blois a thousand speares; and the earle of Mountford sent into Gascoigne, requirung sir John Chandois, and other Englishmen there to come to his succour. Sir John Chandois gladly consented to this request, and thereupon got licence of the prince, and came into Britaine, where he found the earle of Mountford at the siege of the foresaid castell of Aulroy. In the meane time, the lord Charles de Blois, being provided of men, and all things necessarie to giue battell, came and lodged fast by his enemies.

The earle of Mountford advertised of his approach, by the aduise of sir John Chandois and other of his captains, had chosen out a plot of ground to lodge in, and meant there to abide their enemies. With the lord Charles of Blois was that valiant knight sir Berthram de Cleaquin or Cuesclin (as some write him) by whose aduise there were ordeined thre battels, and a rereguard, and in each battell were appointed a thousand of good fighting men. On the other part, the earle of Mountford divided his men likewise into thre battels and a rereguard. The first was led by sir Robert Knols, sir Walter Hewet, and sir Richard Bzulle or Wurle. The second by sir Oliver de Clifton, sir Eustace Daubrecourt, and sir Wat thew Gourne. The third the earle of Mountford himselfe guided, and with him was sir John Chandois as sociat, by whom he was much ruled: for the king of England, whose daughter the earle of Mountford should marie, had writtten to sir John Chandois, that he should take good heed to the businesse of the said earle, and order the same as sagelie as he might desire or imagine.

In ech of these thre armies were five hundred armed men, and foure hundred archers. In the rereguard were appointed five hundred men of warre, under the gouernance of sir Hugh Caluerlie. Beside sir John Chandois, & other Englishmen rectified by Froissard, there was the lord William Latimer, as one of the chiefe on the earle of Mountfords side. There were not past sixtene hundred good fighting men on that side, as Thomas Wallingham plainelie writeth. Now when the hosts were ordered on both sides (as before we haue said) they approached together, the Frenchmen came close in their order of battell, and were to the number of five and twentie hundred men of armes, after the manner of that age, beside others. Querie man had cut his speare (as then they used, at that time they should soine in battell) to the length of five foot, and a short ar hanging at his side. At the first encounter, there was a sore battell, and trulie the archers shot right fiercelie, howbeit their shot did little hurt to the Frenchmen, they were so well armed and furnished: the archers perceiving that (being big men and light) cast awaie their bowes, and entered in amongst the Frenchmen that bare the arcs, and plucked them out of their hands, wherewith they fought after right hardlie. There was done manie a noble feat of armes, manie taken, and rescued againe.

Against

Against the earle of Montford's battell, fought the battell which the lord Charles de Blois ruled, and at the first, the earle of Montford's part was sore oppressed, and brought out of order in such sort, that if sir Hugh Calverly had not in time relieved them, the losse had runne on that side; but finally so long they fought, that all the battells assembled and joined each to other, except the rereguard of the Englishmen, whereof (as is said) sir Hugh Calverly was chiefe. He kept alwayes his battell on a wing, and ever succoured where he saw need. At length, the Frenchmen not able to indure the valiant dowings of their aduersaries, began to breake. First the earle of Aruerres battell was discomfited, and put to flight, and the said earle sore wounded, and taken prisoner, but the battell of sir Berthram de Cleaquin as yet stood manfullie at defense, howbeit at length the Englishmen perforce opened it, and then was the said sir Berthram taken prisoner, vnder the banner of sir John Chandois.

Wherewith also, all the other battells of the Frenchmen and Britaines, on the part of the lord Charles de Blois, were cleane discomfited, and put out of array, so that such as resisted, and stood at defense, were slaine and beaten downe, and amongst others, the lord Charles was there slaine himselfe, and all other either taken or slaine, except those that escaped by flight, amongst the which there were not manie of the nobilitie. For as Thomas Walsingham saith) there were slaine about a thousand men of armes, and there were taken two earles, seven and twentie lords, and fiftene hundred men of armes. The chase was followed to the citie of Reimes, eight great leagues from the place where the battell began. After this victorie, the earle of Montford conquered manie townes and castels in Britaine, whereof the French king being aduertised, sent his brother the duke of Anjou, vnto the wife of the lord Charles of Blois now deceased, to comfort hir in such a beaue case, and to take order for things as should be thought expedient, vntill further prouision might be made.

Shortlie after, there were sent vnto the earle of Montford, the archbishop of Reimes, the marshall Bouciquault, and the lord of Cran, as commissioners, to commune with him of a finall agreement. Whereupon, after he had signified the matter vnto the king of England, and vnderstood his pleasure therein, this treatie was so handled, that peace there of followed, and the parties were agreed in the moneth of Aprill next ensuing. ¶ This yeare (as some haue written) king Edward finished his warres vpon S. Stephens daie, and began the foundation of S. Stephens chappell at Westminster in memorie thereof, which chappell was afterwards finished by king Richard the second that succeeded him. ¶ In the nine and thirtieth yeere of king Edwards reigne, and in the moneth of februarye, in the citie of Angouleme, was borne the first sonne of prince Edward, and was named after his father, but he departed this life the seuenth yeare of his age.

Also this yeare, the seven and twentieth of Julie, Angeram de Guines lord de Coucie a Frenchman, married the ladie Isabell daughter to R. Edward. The solemnization of the marriage feast was kept at Windsor in most roiall and triumphant wise. The said lord Coucie was created earle of Bedford, with an yerelie annuities of thirtie markes, going forth of the issues and profits of that countie, ouer and besides a thousand markes by yeare, assigned to him and his said wife, and to the heires male of their bodie begotten, to be paid forth of the exchequer. About this time, there was a treatie also for marriage to be had, betwixt the lord Edmund earle of Cambridge, and the ladie Margaret, daughter and heire to the earle of Flanders; which treatie went so far, that the earle came ouer to Douer, where the king was readie to receiue him, and there the earle promised by words of assiance, to giue his said daughter vnto the said lord Edmund in marriage: and after that the earle had bene at Douer, the space of thre daies, passing the time in great solace and banquetting, when he had finished his businesse, he returned backe againe into his countie.

Whilest the king was thus at Douer with the earle of Flanders, the lord Latimer came from the lord John de Montford, to vnderstand his pleasure, touching the offers that were made for peace, vpon whose returne with answer, the peace was concluded as before we haue heard. This yeare was Peter king of Castile chased out of his realme, by his bastard brother Henrie, which was aided in that enterprise by sir Berthram de Cleaquin lately deliuered, and other Frenchmen; so that the said Henrie was crowned at Burgus, vpon Easter daie: wherefore the said Peter was constrained to flee, and so came to Burdeaur to sue for aid at the hands of the prince of Wales. This yeare by the kings commandement, a restraint was ordeined, that Peter pence should not be from thenceforth anie more gathered within this realme, nor anie such payment made at Rome, which had bene used to be paid there, euer since the daies of Iue, king of Westsaxons, which ordeined this payment toward the maintenance of a schoule for English scholars. But howsoeuer this payment was abrogated at this time by king Edward, it was after renewed againe, and the monie gathered in certeine shires of this realme, till the daies of king Henrie the eight, so greatlie preuailed the vsurped power of that beast of Rome, which had poisoned the princes of the world with the dregs of his abomination, whose glorie shall end in shame, his hono: turne to horro:, and his ambitious climbing vp aloft about all principallitie (to be compere with God) shall haue an irreuerable ruine; as long agoe, and of late likewise hath bene and now is prophesied of him, that he may readilie read his owne downefall into hell:

In rapidis acherontis aquas, qui gloria mundi

Papauit, lapsu corruet ille graui:

Corruet ut rapidum descendit ab aethere fulmen,

Corruet in stygios tempus in omne lacus.

In this yeare fell great abundance of raine in the time of hate haruieff, so that much corne and hate was lost. ¶ There was also such fighting amongst sparrows in that season, that they were found dead on the ground in great numbers. Also, there followed great mortalitie of people, the sicknesse being so sharpe and belement, that manie being in perfect health ouer night when they went to bed, were found dead in the morning. Also, manie died of the small pocks, both men, women, and children. ¶ Moreover this yeare, Simon Flep archbishop of Canturburie departed this life, and Simon Langham bishop of Ely succeeded in his place. This yeare at Burdeaur, was borne the second sonne of prince Edward named Richard, on the third daie of Aprill; his godfather at the fontstone was James R. of Maiorke. ¶ Peter the king of Spaine, who (as we haue heard) was expelled out of his realme by his bastard brother, made such earnest sute to the prince of Wales for aid to be restored home, that finally the prince aduertising his father king Edward of the whole matter, by aduise from him, determined to bring home the said king Peter, and to restore him againe to his kingdom, by force of armes, in despite of all his aduersaries.

The prince indeed was verie desirous to take this enterprise vpon him, both of a certeine pitifull affection tion to relieue the miserable state of king Peter, and also of an ardent desire which he had to purchase a glorious fame thorough martiall deeds, and noble acts of chualtrie. Therefore hauing this occasion to impleie his time in such exercises, and now commandyng thether to of his father, he was exceedingly glad in his mind, and with all speed that might be, made his prouision both of a sufficient armie of men of warre, and also of all other things necessarie for the furniture of such an enterpryse: but first, he took good assurance of king Peter, for the payment of the soldiers wages: so the king left at Balonne three of his daughters, Beatrice, Constance, and Isabell as pledges, for performance of all the covenants agreed betwixt him and the prince.

Thus when the prince, by the aduise and counsell of sir John Chandos, and sir Robert Knols (by whome he was much ruled) had taken direction in his business, for that his iournie into Spaine, in each condition as was thought behoouefull, he with the king of Spaine in his companie, passed forth with a puissant armie, and came to the streets of Roncuille, at the entrie into Pauarre, and obtaining so much friendship of the king of Pauarre, as to haue the passages of his countrey opened, they entered into his realme through the same, as friends, without finding any resistance. In this meane time, Henrie king of Spaine, hauing knowledge that the prince of Wales was thus comming against him, to restore his brother king Peter to his former degree, by aduise of sir Berthram de Clequin, got a great number of soldiers out of France, by whose aid he might the better defend himselfe against his enemies.

Now it chanced, that whilst the prince of Wales was passing thorough Pauarre, toward the entrie of Spaine, certeine of those Frenchmen, under the leading of sir Oliuer Hannie, took the king of Pauarre prisoner, as he was riding from one towne to another. Hannie maruelled at that chance, and some there were that thought he suffered himselfe to be taken for a cause, because he would not aid the prince of Wales any further, nor conduct him through his realme, as he had promised to do. But the prince nothing dismayed herewith, passed forward, by the guidance of a knight of Pauarre, called sir Martin de Care, and finally came to the confines of Spaine, and lodged at Victoria, not far from his enemies. For king Henrie of Spaine, understanding which waie the prince drew, came forward to encounter him, and fight downe his field, not far from the borders of his realme, at a place called saint Spuchaulc: and thus were both the hosts lodged within a small distance the one against the other.

King Henrie had sent to the prince an herald of armes with a letter, requiring to know of him for what cause he moued warre against him, sith he had neuer offended him. The prince taking deliberation for answer of this letter, kept the messenger with him, and perceiving that king Henrie came not forward, but laie still at saint Spuchaulc, strongly incamped, he remoued from Victoria, and came to a towne called Uiana, where he staid two daies to refresh his people, and after went forward, and passed the river which diuideth the realmes of Castile and Pauarre, at the bridge of Croigne. King Henrie aduertised hereof, departed from saint Spuchaulc, and came before the towne of Pauarret, situate on the same river. Not manie daies before the prince passed the river at Croigne, king Henrie had sent forth two of his brethren, the earle Dom Telle, and the lord Sandes, with sir hundred horsemen, to view the princes host.

They chanced to encounter two hundred English horsemen, whom after long and sharpe fight, they distressed, & slew sir William Felton, one of the chiefe leaders of those Englishmen, and took sir Thomas Felton his brother, sir Hugh Hastings, and diuerse other, both knights and esquires. Whether that king Henrie was greatly encouraged by this good lucke in the beginning, or that he trusted through the great multitude of his people, which he had there with him, to haue the upper hand of his enemies, true it is, that he counted sore to giue them battell: and although he might haue wearied the prince, and constrained him for want of vittels to haue returned, or to haue fought with him at some great aduantage, if he had deferred the battell, as the marshall of France had done, yet he would needs fight in all the hast, and therefore did thus approach his enemies.

The prince perceiving that his aduersarie came forward to encounter him, dispatched the herald with an answer to the letter which he had of him received, containing in effect, that for great considerations, he had taken vpon him to aid the rightfull king of Spaine, chased out of his realm by violent wrong, and that if it might be, he would gladly make an agreement betwixt them: conditionallie, that king Henrie of necessity must then forsake the administration, and all the title of the kingdome of Spaine, which by no rightfull meane he could inioyn, and therefore if he refused thus to do, he was for his part resolved how to proceed. The herald departed with this answer, and came therewith vnto king Henrie, and deliuered it vnto him, as then lodged with his puissant armie at Pauarre, so that then both parties prepared themselves to battell.

The prince hauing with him thirtie thousand men of Englishmen, Gascoignes, and other strangers, ordeined three battels, of the which, the first was led by the duke of Lancaster, and with him was sir John Chandos constable of Guien, sir William Beauchampe son to the earle of Warwick, the lord Dabret, sir Richard Dangle, and sir Stephan Conston, marshals of Guien, & diuerse other. The middle ward was gouerned by the prince, and with him was the foresaid Peter king of Spaine, and diuerse other lords and knights of England, Poitou, and other countries, as the vicounts of Chatelaireault and Rochfort, the lords of Partnie, Binan, Taneboton, and others, sir Richard Pontchardon, sir Thomas Spenser, sir John Grendon, and a great sort more, whose names it would be too long to rehearse. The reterward was vnder the gouernance of the king of Galozques, & with him were associat the earls of Arminacke, Dalbret, Piergoz, Cominges, the capitoll of Buefz, sir Robert Knols, and manie other valiant lords, knights, and esquires.

On the second day of Aprill, the prince with his battell thus ordeined, remoued from Croigne, and marching that day two leagues forward, came before Pauarret, and there took his lodging, within a small distance from his enemies, so that both parties prepared to giue battell the next day in the morning, commanding that euerie man at the sounding of the first trumpet, should apparell themselves, that they might be ready vpon the next found to be set in order of battell, and to go against their enemies. The Spaniards very earlie in the morning drew into the field, and ordeined three battels in this wise. The first was led by sir Berthram de Clequin, wherein were all the Frenchmen and other strangers, to the number of foure thousand knights and esquires, well armed and appointed, after the manner of France. In the second battell was the earle Dom Telle, with his brother the lord Sandes, hauing with them fiftene thousand men on foot, and on horsebacke. The third battell and the greatest of all was gouerned by king Henrie

Henrie himselfe, hauing in that battell seven thousand horsemen, and thre score thousand footmen, with crossbowes, darts, speares, lances, and other abilliments of war: so in all thre battells he had foure score and six thousand men on horsebacke and on foot. The prince of Wales, at the breaking of the daie was ready in the field with his people arranged in order of battell, and advanced forward with them toward his enemies, an holling pace; and as they passed a little hill, they might see as they were descending downe the same, their enemies comming likewise towards them, in good order of battell. When they were approached nere together, and ready to ioine, the duke of Lancaster's battell encountered with the battell of sir Berthram de Cleaquin, which two battells were eagerly assailed each other, so that there was betwixt them a foze conflict, and well continued. The erle Dom Melles, and his brother the lord Sandes, upon the first approach of the princes battell towards them, fled out of the field, and with them two thousand speares, so that the residue of their battell were shortly after discomfited, for the capitall of Bous otherwise Bous, and the lord Clifton, came upon them on foot, and slue and hurt manie of them, so that they brake their arraie, and fled to saue themselves.

This chance discomfited the hearts of the Spaniards right soze, but yet king Henrie like a valiant gentleman came forward, and encouraged his men all that he might, so that there was a cruell battell, and well foughten a long time. For the Spaniards with slings cast stones in such fierce manner, that they claued therewith manie an helmet and bassenet, hurt manie, and ouerthrew them to the earth. On the other part, the English archers shot freshlie at their enemies, galled and slue the Spaniards, and brought them to great confusion: yet king Henrie nothing abashed herewith, wherefoeuer he perceiued his men to shrink, thither he resorted, calling upon them, and exhorting them to remember their estimations and duties, so that by his diligence and manfull encouragement, thise that daie did he state his people, being at point to giue ouer, and set them in the faces of his enemies againe. Neither did the souldiers alone manfully behaue themselves, but the captains also stoutlie laid about them. King Peter like a lion pressed forward, coueting to meet with his brother Henrie, that he might seeke his reuenge on him with his owne hands. Cruell was the fight, and tried throughlie with most eager and fierce minds.

At length, when the Spaniards were no longer able to susteine the force and violence of the Englishmen, Calcoignes, & other which were there against them, they brake their arraie, and fled: so that neither the authoritie nor bold exhortation of king Henrie, could cause them to tarrye anie longer: whereupon, when he saw himselfe forsaken of his people, and that few abode with him to resist his enemies, he also to saue himselfe fled out of the field, being fullie persuaded, that if he had bene taken, no ransom should haue saued his life. The battell that was best fought, and longest held together, was that of the strangers, which sir Berthram de Cleaquin led. For if the Spaniards had done halfe their parts as well as the Frenchmen, & other in this battell, the matter had gone harder against the Englishmen than it did: yet finally, by the noble courage of the duke of Lancaster, and the valiant prowesse of sir John Chandos, sir Hugh Caluerlie, & others, the Frenchmen were put to flight, and their battell quite discomfited. The slaughter in this battell was great, both of them that were slaine in the field, and of those that were drowned in the riuer that runneth by the towne of Pauarret.

After that the battell was ended, and that such as had followed the chase were returned, the prince caused the fields to be searched, to vnderstand what number had bene slaine in the battell: they that were appointed to take the victo, upon their returns reported, that there was dead of men of armes five hundred and thre score, and of commons about sequen thousand, and five hundred of the English part: there were slaine of men of name, but foure knights, two Calcoignes, one Almaine, and the fourth an Englishman, and of other meane souldiers, not past fortie (as Froissard saith.) But others affirme, that there were slaine of the princes part about sixtene hundred; which should seme to be more like a truth, if the battell was fought so foze and fiercelie, as Froissard himselfe doth make report. Howbeit, there be that write, how the duke of Lancaster wan the field by great fortune and balliance, yet the prince came nere to his enemies. But howsoeuer it was, the Englishmen obtained the victorie in this battell, fought on a saturdaye being the thirde of Aprill, in the yeare 1367. There were taken prisoners, to the number of two thousand, and amongst them the erle of Dene, sir Berthram de Cleaquin, the marshall Dandzeben or Ddenhen, and manie other men of name.

After the battell, king Peter went to Burgos, and was receiued into the citie, and shortly after, that is to say, on the wednesdaye following, the prince came thither, and there held his Caeter with king Peter, and tarried there about thre weekes. In the meane time, they of Asturgus, Toledo, Lisbon, Cordona, Calice, Siuill, and of all other places of the kingdome of Spaine, came in, and did homage unto king Peter, promising him to be true to him euer after: for they saw that resistance would not anuale so long as the prince should be in the countrie. After this, the prince was in hand with king Peter, for the souldiers wages, by whose aid he was thus restored into his former estate. King Peter went unto Siuill, to make shift for monie accordingly, promising to returne againe, within a few weekes, and to see euerie man paid, according as he had covenanted. For when he was driven out of his realme, and came to Burdeaur to craue aid of the prince, he promised, that so soon as he should be restored to his kingdome, he would see the souldiers contented of their wages, and bound himselfe thereto, both by his oth and writing giuen vnder his seale. But when he obtained his purpose, he forgot all frendlie dutie, and was so farre from performing his promise, that he cloaked his ill meaning with a feigned tale, and sent the prince a message spiced with hypocritie and vnthankfulnesse, two foule faults in a priuat man, much more odious in a prince and great state, as the poet wisely and truelie saith in this distichon:

Omne animi vitium tanto confectius in se Crimen habet, quanto maior qui peccat habetur.

The prince tarried for the returne of king Peter, both weekes and moneths, but could not heare any tidings of him. He therefore sent unto him, to vnderstand the cause of the state: his answer was, that he had prouided monie, and sent it by certeine of his men toward the prince, but the companions that serued vnder the prince, had met with it by the way, and taken it from them that had the conueiance of it: he therefore requiured the prince to rid the realme of those inaphances, and to leaue behind him some of his officers, to whome in name of him he would make payment of such monie as was due. This answer pleased not the prince, but there was no remedie, for other at that present he could not haue, for anie likelihood he saw: and therefore, taking order with king Peter how the payment should be made, he prepared to returne into Gascoigne. The order therefore taken betwixt them, was this. Within foure moneths next ensuing, king Peter should paie the one halfe of the wages due to the soldiers for this tourne, unto such as the prince should leaue behind him to receiue the same, and the other halfe within one yeare.

Tho. Wals.

The prince put to his shifts for default of paie.

The prince was compelled to breake his plate, and to make monie thereof to paie his soldiers, namely, the companions, which he had called forth of France, so that he left himselfe bare of all riches, to keepe touch with them, although king Dampeter failed in his promise each waile forth. For where the prince should haue had in recompense towards his charges, the countie of Algezara, and other lands, by the said Dampeters assignement, so that he sent one of his knights to take seizine of the same lands, he was neuertheless disappointed, for he could not come by any peaceable possession of those lands, and so returned greaue impouerished, hauing spent in this tourne all that he could make. In the meane time the bastard Henrie, hauing escaped out of the field by flight, got him into France, and there through fauor of the duke of Anjou, so purchased for himselfe, that he got together a certaine number of Britains and other soldiers, comming to the frontiers of the princes land in Gascoigne, got a towne in Bigoze, called Bannieres, and made war vpon the princes subiects.

The prince returneth into Gascoigne.

The prince obtaining passage for himselfe and his men, of the kings of Aragon and Nauarre, returned to Burdeaur, and then did the bastard Henrie forsake his garrison at Bannieres, and went into Arragon, and there got the king of Arragons assistance: & finally, in the yeare 1369, returning into Spaine, recovered the kingdome, and due his brother king Peter, as in the historie of Spaine it may appeare, which for that it apperteineth not to this historie of England, I doe here passe over. This yeare, in the moneth of March, appeared a blasing starre, betwixt the north and west, whose beames stretched towards France as was then marked, threatening (as might be thought) that within a small time after it should againe be wrapped and set on fire with new troubles of warre, and even then, that countrie was not in quiet, but harried in diuerse parts, by such soldiers as had bene with the prince in Spaine, & were now out of wages. The leaders of which people were for the more part Englishmen and Gascoignes, as sir Robert Biquet, sir John Tresmelle, Robert Cennie, sir Gaillard Wertueill, the bourge Wertueill, the bourge Camois of Cominges, as Denise Sauvage thinketh, the bourge of Espare, Pandon or Pandon of Bargerant, Bernard de la Salle, Dextigo, Lamut, and manie other.

The duke of Clarence goeth into France.

The ladie Molant.

In this 42 yeare of king Edwards reigne, his second son the lord Lionell duke of Clarence and earle of Ulster passed the sea, with a noble companie of lords, knights, and gentlemen, and went thorough France into Lombardie, there to marrie the ladie Molant, daughter to the duke of Millane. He was honorably receiued in all places where he came, and speciallie at Paris, by the dukes of Berrie and Burgonie, the lord Coucie and other, the which brought him to the court, where he dined and supped with the king, and lodged within the palace. On the next day he was had to a place where the queene lodged, and dined with hir, and after was conueied to the court againe, and supped that night with the king, and on the morrow following, he took his leaue of the king and queene the which gaue to him great gifts, and likewise to the noble men of England that came ouer with him, to the value of twentie thousand florens and about: he was conueied from place to place, with certaine of the French nobilitie, till he came to the borders of the countie, and then entering into Sauoy, he came to Chamberie, where the earle of Sauoy was ready to receiue him, and there he remained foure daies, being highly feasted amongst the ladies and damoysels: and then he departed, and the earle of Sauoy brought him to Millane, to doe him the more honor, for his sister was mother to the bride, which the duke should marrie.

To speake of the honorable receiuing of him into the cite of Millane, and of the great feast, triumph, and banquetting, and what an assemblee there was in Millane of high states, at the solemnizing of the marriage betwixt him and the said ladie Molant, it were too long a proceesse to remember. The gifts that the father of the bride, the lord Galeas gaue unto such honorable personages as were there present, amounted in value to an inestimable summe. The writers of the Millane histories affirme, that this marriage was celebrated on the fiftieth daie of June, in the yeare 1367, which being true, the same chanced in the 41 yeare of this kings reigne, and not in this 42 yeare, though other authors agree, that it was in the yeare 1368. But to returne to other doings there we left.

We haue heard how the prince of Wales could get no monie of the king of Spaine, for the wages of his men of warre, which he had retained to serue him in the reducing of the said king home into his countrie: wherefore the prince hauing bene at great charges in that tourne, was neither able to satisfie them, nor mainteine his owne estate, without some great aid of his subiects, and therefore he was counselled to raise a subside called a fuage, through all the countrie of Aquitaine, to run onelie for the space of five yeares. To this payment, euerie churche or fire must haue bene contributozie, paient yearly one shilling, the rich to haue borne out the poore. And to haue this payment granted, all the states of the countrie were called together at Poirt. The Poitouins, and they of Rainsonge, Limosin, Rouergne, and of Rochell, agreed to the princes request, with condition, that he should keepe the course of his coine stable, for the terme of seven yeares.

But diuerse of the other parts of Guien refused that ordinance, as the earles of Arminake, and Cominges, the vicount of Carmaigne, the lords Dalbret, de la Barde, Carde, Pinconnet, and diuerse other great barons: but yet to depart quietlie from the assemblee, they required a time to take better aduise, and so they repairing into their countries, determined neither to returne againe according to their promises, nor to suffer any fuage to run amongst them at all, and were so much offended with the motion, that they sought occasion forthwith to reuolt from the English obedience and submission, knowing that

And therefore diuerse lords of them went to the French king, and there exhibited into the chamber of the peeres of France, their complaints of the grievous impositions & wrongs, which the prince went about to laie vpon them, affirming that their reioyng ought of speciall duty to be to the crowne of France, and to the king there, as to their lord Paramount. The French king, who would not seeme to breake the peace betwixt him and the king of England, disembled the matter, and told them that he would peruse the tenor of the charters and letters of the peace, and so far forth as he might by permission of the same, he would be glad to doe them good. The earles of Arminake, Berigourd, Cominges, and the lord Dalbret, with other that were come thither about this matter, were contented with this answer, and so staid in France, till they might understand further, both of the French kings mind, and of the princes doings. This yere in October, was Simon Langham archbishop of Canturburie elected to the dignitie of a cardinal, and then William Willellie, bishop of Worcester, was removed unto the see of Canturburie.

The earle of Saint Paule

About the same time, the earle of Saint Paule, one of the hostages in England, staid from hence, without taking any leaue, or saying farewell. At his coming into France, he greatlie furthered the sute of the lords of Gascoigne, & finally so much was done on their behalfe, that the French king was contented that the prince of Wales should be appealed, and summoned to appeare before the French king as iudge in that point, for reformation of the wrongs which he offered to them that had made their resort unto him, as reason was they should. This appeale was writtten, and duly examined.

1369
The prince of Wales appeared to appeare.

The tenor of the said prince of Wales his appeale or summons of appearance before the French king, &c.

Charles by the grace of God king of France, to our nepheue the prince of Wales and Aquitaine, send greting. So it is, that diuerse prelates, barons, knights, vniuersities, communalities, and colledges of the marches and limits of the countrie of Gascoigne, and the dwellers and inhabitants in the bounds of our realme, besides diuerse other of the duchie of Aquitaine, are resorted, and come to our court, to haue right of certeine graefes, and vnlawfull troubles, which you, by vnauised counsell, and simple information, haue purposed to do vnto them, whereof we greatlie maruell. Therfore, to withstand, and to redresse such things, we are so contoined to them, that we haue thought good, by our roiall power, to command you to repaire to our citie of Paris, in proper person, and there to shew and present your selfe before vs, in the chamber of our pères, that you may be constrained to do right to your people, concerning the graefes which they alledge that you are about to oppresse them with, who claime to haue their resort into our court: and that you faile not thus to do, in as spædie manner as ye can, immediately vpon the sight and hearing of these present letters. In witnesse whereof, we haue to the same set our seale. Given at Paris, the five and twentieth day of Januarie.

Anno Reg. 43.

The prince of Wales came to the messenger.

These letters were given to a knight and a clerke, to beare and present to the prince, which according to that they had in charge, went to Burdeaur, and there getting licence to come before his presence, they read the letters, wherewith he was not a little chafed, and openlie told them for a plaine answer, that he meant to accomplish the French kings request, for his coming to Paris, but that should be with his helmet on his head, and threescore thousand armed men, to beare witness of his appearance. The messengers perceiving the prince to be sore offended with their message, got them awaie, without taking their leaue: but before they were passed the limits of the English dominion, they were staid by commandement of the prince, and committed to prison, within the citie of Agen.

About the same time, the duke of Berrie returned into France, hauing licence of king Edward for an whole yere; but he bare himselfe so wiselie, that he returned not againe at all: for he excused himselfe, till time that the warre was open. In like manner, the more part of all the other hostages, by one meane or other were returned into France, and some indeed were deliuered vpon their ransomes, or other considerations, so that the French king being deliuered of that obstacle, was the more readie to breake with the king of England, and therefore vpon knowledge had of the princes answer, to those that he sent with the appeale, by such of the messengers seruants as were returned, and declared how their masters were delt with, he couertlie prepared for the warre. The lord John Chandois, and other of the princes counsell foresaw what would insue of leauing the suage, and therefore counselled the prince, not to proceed any further in it. But he hauing onlie regard to the releafe of his souldiers and men of warre, would needs go forward with it. And indeed, if he might haue brought it to passe, as it was denied, that euerie housholder should haue paid a franke for chymn- age, the summe would haue growne to twelue hundred thousand frankes by the yere, which had bene a great releafe, and that made him the more earnest, because he might haue bene able so to haue paid his debts.

The duke of Berrie.

The lord Chandois.

Chymnage.

Now, when it was perceiued certeinlie that open rebellion would therof insue, and that king Edward was certified of the whole state of the matter, and how diuerse of the lords of Aquitaine were withdrawn vnto the court of France, in manner as before ye haue heard, he deuised a letter, which he caused to be published through all the parts of Aquitaine the effect whereof was this: That where the people of that countrie found themselves greued for such exactions as were demanded of them, he meant therefore vpon examination of their iust complaints, to see their wrongs redressed. And further, he was contented to pardon all such as were withdrawn to the French king, so that within a moneths space they would returne home; requirring them, that in no wise they should stirre anie seditious tumult, but to remember their oths of allegiance, and to continue in the same, according to their bounden duties; and as for him, he would be readie to see them eased, that would shew by plaine proofe how they had bene otherwise greued than reason might beare. This was his meaning, and this was the aduise of all his counsellours.

A letter published by the prince to appease the Gascoignes.

But this courteous letter little anailed, for daillie the Gascoignes revolted from the prince, and turned to the French part. Moreover, another occasion of grudge chanced to renew the malice betwixt the k. of England, and the French king. For whereas ye haue heard, that the earle of Flanders had affianced his daughter and heire to the lord Edmund of Langlie, earle of Cambridge, a thift was made, namely by the earles mother the countesse of Arthois, who was all French, that notwithstanding the same affiancement, she was married to Philip duke of Burgog- nie, who was surnamed the Hardie, by this occasion, as I. Meir saith. It chanced, that whilst he was prisoner in England with his father, he was vpon a time appointed to wait at the table, where his father and the king of England sat together at meat. And because a noble man of England that was appointed likewise to attend at the same table, serued first the king of England before the king of France, this Philip vpon with his fist, and toke the English lord a blow on the eare, saying; Wilt thou serue the king of England first, where the French king sitteth at the same table: The Englishman out with his dagger, & would haue striken the said Philip, but the king of England straight charged him to the contrarie, and praising the deed of the young stripling, said vnto him, from esles Philip le hardie, Thou art (said he) the hardie Philip. And so from that date he bare that name euer after. There be other that saie, how he toke that surname, because in the batell of Poitiers he abode still with his father till the end of the battell, without shewing any token of feare, or faintnes of courage.

The L. wake discomfited.

Fabian. The French king proceedeth against the prince in judgement of the appeal.

The earles of Arminacke and Perigord, with the other lordes of Gascoigne, that had made their appeale (as ye haue heard) to the chamber of the pères of France, when they vnderstood that the prince had imprisoned the messengers, that brought to him the French kings letters, began to make warre on the princes lands. The first enterpryse they made, was the discomfiting of the lord Thomas Wake seneſhall of Rouergne, as he was riding from Agen vnto the cite of Rodais, with threescore spears, and two hundred archers in his companie. Also the French king being now provided for the war, and vnderstanding the minds of the people within certeine towneſ vnder the dominion of the Englishmen, in his high court of parlement holden at Paris, proceeded in judgement vpon the appellacion before made by the earles of Arminacke, Perigord, and others, against prince Edward. And mozeouer he sent ouer into England the earle of Salisbury, and a knight called sir William Doorman, to signifie to the king of England, how he thought himselfe not honozable bled, & that the king of England did but slenderlie kepe the couenants of the peace, considering that he did not find meanes to reforme such of his subiects Englishmen and Gascoignes, as daile robbed and wasted the countries & lands belonging to the crowne of France.

These ambassadoꝝ were staied for the space of two moneths, & still they complained of the wrongs that the Englishmen had done, contrarie to the couenants of the peace, but the king made small account thereof, because he perceiued it was a forged matter that they alledged, and so in the end sent them auaie. At Douer being vpon their returne, there met them a Britaine that was comming with letters of defiance to the king of England from the French king, and as he had in commandement, he declared to them the effect of his message, wher vpon with all speed they passed ouer to Bullongne, and were glad they had so escaped. The Britaine came to the court, and deliuered the defiance to the king, according to the instructions which he had receiued. When the king had heard the letters read, and perceiued by good view taken of the seale and signet, that the same were of authoritie, he licenced the messenger to depart, and fell in counsell with the pères of his realme, what he should do in so weightie a matter. Wherevpon it was thought necessarie by them, that he should assemble his court of parlement, and so he did. In the which (vpon declaration made how iniuriously the French king after manie wrongfull dealings had now broken the peace, and sent his defiance vnto the king in so despitefull wise as might be) there was granted towards the maintenance of the warre thus begun, thre fifteens of the temporalitie, and thre dismes of the spiritualitie, to be paid in thre yeares.

Sir Nicholas Louaigne taken.

At the selfe same time that the defiance was made to the king here in England, the earle of St. Paule, and Gaie de Chatillon master of the crossbowes in France, entered into the countie of Ponthieu, toke Abbeille, and an English knight called sir Nicholas Louaigne seneſshall of that countie vnder the king of England, as then being with in it. They toke also saint Valerie, Crotoie, Rue, Pont saint Renie, and to be short, reduced the whole countie of Ponthieu vnder the French obeisance, which had remained in possession of the Englishmen for the space of a hundred and twelue yeares, euer since Edward the first had the same assigned to him in name of a dowrie, with his wife queene Elianor, sister to Alfonso K. of Castile. And yet were the people of that countie ready now to reuolt to the French dominion, notwithstanding their former long continued obeisance to the Englishmen: for other wise could not the Frenchmen so easilie haue come to their purpose, but that the people were couenanted before to receiue them, and betraie those few Englishmen that were amongst them.

About the same time also, it fell so ill for the Englishmen, that the prince of Wales was troubled with a sore sicknesse, that had continued long with him, euer since his being in Spaine, by reason whereof his enemies were the more bold to make attempts against him, and daile went about to allure and invite his subiects of the marches of Guien to reuolt from him, in somuch that the cite of Cahors, and diuerse other towneſ thereabout turned to the French part. Thus was the peace which had bene so suerlie made, and with so manie solemne oths confirmed, violated and broken, and the parties fallen together by the eares againe in sundrie places, and namelie in Aquitaine, wher sundrie armies were abroad in the fields, diuers sieges laid, manie towneſ taken, often encounters and skirmishes made, sometime to the losse of the one part, and sometime of the other, and the countries in the meane time harried and spoiled, that maruell it is to consider, and too long a proceſse it should be to rehearse the tenth part of such chancas as daile happened amongst them, so that it might well haue bene said of that soꝝ & tumultuous time:

O quam difficiles sunt pace dies.

King Edward sent ouer into Gascoigne the earle of Cambridge and Penbroke, with a certeine number of men of armes and archers, the which arriuing in Britaine, passed through that countie by licence of the Duke, and came to the prince as then lieng at Angouleme in Poitou, by whom they were sent to ouerrun the earle of Perigords lands, and so they did, and after laid siege to Burdille, hauing with them about thre thousand men one and other. There came with them forth of England foure hundred men of armes, foure hundred archers, and (as Froulard saith) beside their capitains, thre earles which be nameth, to wit, the lord of Tabeſtone (or rather Bradstone as I take it) sir Brian Stapleton, sir Thomas Balaster, and sir John Trinet. Whilſt the said earles went thus to make warre against the earle of Perigord, sir Hugh Caluerlie with two thousand men of warre was sent also to ouerrun the lands of the earle of Arminacke, and of the lord Walber; sir John Chandois laie in the marches of Thoulouse at Mountaubon, & afterwards besieged Terrieres, and in the end wan it; and so like wise did the earles of Cambridge and Penbroke win Burdille, by reason of a fallie that they with in made forth, and passed so far from their foꝛtresse, that the Englishmen got betwixt them and home.

Sir Robert Knols came from such lands as he had in Britaine, to serue the prince now in these warres of Gascoigne, and was by him made cheſe gouernour of all his men of warre, who bare himselfe right loyally in that charge. The first iourne which he made at that time, was into Quercie, hauing with him beside his owne bands, certeine knights of the princes retinue, as sir Richard Donchardon, sir Stephan Cousenton, sir Poell Loring, sir Hugh Paſſings, sir John

John Triuet, sir Thomas Spenser, sir Thomas Balaister, sir Nicholas Bond, sir William le Poine seneschall of Aigenois, sir Baldwin de Freuille, and others. At their comming into Quercie, they besieged a strong fortresse called Durmell, within the which were diuerse captains of the companions, as Aimon d'Otigo, the little Pechin, Jaques de Bray, Perot de Sauois, and Arnaudon de Bons, the which so valiantlie defended the place, that although the lord Chandois, accompanied with sir Thomas Felton, the capitall of Beuf, sir John de Dominiere, sir Thomas Percie, sir Eustace Daubrecourt, and others came with their retinues from Montaubon, to reinforce that siege, yet could they not obtaine their purpose, but raising from thence after siue weekes siege (constrained thereto through want of vittels) they marched straight to a towne called Domme, which they besieged, hauing in their armie sixtene hundred men at armes, beside two thousand archers and brigands, so called in those daies, of an armie which they ware named brigandines, vied then by footmen, that bare also targets, or pauisses, and certeine darts or sauelines to throw at their enemies.

The towne and castell of Domme were so strong of themselves, and so well provided of men of warre that were appointed to the gard of the same, with the lord thereof called sir Robert de Domme, that after the English captiues perceived they should but lose time to linger about the winning of that towne, they raised their siege, and marching further into the countrie, wan Cauaches, Freins, Kochinador, and Ville Franche, vpon the marches of Toulouzain, greatlie to the displeasure of the duke of Anion that lay at the same time in the cite of Toulouze, & could not remedie the matter. ¶ But to rectie euerie particular enterpryse, as the same was atchured by the English captiues and men of warre in that season, it should be more than the purpose of this volume might permit, and therefore I passe ouer diuerse things, which I find registred by Froissard and other writers, onlie aduertising you, that as the Englishmen thus made sore warres against their aduersaries abroad in those quarters: so the Frenchmen on the other part had assembled great numbers of men of warre, not onlie to defend their frontiers, but also by inuasions to win from the Englishmen towne and castels, and to waite such countries as would not turne to their use. Thus were all those countries in troubles of warre.

The two kings also of England and France, signified to their neighbours the causes of this warre, laying the fault either to other, and excusing themselves as cleare and innocent therein. Edward duke of Gelderland, nephew to the king of England, as sonne to his sister, and the duke of Gulihe: consine to the kings children by their mother that was daughter to the earle of Heinnault, took great despite that the French king had broken the peace, as they were throughlie persuaded, and that he had defied king Edward, as before ye haue heard. Wherevpon they sent their defiance vnto the French king, threatening to be reuenged on him to the bittermost of their powers. Duke Albert of Bavier, was once minded also to haue aided king Edward in this warre: but afterwards such persuasions were vied on the French kings part, that he chose to remaine as neuter betwixt them both, refusing to take anie part.

Among the soldiers also, called companions, which serued the prince in this season, there were three captains, right hardie and verie expert men of warre, Otigo, Bernard de Wilke, & Bernard de la Sale. These three remaining as then in Limosin, hearing that the duke of Burbons mother, which was also mother to the French queene, late within the castell of Belleperch in Burbonnois, with a small compaignie about hir, rode thither in one daie and a night, so that in the morning they approached the castell, scaled it, and took it, with the ladie within it. And though they were after besieged in the same castell by the duke of Burbon and other Frenchmen, yet they defended it, till the earls of Cambridge and Penbroke, with sixtene hundred speares, and three thousand of other men of warre, came and offered the Frenchmen battell, lodging afoze them sixtene daies. And when they perceiued that the Frenchmen would not issue out of the basside (in which they lay) to giue battell, the earles of Cambridge and Penbroke caused all them within the castell to come forth, and to bring with them the dukes of Burbon, whome they led awate in sight of hir sonne, leauing the castell void and free for him to enioy.

The French king provided a great number of ships to assemble together at Harflew, and leuied a great power of men, minding to bestow them aboard in the same ships, that they might saile into England, and make warre against king Edward in his owne countrie. The bestie of this armie should haue bene his brother the duke of Burbon, but this iourne was broken, for the Frenchmen were eased of the paine to come to seeke the Englishmen at home in England, they comming ouer into France, and profsering them battell euen at their owne doores. For the king of England hauing lenied a power of archers, and other men of warre, sent them ouer vnder the leading of his sonne the duke of Lancaster. There went with him in this iourne, the earles of Hereford and Salisburie, the lord Ros, the lord Bassett, the lord Willoughbie, the lord de la Mare, the lord de la Pole, the lord Walter of Spannie, the lord Henrie Percie, the lord Thomas Grantson, sir Alane Burbul, sir Richard Sturrie, & diuerse other. They went ouer about Midsummer. And after they had rested a little, the duke set forthward and rode forth into the countrie, spoiling and harrieng the same, and when he saw time, returned againe to Calis.

The French king being at Roan, heard of the arriual of this armie at Calis, and that his countrie of Picardie was in great danger: he changed his purpose therefore of sending an armie into England, and with all speed appointed that his power should with his brother the duke of Burgognie turne toward Calis, to resist the duke of Lancaster. Wherevpon when the duke of Lancaster heard that the duke of Burgognie was thus comming toward him, he issued forth of Calis, and comming into the ballie beneath the hill of Turneham, there took his field, and fortified the place with strong hedges and rampiers, the better to be able to resist his enemies if they would assaile him. The duke of Burgognie came still forthward, till he approached verie nere to the duke of Lancasters campe, and pight downe his field aloft vpon the hill of Turneham, so that the fronts of both hostes were within lesse than a mile either of other.

There was come to the duke of Lancaster a knight of the marches of Almaine, called sir Robert de Hamur with an hundred speares: but yet the duke of Lancasters host was but one handfull of men, in respect of the huge number of the French armie, wherein were (as Froissard writeth) foure thousand knights beside others. But yet for all his great puissance and number of men, he would not aduenture to assaile the Englishmen in their lodgings, as it was thought he would haue done, but kept himselfe and his men vpon the hill, from the foure and twentieth of August, vnto the twelfth of September, and then dislodged not much to his honour, howsoeuer writers doe ex-fight with the Englishmen: and that when he had sent to his brother for commission either to fight, or to remoune, he was commanded to turne with all speed vnto Paris, and to breake vp his armie for that time. Some there be that write, how that after both these hostes had lien the one against the other a long space, to the repossesse of both chieftains, it chanced that the lord Thomas Beauchampe earle of Warwike came thitherward by sea, to be at the battell, which he heard would shortly follovv betwene the two ar-for feare durst no longer abide, but secretlie in the night departed and fled towards Igedin, and so to Paris, for the which their flight, the duke of Burgognie was after blamed of his brother the French king.

In this meane while, that is to saie, on the euen of the Assumption of our ladie, died that noble princeesse, the ladie Phyllip quene of England. It is said that when she perceived that the most needs depart out of this transitorie life, she desired to speake with the king hir husband, and when he was come to hir with a sorrowfull hart to see hir in that state, she toke him by the hand, and after courteous wordes of inuocation, she required of him to grant hir three requestes.

The first request was, that all such merchants, and other men, with whom she had bargained in any condition, might be answered of all such debts as she owght them, whether they dwelled on this side the sea or beyond.

The second request was, that all such ordinances and promises, as he had made to churches, as well within this realme, as in the parts of the further side the sea, might be performed.

The third request was, that it might please him to chose out none other sepulchre when God should call him out of this world, but beside his at Westminster.

But now to returne to the duke of Lancaster. We shall vnderstand that after the departure of the French armie beside the hill of Turneham, the said duke returned to Calis, and there refreshed himselfe and his people the space of three daies. And then he set forward againe, & with him as marshals of the host, was the earle of Warwike, and the lord Roger Beauchampe, with the lords and knights before remembred. They take their iournie to S. Omers, and by Turwin, and then through the countie of saint Waule, still burning the countrie as they went. They rode not pass thre or foure leages in a daie, and keeping on their waies, they came by saint Riquier, and at the planches under Abnile passed the riuer of Some, and then entered into the countrie of Alinclo, in purpose to go vnto Harfieu, and there to burne the French kings taine. Thus passing forward thorough Alinclo, and the countie of Cwe, they entered into the archbishoppshe of Roan, and marching forth by Dêpe, came vnto Harfieu: but the earle of saint Poule, and the lord of Ffienues constable of France which had cosled the English armie in all this iournie, with a great power of men, was gotten before them, and entered into this towne, so that they knew howe they should but lose their paine, if they did assaile it, and so therefore after they had lien before it three daies, on the fourth day they dislodged, & went backe

This yeare, after that the king had gotten together a great summe of monie, as well by bozowing of the clergie as of the laitie, he leuied an armie, & sent the same over to Calis about Apriillsummer, vnder the gouernance of that worthy cheffaine sir Robert Knolles, accompanied with the L. Fitz Walter, the lord Granton, sir Alaine Burghull, sir John Bourchier, sir William deuille, sir Geoffrey Mourlelepe, and diuerse other noblemen, knights, and worthy capteins. About the same time, the king of England concluded an abstinence of warre with the Scots for the tearme of nine yeares, yet so that the Scots might arme themselves, and at their pleasure serue and take wages, either of the English or French, by reason whereof, sir Robert Knolles had in his companie an hundred speares of the realme of Scotland.

When this armie had lien and rested in Calis about the space of seauen daies, sir Robert Knolles caused euerie man to depart the towne, and to take the fields, marching the first daie nere to the castell of Fienmes, and there lodged for that night. The whole number of this armie was not aboute twelue thousand men. Froissard saith, they were but fiftene hundred speares, & foure thousand archers. Within the castell of Fienmes was the constable of France, that was lord thereof, with such a number of souldiers and men of warre, that the Englishmen thought they should but lose their labour to assaile it. And so they passed forth by Turrouane, and toward Arras, riding not past foure leagues a daie, because of their cariages and footmen. They toke their lodging euer about none, and laie nere vnto great villages.

The French king had furnished all his townes and fortresses in Picardie with strong garrisons of souldiers, to defend the same against all chances that might happen either by siege or sudden assault. The Englishmen therefore thought not good to linger about the winning of anie of the strong townes, but passed by them, waiking or ransoming the countries. At Arras they shewed themselves before the barriers, and when none would issue to skirmish with them, they set fier on the suburbs, & departed. From thence they toke the waie by Baupalmes, and so came into Wermendois, and burnt the towne of Roy. Then went they to Van in Wermendois, into the which all the people of the countie were withdrawn, with such goods as they might carie with them. And in like manner had those done which inhabited about S. Quintine, Peronne, and other strong townes, so that the Englishmen found little abroad, saving the barnes full of coyne for it was after haruett.

Thus they rode saire and easilie, two or three leagues a daie, and sometime to reconer monie of their en-mies, they would compound with them within strong townes, to spare the countie from burning and destruction, for such a summe as they agreed vpon, by which meanes sir Robert Knolles got in that boiage about the summe of an hundred thousand frankes. For the which he was after accused to the king of England, as one that had not dealt iustlie in so doing. In this sort passing the countie, they came before Poion, and after they had rested a while afoze the towne, they went forth waiking and burning the countie, and finallie passed the riuier of Harne, and so entered into Champaigne, and passed the riuier of Aube, and also diuerse times they passed to and fro ouer the riuier of Saine: at length drawing toward Paris, and comming before that citie, they lodged there in the field a day and two nights, and shewed themselves in order of battell before the citie. This was on the twentieth fourth daie of September.

The French king was at the same time within the citie, & might behold out of his lodging of S. Paule, the fiers and smokes that were made in Gassenois, through burning the townes and villages there by the Englishmen, but yet he would suffer none of his people to go forth of the citie, although there was a great power of men of warre within the citie, both of such as had coasted the English armie in all this tourne, and also of other which were come thither by the kings commandement, beside the burgeses, and inhabitants of the citie. When sir Robert Knolles perceiued that he should haue no battell, he departed and drew toward Aniou, where they wan by strength the townes of Waas and Kuellie. But now in the beginning of winter, there fell such discord amongst the English capteins, through couetousnesse and enuie, that finallie they diuided themselves in sunder, greatlie to the displeasure of sir Robert Knolles their generall, who could not rule them.

There was a knight among them named sir John Spinsterworth, that had the leading of one wing of this armie, a good man of his hands (as we call him) but peruerse of mind, and verie deceitfull, and to sir Robert Knolles (to whom he was much beholden) most unfaithfull. This knight, perceiuing the wilfull minds of certeine yong lords and knights there in the armie, that repined at the gouernement of sir Robert Knolles, as the Romans did sometime at the gouernance of Camillus (the cheefe of whom were the lord Granton, the lord Fitz Walter, and others) did his best to picke them forward, founding them in the eare, that it was a great reproch for them being of noble parentage, to serue vnder such an old rascal as he was, each of them being able to guide their enterprise of themselves, without his counsell, by which flattering of them, and disgracing of him, the said Spinsterworth did much mischefe, for

Indeed this sir Robert Knolles was not descended of anie high linage, but bozne in the countie of Chester of meane offpring, neuertheless through his valiant prowesse, and good seruice in warre, growne to such estimation, as he was reputed worthy of all honour due to a noble and skilfull warrfour, so that it was thought the king could not haue made his choise of one more able or sufficient to supplie the roome of a cheffaine, than of him: but yet, although this was most true, his aduise could not be heard, nor the authoritie appointed him by the king beare anie waie. For where he counselled that they should now upon the approaching of winter draw forth of France into Britaine, and there remaine for the winter season, they would not so agree, nor obey his will. Whereby on it came to passe, that sir Berthram de Cleaguin, at that time newlie made constable of France, understanding this diuision to grow amongst the Englishmen, and that they were divided into parts, set upon them so much to their disadvantage, that he distressed them, and took of due the more part of them: but sir Robert Knols with the flower of the archers and men of warre went into Britaine, and there saved himselfe, and those that followed him. ¶ Here you may see, how those that before through amitie and good agreement were of such force as their enemies durst not once assaile to annoie them, now by strife and dissention among themselves were slaine or taken by the same enemies, and brought to confusion. To which purpose it is properlie and trulie said, Lex odium egerit, chaos concordia stringit.

In this meane time that sir Robert Knols made this voyage through the realme of France, the prince of Wales laid siege to the citie of Limoges, which was revolted to the Frenchmen. There were with him at the laying of this siege, his brethren, the duke of Lancaster, and the earle of Cambridge, sir Guichard Dangle, sir Lois de Harecourt, the lord of Pons, the lord of Partenaie, the lord of Pinane, the lord of Annaibouton, sir Percinall de Coulongne, sir Gessrie de Argenton, Poitouins: and of Gascoignes, the lord of Mountferrant, the lord de Chaumont, the lord de Longueren, sir Amerie de Tharse, the lords of Donniers, Pucident de l'Esparre, the Soudich de Lestrade, the lord of Cerond, and manie other: of Englishmen there were, sir Thomas Percie, the lord Roos, the lord William Beauchampe, sir Michaele de la Pole, sir Stephan Goullenton, sir Richard Donchardon, sir Baldwin Freuille, sir Simon Burle, sir Dangouffe, sir John Deuereux, sir William Penille or (as some copies haue) Peuille, and manie other. There was also sir Cusace Dambreticourt, and of the companions, sir Perducas Dalbreth, who in the beginning of these warres being turned French, was by the persuation of sir Robert Knols procured to returne againe to the princes service before the siege of Durmelle.

The prince being thus accompanied with these worthy capteins and men of armes, to the number of twelue hundred, beside a thousand archers and other footmen, indued by all waies he could deuise to indamage them within. In the end he caused the walles to be undermined, and quite reuerfed into the ditch, then giuing assault, entered by the breach, and made an huge slaughter of them within, in so much that of men, women, and children (for none were spared in respect of age or sex) there were slaine and beheaded that date about thre thousand. The bishop with certeine knights and capteins were taken and had their liues granted, though the bishop was in great danger to haue lost his head, because he was a cheefe dower in yielding the citie before unto the Frenchmen.

Whilest the prince lay at siege before Limoges (a little before he wane it) thither came to him his brethren, the duke of Lancaster, and the earle of Cambridge, the lord Roos, sir Michaele de la Pole, sir Robert Roos, sir John Saintlo, and sir William Beauchampe, with a faire number of men of war, spears, and archers. The prince then after he had wane Limoges, and executed some crueltie there to the terror of other; his maladie which still continued upon him, rather increased than diminished, so that he was aduised by physicians to returne into England, in hope that change of aire should restore him to health. For the which consideration and other causes of businesse which he had to do with his father, touching certeine weightie affaires he took the sea, and came ouer into England, leaving the gouernement of Aquitaine unto his brother the duke of Lancaster, as his lieutenant there: he landed at Plimmouth in the beginning of Januarie.

Moreouer in this 44 yeare of king Edward, the king of Nauarre came ouer into England, and at Claringdon found the king, and there talked with him of such matters as they had to conclude betwixt them two. But for that the king of Nauarre could not assure the king of such couenants as should haue passed betwixt them two, it was not thought meet by the kings counsell to worke too far upon his bare word, that had before time shewed apparant proofes of his inconstant dealing. And suerlie this doubt arose not without cause, as his doings shortly after declared: for although he seemed now at this present to be a verie enimie to the French king, yet shortly after he was reconciled to him againe, and became his great friend for the time it lasted. This yeare in the moneth of Februarie was a parlement called, in the which there was demanded of the spiritualtie a subsidie of fiftie thousand pounds, and as much of the laitie. The tempozall men some agreed to that payment, but the cleargie excused themselves with faire words and shifting answers: in somuch that the king took displeasure with them, and depozed certeine spirituall men from their offices of dignitie, as the chancelloz, the priuie seale, the tresuroz, and such others, in whose romes he placed tempozall men.

The bishop of Winchester, and the bishop of Beauuois being both cardinals, were put in commission by pope Gregorie the eleuenth to treat betwixt the kings of England and France for a peace. But albeit they did their indeuour therein, and moued both kings to the uttermost of their powers, yet their motions took none effect, and therefore was the warre pursued to the uttermost betwixt the parties, & namely in Aquitaine, where the fortresses were so intermedled one with another, some English, and some French, that one knew not how to beware of another, nor to auoid the danger, so that the countrie of Poitou and other the marches thereabout were in great tribulation. Sir Robert Knols, sir Thomas Spenser, sir John Criuet, and sir Hugh Hastings, diuiding their powers insunder, went to recouer towines, some in one quarter, and some in another, and certeine they assaied, but preuailed not: the inhabitants doubting to be punished for their vntuths, made such stout resistance.

After this, the duke of Lancaster appointed sir Robert Knols to repaire againe to Calis, and by the waie (if occasion serued) to attempt the recouerie of Donstien. Sir Robert taking his iourne through France by Paris, came into the marches of Picardie: and because in comparison to this man, all the English capteins were little feared of the Frenchmen, sir Berthram de Cleaquin, the constable of France, leaving the fortresses in the marches of Aquitaine sufficientlie stocked with men of warre and munition, followed sir Robert Knols, still readie to assaile the hindermost companies, or else to set on the sides of his enimies. So that there chanced manie skirmishes betwixt them, & manie men were slaine on both parts; but at length, when sir Robert Knols saw no likelihood to atchine his purposed intent in recouerie of the towines of Donstien, as Abuille and other, he drew streight to Calis, and the constable retired backe into France.

In this 46 yeare, sir Robert Ashton was sent into Ireland as lord deputie there, and in the same yeare, the duke of Lancaster being as then a widower, married the ladie Constance eldest daughter to Peter king of Spaine, which was slaine by his bastard brother Henrie (as before ye haue heard.) ¶ Also the lord Edmund earle of Cambridge married the ladie Isabel, sister to the same Constance. ¶ Their other sister named Beatrice, affianced to Don Ferdinando, son to Peter king of Portugale, was departed this life a little before this time at Baionne, where they were all three left as hostages by their father, when the prince went to bring him home into his countrie (as before ye may read.) Froissard writeth, that the duke married the ladie Constance in Gascoigne, and that shortly after he returned into England with his said wife and his sister, leaving the capitall de Buesz, and other lordes of Gascoigne and Poitou in charge with the rule of those countreies. By reason of that marriage, the duke of Lancaster, as in right of his wife being the elder sister, caused himselfe to be intituled king of Castile, and his said wife quene of the same realme.

The earle of Hereford being sent to the sea, with certaine ships of warre, was encountered by the Flemish fleet, before an haven in Britaine called the Baie, where was fought a fore battell, and long continued for the space of three houres: howbeit finally the victorie above with the Englishmen, notwithstanding that the Flemings were more in number, and better provided for the matter. There were taken of them five and twentie ships, with their Admirall John Peterfon. They had bene at Rochell for wine, and now were come to the Baie for salt upon their returne homeward, and hearing that the Englishmen would come that waie, staid for them, and first gave the onset. For ye must remember, that by reason that the earle of Flanders had married his daughter to the duke of Burgognie, which he had first promised to the earle of Cambridge, there was no perfect friendship betwixt the realme of England, and the countreies of the said earle of Flanders.

Sir Guichard Dangle a knight of Poitou, that was come over with the duke of Lancaster, to procure the king to send some new aid into Aquitaine, was for his approved valiance and tried truth to the king of England, made knight of the garter. And moreover at his instance the king rigged a navie of ships, and appointed the earle of Penbroke as general, to saile with the same into Aquitaine, and there to remove the siege which the Frenchmen had laid to Rochell. The earle according to his commission toke the sea with a fleet of fortie ships prepared for him: but yet he could enter the haven of Rochell, he was assailed by an huge fleet of Spaniards, and there vanquished, taken prisoner, & led into Spaine. The Spaniards had for captains foure skillfull warriours, Ambrose Bonquenege, Cabete de Wake or Wakebent, Dom Ferand du Bion, and Rodrigo de la Rochell, who had under their government fortie great carruells, and thirtene trim barkes thoroughly furnished and appointed with good mariners and men of warre.

The earle of Penbroke had with him nothing the like number of ships, nor men: for (as Froissard writeth) he had not past two and twentie knights with him, or (as other haue) not past twelve, being for the more part of his owne retinue or household: and yet those few Englishmen and Poitouvins that were there with him, bare themselves right valiantlie, and fought it out to the uttermost. There were slaine sir Simon Housagre, sir John de Portague, and sir John Tushet; and there were taken prisoners, besides the earle himselfe, sir Robert Huxford, sir John Curson, sir Dhes de Grandson, sir Guichard Dangle, the lord of Pinane, sir John de Criueres, sir Jaques de Surgiteres, the lord of Annaibouton, sir John de Hardane, and others. This battell was fought on Epiphanner euen, in this sir and fortith yeare of king Edwards reigne. The earle had (as Froissard writeth) treasure with him, to haue waged three thousand men of warre, which neuer did arise man god, for (as he was informed) the ship wherein he was aboard, perished with diuerse other being burnt or sunke. The English writers saie, that it was no maruell though this mishap chanced vnto him, because he had in parlement spoken against men of the church, in giuing counsell that they might be constrained to paie greuous subsidies, towards the maintenance of the kings warre, and that no lesse beaue payments and subsidies should be imposed vpon them, than vpon the secular sort. Wherein he seemed to bewraie a malicious mind against the clergie, who as in no age they haue wanted foes, so in his time they found few friends, being a generation appointed and ordeined in their cradels to be condemned of the world, speciallie of great men, of whose sauour and goodwill it is truelie & rightlie said, Gratia magnatum nescit habere statum.

By reason of this misfortune thus happened to the English fleet, the Frenchmen recovered manie towines and castels out of the Englishmens hands, in the countreies of Poitou, Saintonge, Limosin, and other the marches of Aquitaine.

About the same time the French king sent foure thousand men to the sea, vnder the guiding of one Yuans a banished welsh gentleman, the which landing in the Ile of Gernesey, was encountered by the captain of that Ile called sir Edmund Rous, who had gathered eight hundred men of his owne souldiers together, with them of the Ile, and boldlie gaue battell to the Frenchmen: but in the end the Englishmen were discomfited, and foure hundred of them slaine, so that sir Edmund Rous fled into the castell of Coynet, & was there besieged by the said Yuans, till the French king sent to him to come backe from thence, and so he did, leaving the castell of Coynet, and sir Edmund Rous within it as he found him. The Frenchmen this yeare recovered the citie of Poitiers, Rochell also, and the most part of all Poitou, and finally laid siege to Towars in Poitou, wherein a great number of the lordes of that countrie were inclosed, the which fell to a composition with the Frenchmen to haue an abstinence of warre for themselves, and their lands, till the feast of saint Michael next ensuing, which should be in the yeare 1362. And in the meane time they sent to the king of England their souereigne lord, to certifie him what conditions they had agreed vnto, that if they were not aided by him, or by one of his sonnes within the said tearme, then they to yeld them and their lands to the obedience of the French king.

Not long before this, the capitall of Buesz was taken prisoner, and sir Thomas Percie, with diuerse other Englishmen and Gascoignes before Soubise by sir Yuans of Wales and other French captains, so that the countreies of Poitou and Saintonge were in great danger to be quite lost, if speedie succours came not in time. Whereupon king Edward advertised of that agreement which they within Towars had made, raised an armie, rigged his ships, and in August toke the sea, purposing to come before the day assigned, to the succours of that fortress: but the wind continued for the space of nine weekes contrary vnto his intent, that he was still driuen backe and could not get forward toward the coast of Rochell, where he thought to haue landed, so that finally when the daie of relieving Towars came, he nor any of his sonnes could appeare in those parts, and so to his great displeasure he returned home, and licensed all his people to depart to their houses. By this means was Towars deliuered to the Frenchmen, which ceased not in such occasions of advantage to take time, and follow the steps of prosperous fortune.

About this season the duke of Britaine being sore displeased in his mind, that the Englishmen suffer

He therefore meaning by one way or other to further the king of England his quarell, and fearing to be attached by his owne subiects, and sent to Paris, dispatched messengers to R. Edward, requiring him to send some power of men of warre into Britaine, to defend him against the malice of such as were altogether French and enemies to England.

King Edward forthwith sent ouer the lord Percill, with foure hundred men of armes, and as manie archers, the which arriving at saint Matthewes de sine Poterne, remained there all the winter. Whereupon the Britaines being soze offended therewith, closed their townes and fortresses against their duke, and shewed much euill towards him. The constable of France sir Berthram de Cleaquin, laicng siege to the towne and castell of Sireth in Poitou, discomfited a number of Englishmen that came to raise his siege, by means whereof he got not onelie Sireth, but also Pfort, Lucignen, and all other the townes and fortresses which the Englishmen held till that day within Poitou, Kaintonge, and Rochelois. Shortly after this, the constable returned into France, and was appointed by the king there to go with an armie of men of warre into Britaine, and there to take into his hands all such townes and fortresses as belonged to the duke of Britaine, because he had alied himselfe with the king of England, and receiued Englishmen into his countrie, to the preiudice of the realme of France.

The duke being aduertised of the constables coming, was counselled by sir Robert Anols (whom the king of England had sent to aid him) that he should passe ouer into England, and there to be a suter in his owne cause for moze aid to be sent into Britaine, to resist the Frenchmen that now sought to bring the whole countrie into their possession. The duke inclining to this aduise, went ouer into England, and in the meane time the constable came and tooke the most part of all the townes and fortresses of that duchie, except Bress, where sir Robert Anols was, and certeine other. The earle of Salisburie with a great nauie of ships, well furnished with men of armes and archers, laie vpon the coast of Britaine all that time, and greatlie comforted them within Bress, in so much that he came on land, and offered battell to the constable if he would haue come forthward & receiued it.

In the moneth of Iulie in this seuen and fourtith yeare of king Edwards reigne, the duke of Lancaster was sent ouer into Calis with an armie of thirtie thousand men (as some write) but as Froissard saith, they were but thirtene thousand, as thre thousand men of armes, and ten thousand archers. This voiage had bene in preparing for the space of thre yeares before. The duke of Britaine was there with them, and of the English nobilitie, beside the duke of Lancaster that was their generall, there were the earles of Warwike, Stafford and Suffolke, the lord Edward Spenser that was constable of the host, the lordes Willoughbie, de la Pole, Basset, and diuerse others. Of knights, sir Henrie Percie, sir Iewes Clifford, sir William Beauchampe, the Chanon Robertfart, Walter Helwet, sir Hugh Caluerlie, sir Stephan Coughington, sir Richard Ponchardon, and manie other.

When they had made readie their cariages and other things necessarie for such a iourne which they had taken in hand, that is to say, to passe through the realme of France into Burdeaur, they set forthward, hauing their armie diuided into thre battels. The earles of Warwike and Suffolke did lead the foreward: the two dukes of Lancaster and Britaine, the middle ward or battell, and the rereward was gouerned by the lord Spenser constable of the host. They passed by S. Omers, by Curronne, and coasted the countrie of Arthois, and passed the water of Some at Corbie. They destroyed the countries as they went, and marched not past thre leagues a day. They assailed none of the strong townes, nor fortresses. For the French king had so stuffed them with notable numbers of men of warre, that they perceiued they should trauell in vaine about the winning of them. At Roy in Hermandois, they rested them seuen daies, and at their departure set fire on the towne, because they could not win the church which was kept against them. From thence they drew towards Laon, and so marched forthward, passing the riuers of S. Saire, S. Saine, S. Saine, and S. Saine. The Frenchmen coasted them, but durst not approch to giue them battell.

Peere to Ribamont, about 80 Englishmen of sir Hugh Caluerlies band were distressed by 120 Frenchmen: & likewise beside Soissons, 120 English speares, or (as other writers haue) fiftie speares, and twentie archers were vanquished by a Burgonian knight called sir John de Tienne, that had with him thre hundred French speares. Of moze hurt by anie encounters I read not that the Englishmen sustained in this volage. For the Frenchmen kept them aloof, and meant not to fight with their enemies, but onelie to keepe them from bittels, and fetching of forage abroad, by reason whereof the Englishmen lost manie horses, and were in dead bidden to great scarcitie of bittels. When they had passed the riuier of Loire, and were come into the countrie of Berrie, they vnderstood how the Frenchmen laid themselves in sundrie ambushes to distresse them, if they might espie the aduantage: but the duke of Lancaster placing his light horsemen, with part of the archers in the foreward, and in the battell the whole force of his footmen with the men at armes, diuided into wings to coner that battell, wherein he himselfe was, the residue of the horsemen with the rest of the archers he appointed to the rereward, and so causing them to keepe close together, marched forth till he came into Poitou, & then in reuenge of the Poitouins that had revolted from the English obedience, he began a new spoile, killing the people, wasting the countrie, and burning the houses and buildings euerie where as he passed, & so finally about Christmas came to Burdeaur.

Whilest the duke of Lancaster was thus passing through the realme of France, pope Gregorie the eleventh sent the archbishop of Hauenna and the bishop of Carpentras as legats from him, to treat for a peace betwixt the realms of England and France. They rode to & fro betwixt the French king and his brethren, and the duke of Lancaster: but the duke and the Englishmen kept on their waie, and so finally keeping forwards about Christmas came to Burdeaur. The legats pursued their treatie, but the parties were so hard, that no reasonable offers would be taken. The two dukes of Lancaster and Britaine laie in Burdeaur all the residue of the winter, and the Lent following. The same yeare that the duke of Lancaster made this iourne thorough France, the king of England sent certeine ambassadors to the pope, requiring him not to meddle with the reservations of benefices within his realme of England, but that those which were elect bishops might inioy their sees, and be confirmed of their metropolitane, metropolitane and archbishop, as of ancient time they had bene accustomed.

The pope would not at that present determine any thing herein, but commanded them that were sent, that they should certifie him againe of the kings pleasure and further meaning, in those articles and other touching him and his realme. Also this yeare it was decreed in parlement, that cathedrall churches might inioy the right of their elections, and that the king should not hinder them that were chosen, but rather helpe them to their confirmations. ¶ In the same parlement was granted to the king a disline of the cleargie, and a fiftenth of the laitie. ¶ Moreover at the sute of the popes legats, a respite of war was granted betwixt the kings of England and France, but so that the Englishmen lost in Calcoine a great number of castles and towines, by reason of a composition made before, that if they were not rescued by the middes of August, they should then yield themselves French: and because the truce was agreed upon to indure till the last of August, the Englishmen took no heed to the matter. It was further agreed upon, that in the beginning of September, there should meet in the marches of Picardie, the duke of Lancaster, and other of the English part, as commissioners to intreat of peace; and the duke of Anion and other on the French part, the popes legat to be there also as mediator. When this agreement was thus accorded, the duke of Lancaster, and the duke of Britaine, with the earls of Warwike, Suffolke and Stafford, the lords Spenser, Willoughbie and others, took the sea at Burdeaur the eight of Julie, and returned into England.

This yeare the fifth of June, died William Willelmy archbishop of Canturburie, after whose death the monks chose to that see the cardinal of Winchester, with which election the king was nothing contented, so that after much monie spent by the monks to obtaine their purpose, at length they were disappointed, and doctor Simon Sudberie was admitted to that dignitie, who before was bishop of London, being the seauen and fiftith archbishop that had ruled that see. He was chosen by the appointment of the king, and consent of the pope. For alredie was that decre woone out of vse, whereby the elections of bishops haue rested in the voices of them of the cathedrall church: for not onelie this Simon archbishop of Canturburie, but other also were ordeined bishops from thenceforth, by the will and authoritie of the popes and kings of this realme, till at length it came to passe, that onelie the kings instituted bishops, and the bishops ordeined other gouernours vnder them of meaner degrees.

Thus the popes within a while lost all their authoritie, which they had before time within this realme in the appointing of bishops, and other rulers of churches; and in like manner also they lost shortly after their authoritie of leuening tenths of spirituall promotions, the which they in former times had vsed, to the great detriment of the realme, which lost nothing by this new ordinance: for the English people were not compelled afterwards to depart with their monie vnto strangers, so largelie as before, to content the greedinesse of that conuozant generation of Romanists, whose insatiable desires would admit no stint, as infected with the droppe of filthy auarice, for omnia des cupido sua non perit inde cupido;

Quo plus sunt pot. e. plus succuntur aqua.

This restraining reformation concerned the benefit of the whole land verie much: for the third was the first that caused an act to be made, that none vnder a great penaltie should seeke to obtaine any spirituall promotions within this realme of the pope, or by any other lutes to his court, except by waie of appeale: and that those that were the aiders of any such offenders against this act, should run in danger of the same paine, which act by those kings that succeeded was not onelie commanded to be kept, but also confirmed with new penalties, and is called the statute of Prymunie.

About Candlemasse there met at Buges as commissioners for the king of England, the duke of Lancaster, the earle of Salisburie, and the bishop of London. For the French king, the dukes of Anion, and Burgognie, the earle of Salezbuce, and the bishop of Amiens with others. Finally, when they could not agree upon any good conclusion for peace, they accorded upon a truce, to indure to the first of Maie next ensuing in all the marches of Calis, and vp to the water of Some; but the other places were at libertie to be still in warre: by report of other writers, the truce was agreed vpon to continue till the feast of All saints next ensuing. About the same time that the foresaid commissioners were at Buges intreating of peace, the duke of Britaine did so much with his father in law king Edward, that about the beginning of Aprill he sent ouer with him into Britaine the earles of Cambridge, March, Warwike, and Stafford, the lord Spenser, sir Thomas Holland, sir Nicholas Camois, sir Edward Twiford, sir Richard Bonchardon, sir John Lellesles, sir Thomas Grandson, sir Hugh Hastings, and diuerse other worthie captains with a power of three thousand archers, and two thousand men of armes, all verie well furnished to fight.

They landed at saint Mattheus or Mahe de fine Poterne, where they took the castell by force, and the towne by surrender. From thence they went to Pole de Lion, and wan it likewise by force of assault, and then went to Bieu de Clair, a towne stronglie fenced, and well manned. In hope yet to win it, the duke of Britaine and the English lords laid siege to it, but hearing that an English knight, one sir John Deureux was besieged in a fortrell which he had newlie made, by the vicount of Roan, the L. Clifton, and other of the French part, they raised from Bieu de Clair, and hastied forward to the succor of sir John Deureux, earnestlie wishing to find their enemies in the field, that they might giue them battell: but the British lords hearing that the duke and the Englishmen approached, made no longer abode, but got them with all speed vnto Campellie a towne of great strength not farre off, and therein closed themselves for their more safetie. The duke of Britaine hearing that they were fled thither, folloved them, and laid siege round about the towne, inforcing himselfe to obtaine the place, and so had done in deed by all likelihood verie shortly, if at the same time, by reason of a truce taken for twelue moneths, he had not bene commanded by the duke of Lancaster, without delaye to cease his war, and breake vp his campe: as he did.

There were sundrie meetings of the commissioners for this treatie of peace, and still they took longer time for continuance of the truce. And because that Britaine and all the other countreies of France (as should seme) were included in this truce, it seemeth that this was some second truce, and not the first truce, which included onelie the marches of Calis, and those parts vp to the water of Some. But howebeit it was, the duke of Britaine being in a great forwardnesse to haue recovered his duchie out of the Frenchmens hands, and to haue reduced his rebellious subiects vnder due obersance againe, was not by this truce concluded out of time, greatlie disappointed, and so brake vp his siege from before Campellie, and sent home the English armie. He went himselfe to Aulroie, where his wife was; and taking order for the fortifying and keeping of those places, which were in his possession, he came backe againe into England, and brought his wife with him.

A little before the concluding of this truce, the Englishmen and others within the fortress of saint Sauour le vicount, in the Ile or rather Close (as they call it) of Constantine, which had bene long besieged, made a composition, that if they were not rescued by a certaine daie, then should they yeld by the place to the Frenchmen. Now because this truce was agreed before the daie appointed for the rescue of that place, with condition that either part should intop and hold that which at that present they had in possession, during the terme of the truce; the Englishmen thought that saint Sauour le vicount should be saved by reason of that treatie: but the Frenchmen to the contrarye avouched, that the first covenant ought to passe the last ordinance. So that when the daie approached, the French king sent thither sir thousand speares, knights, and esquires, beside other people: and because none appeared to giue them battell, they had the towne deliuered to them.

In this 49 yeare of E. Edwards reigne, a great death chanced in this land, and in diuerse other countries, so that innumerable numbers of people died and perished of that contagious sicknesse. Amongst other the lord Edward Spenser died the same yeare, a man of great renowne and valiantnesse. Also the earle of Penbroke, hauing compounded for his ransom, as he was vpon his returne from Spaine, comming homewards through France, he fell sicke, and being brought in an hoastelitter to Arras, he died there, on the 16 daie of Aprill, leaving a sonne behind him not past two yeares of age, begot of the countesse his wife called Anne, daughter vnto the lord Walter de Spennie. Polydor mistaking the matter, saith that Marie the countesse of Penbroke, who builded Penbroke hall in Cambridge, was wife to this John Hastings earle of Penbroke, whereas in deed she was wife to his ancesor Aimer de Valence earle of Penbroke (as John Stow in his summarie hath trulie noted.) She was daughter to Guy earle of Saint Polle, a worthy ladie and a vertuous, tendering so much the wealthefull state of this land (a great part wherof consisteth in the good bringing vp of youth, and training them to the knowledge of learning) that for maintenance of students she began the foresaid commendable foundation, about the yeare of Christ 1343, vpon a plot of ground that was hir owne, hauing purchased licence thereto of the king, to whom she was of kin.

During that greuous mortalitie and cruell pestilence before remembred, the pope at the instant request of the English cardinals, granted vnto all those that died in England, being thriuen and repentant of their sinnes, cleane remission of the same, by two buls inclosed vnder lead. The duke of Lancaster about the feast of All saints met with the French commissioners againe at Wuges. There was with him the duke of Britaine, the earle of Salisburie, and the bishop of London. For the French king there appeared the duke of Burgognie, the earle of Salebrich, and the bishop of Amiens. And at saint Omers laie the duke of Aniou, the archbishop of Rauenens, and the bishop of Carpentras toke great paine to go to and fro betwene the parties: but they were so far at ods in their demands, and as it were of set purpose on the French behalfe, that no good could be done betwixt them. The French king required to haue Calis rased, and to haue againe fourtene hundred thousand franks, which were paid for the ransom of king John. The king of England demanded to haue all the lands restored to him in Gascoigne and Guienclerelle exempt of all reloxis. So when nothing could be concluded touching a small peace, the truce was renewed to indure till the feast of St. John Baptist next ensuing, which should be in the yeare 1376.

In this fiftith yeare, king Edward assembled his high court of parlement at Westmister, in the which was demanded a subsidie of the commons for the defense of the kings dominions against his enemies. Wherevnto answer was made by the common house, that they might no longer beare such charges, considering the manifold burthens by them suffered in time past. And further they said, it was well knowne the king was rich enough to withstand his enemies, if his monie and treasure were well imploied: but the land had bene of long time euill guided by euill officers, so that the same could not be stored with chaffer, merchandize, or other riches. The commons also declared whom they toke and iudged to be chiefe causer of this disorder, as the duke of Lancaster, & the L. Latimer lord chamberleine to the king; also dame Alice Perers, whom the king had long time kept to his concubine; and also one named sir Richard Sturrie, by whose sinister meanes and euill counsell the king was misled, and the land euill gouerned. Wherefore the commons by the mouth of their speaker sir Piers de la Mere, required that those persons might be remoued from the king, and other moze discreet set in their romes about his person, and so put in authoritie, that they might see to his honour and weale of the realme, moze than the other had done before them.

This request of the commons by support of the prince was allowed, and granted, so that the said persons and other of their affinitie were commanded to depart the court, and other (such as were thought meet by the prince, and the sage pères of the realme) were placed in their steads. Shortly after, the commons granted to the king his whole request, so that he had of euerie person, man and woman, being above the age of fourtene yeares, foure pence, poze people that liued of almeste onelie excepted. Likewise the cleargie granted, that of euerie beneficed man, the king should haue twelue pence, and of euerie priest not beneficed foure pence (the foure orders of friers onelie excepted.) But per this monie could be leuied, the king was constrained to borrow certaine great summes in sundrie places, and therefore he sent to the cite of London for foure thousand pounds. And because Adam Staple the mayor was not diligent in furthering that lone, he was by the kings commandement discharged on the 22 daie of March, and Richard Whittington mercer chosen in his place.

On the eight of June being Trinitie sundae (the parlement yet continuing) that noble and famous prince Edward the kings sonne departed this life within the kings palace at Westmister. His bodie was conueied to Cantarburie with great solemnitie, and there honozable buried. He died in the 46th yeare of his age: a prince of such excellent demeanour, so valiant, wise and politike in his doings, that the verie and perfect representation of knightlyd appeared most liuelie in his person, whilest he liued, so that the losse of him stroke a generall sorrow into the hearts of all the English nation. For such was his towardeesse, or rather perfection in princelie gouernement, that if he had liued and attained to the crowne, euerie man iudged that he would surely haue excelled the glorious renowne of all his ancesors. This princes death is briefely touched by C. Okland, who (after mention made of the great victories atchieued by his father the king against his enemies, and concluding him to be verie happy and fortunate in the issue of his attempts) saith upon safe keeping of that towne, as deputie there. The earle of Salisburie, and the other commissioners returned into England, and with them the duke of Britaine. On the twelfth day of Aprill this yere, one sir John Spenserworth knight, was hanged, beheaded, and quartered at Tiboyne, being first condemned and adjudged to suffer that execution before the maior of London, and other the kings iustices in the Guildhall, for treason by him committed, in defrauding souldiers of their wages: for where he had receiued great summes of monie to make paiment thereof to them, he retained the same to his owne vse.

Howeuer (as in the fortye foure yere of this king yee haue heard) he was the chiefe procurer and setter forward of the dissention that rose in the armie, which vnder the leading of sir Robert Knolles was sent into France. And then in that iournie he had lost most of his men, and was escaped himselfe into England, he laid all the blame on sir Robert Knolles, accusing him to the king of heinous treason; so as the king took no small displeasure against the said sir Robert, insomuch that he durst not returne into England, till he had pacified the kings wrath with monie, and that the knowne fidelitie of the man had warranted him against the malicious and untrue suggestions of his enemies. Whereupon the said Spenserworth perceiuing his craft to want the wished successe, he fled to the French king, and conspiring with him to annoie the realme of England by bringing the Spanishe naute to inuade the same, at length he was taken in the towne of Dampsona in Flaunde, and brought hacke into England, where he tasted the deserued fruit of his contriued treason (as before yee haue heard.)

About this season, there rose in the vniuersitie of Orenford a learned man John Wicliffe, bozne in the north parts, who being a secular prest, and a student in diuinitie, began to propone certeine conclusions greatlie contrarie to the doctrine of the church in those daies established, speciallie he argued against monks, and other men of religion that inioined great riches, and large possessions. There were diuerse that gaue good eare to him, insomuch that sundrie learned men of that vniuersitie preached and set forth the doctrine that he taught. Amongst other articles which they held, these were the chiefe and principall.

Thom. Walf.
John Wicliffe.

1 That the sacrament of the altar, after consecration, was not the bodie of Christ, but a figure thereof.

The chiefe articles preached by Wic-

2 That the church of Rome was no moze head of the vniuersall church than any one other, no moze authoritie was giuen by Christ vnto Peter, than to anie other of the apostles, and that the pope had no moze power in the keyes of the church than anie other prest whatsoever.

3 That temporall lords might both lawfullie and meritoriously take the temporall goods and reuenues from the church, if it offended; and if anie temporall lord knewe the church to offend, he was bound vnder paine of damnation to take from it the temporalties.

4 That the gospel is sufficient in this life to direct by rule enerie christian man.

5 That all other rules of saints, vnder the observing whereof diuers religious doe liue, ad no moze perfection to the gospel, than washing ouer with linc doth the wall.

6 That the pope, noz anie other prelat of the church, ought to haue anie prisons wherein to punish offenders.

These and manie other opinions did these men hold and mainteine, and diuerse lords and great men

The French king kept his obsequie in most reuerend wise, in the chapel of his palace at Paris. After his death, the king called to him againe the foresaid persons, that had bene from him remoued, and the said sir Peter de la Mere that was speaker in the parlement (as before yee haue heard) for his eloquence shewed in reproving the misgouernment of the said persons (and namelic of the said dame Alice Beres) was now committed to prison within the castell of Nottingham. About the same time the truce was againe prolonged till the first daie of Aprill next following. King Edward, after the deceasse of his sonne prince Edward, created the lord Richard, sonne to the said prince, as heire to him, prince of Wales, and gaue to him the earldomes of Chester & Coznewall. Howeuer, because the king waxed feeble and sicklie through languor (as some suppose) conceiued for the death of his sonne, he appointed the rule of the reline to his sonne the duke of Lancaster, ordeining him as gouernour vnder him, and so he continued during his fathers life.

A great riot happened betwixt the seruants of the earle of Marlowe, and the tenants of the abbatt of Cussham, so that manie of the said abbatts seruants were slaine and hurt. The fish-ponds and warrens belonging to the abbie were broken and spoiled, so that greater hurt would haue followed thereof, if the kings letters had not bene sent downe to the earle, commanding him to steie his men from such misdeemeanours. All the nobles of the realme were caused to sweare, that after the kings decease they shuld admit and mainteine Richard prince of Wales for their king and soueraigne lord. And vpon Chrismasse day, the king caused him to sit at his table aboue all his owne children, in high estate, as representing the personage of the heire apparant to the crowne.

This yere being the one and fiftith and last of king Edwards reigne, there were sent againe to Hugues as commissioners to treat of peace on the part of king Edward, John lord Cobham, the bishop of Hereford, and the maior of London. And for the French part thither came the earle of Salezbuch, monsieur de Chatillon, and Willibert Lespoit. And still the two legats were present as mediators betwixt the parties, mouing a marriage to be had, betwixt Richard prince of Wales, and the ladie Marie, daughter to the French king. But they departed in sunder for this time without anie conclusion. But shortly after in Lent following, there was a secret meeting appointed to be had at Montrenill by the sea, whither came from the king of England, sir Richard Dangle a Polaconne, sir Richard Stan, & Geoffrie Chauncer. For the French king there appeared the lord Courcie, and others. These commissioners treated a long season concerning the marriage, and when they had vnderstanding and felt each others meaning, they departed and made report of the same to their masters. The truce was againe prolonged till the first daie of Maie.

And in the meane time, the earle of Salisburie, the bishop of saint Danie lord chancellour of England, and the bishop of Hereford went ouer to Calis. In like case the lord of Courcie, and sir William Dozman chancellour of France came to Montrenill. But they durst not meet at anie indifferent place on the frontiers, for the doubt that either partie had of other, for anie thing the legats could saie or do. Thus these commissioners abode in that state till the truce was expired. And when the warre was open, then sir Hugh Caluerie was sent ouer to Calis, to remaine of the land favoured their cause. But when these conclusions were brought before the pope, he condemned the number of 23 of those articles as vain and heretical, directing his bulls to the archbishop of Canturburie, and to the bishop of London, that they should cause the said Wicliffe to be apprehended, and examined upon the said conclusions, which they did in presence of the duke of Lancaster, and the lord Percie, and hearing his declaration, commanded him to silence, and in no wise to deale with those matters from thenceforth, so that for a time, both he and his fellows kept silence: but after at the contemplation of diverse of the temporall lords, they preached and set forth their doctrine againe.

Wicliffe & his fellows maintained by certain lords.

The same day that Wicliffe was convented thus at London, before the bishops and other lords, thorough a word spoken in reproch by the duke of Lancaster unto the bishop of London, straightwaies the Londoners getting them to armour, meant to haue slaine the duke, & if the bishop had not staid them, they had surely set fire on the dukes house at the Savoy: and with much ado might the bishop quiet them. Among other reprochfull parts which in despite of the duke they committed, they caused his armes in the publike street to be reuerfed as if he had bene a traitor, or some notorious offender. The duke and the lord Henrie Percie, whom the citizens sought in his owne house to haue slaine him, if he had been found, hearing of this riotous stir and rebellious commotion, forsooke their dinner and fled to Benington, where the lord Richard, sonne to the prince, together with his mother then remained, exhibiting before their presence, a grievous complaint of the opprobrious injuries done unto them, by the wilfull outrage of the Londoners. For this and other causes, the citizens were sore hated of the duke, in so much that he caused the maior & aldermen that then ruled to be discharged of their offices, and other put in their places.

The duke of Lancaster in danger by the Londoners.

The lord Percie.

The king being more grievously vexed with sickness from daie to daie, either increasing by the course thereof, or renewed by some new surfeit, finally this peace departed out of this transitorie life at his manour of Sheene, now called Richmond, the 21 daie of June, in the yeare of our Lord 1377, after he had liued 65 yeares, & reigned fiftie yeares, foure moneths, & 28 daies. His corpe was conueied from Sheene by his fourre sonnes, namelie Lionell duke of Clarence, John of Gant duke of Lancaster, Edmund of Langlie duke of Yorke, and Thomas of Woodstoke earle of Cambridge, with other nobles of the realme, and solemnlie interred within Westminister church, with this epitaph in his memoriall:

Hic decus Anglorum, flos regum praeclitorum, Forma futurorum, rex clemens, pax populorum, Tertium Edvardus, regni complens subileum, Inuictus parvis, pollens bellis Achabeum.

Tho. Walsl.
The deceasse of K. Edward the third.

Fabian, pag. 262, 263.

His issue.

He had issue by his wife quene Philip 7 sonnes, Edward prince of Wales, William of Hatfield that died young, Lionell duke of Clarence, John of Gant duke of Lancaster, Edmund of Langlie earle of Cambridge & after created duke of Yorke, Thomas of Woodstoke erle of Buckingham after made duke of Glocester, and an other William which died like wise young. He had also three daughters, Marie that was married to John of Mountford duke of Britaine, Isabell wedded to the lord Coucie earle of Bedford, and Margaret coupled in marriage with the earle of Denbroke.

His praise.

This king, besides other his gifts of nature, was aided greatly by his semelie personage. He had a poudent wit, sharpe to conceiue and understand: he was courteous and gentle, doing all things sagelie and with god consideration, a man of great temperance and sobrietie. Those he chiefly favoured and advanced to honour, and comes of high dignitie, which excelled in honest conuersation, modestie, and innocencie of life, of bodie well made, of a comely stature, as neither of the highest nor lowest sort: of face faire and manlike, eyes bright and shining, and in age bald, but so as it was rather a semelie to those his ancient yeares than any disfiguring to his visage; in knowledge of martiall affaires verie skilfull, as the enterprises and worthy acts by him achieved do sufficientlie witnesse.

In what estimation he was had among strangers it may appeare, in that he was not onelie made vicar of the empire by the emperor Lewis of Baviere, but also after the decease of the same emperor, diuerse of the electours, as Lewis marques of Brandenburg, Robert or Rupert count Palatine of the Rhene, and the young duke of Saronie, with Henrie archbishop of Spantz, elected him to succede in place of the said emperor Lewis. Peruerteresse, he giuing them hartie thanks for the honour which they did unto him herein, refused to take the charge upon him, alledging that he could not haue time to supplie the same, by reason of the warres that he had in France, to recouer his right which he had to that realme.

This is noted by writers to be a token of great wisdome in this noble king, that would not go about to catch more than he might well gripe. Examples of bountious liberalitie, and great clemencie he shewed manie, and the same verie notable; so that in manner he alone amongst all other kings was found to be one, subiect to none, or at the least, to verie light and small faults. But yet he was not void of euill haps: for whereas, during the terme of fortie yeares space he reigned in high felicitie, and as one happy in all his doings: so in the rest of his time that followed, he felt a wonderfull change in fortune (whom writers compare to the mone for hir variablenesse, and often alterations, as neuer at a state, saing,

Pulsu fortuna variatur imagine luna, Crescit, decrescit, in eodem siliere nefcit)

Shewing his selfe forward to him in most part of his proceedings: for such is the state of this world, felidome doth prosperitie continue, and guide the sterne of our woollie doings, as it well appeared by this noble prince. For in the first yeares of his reigne, after he once began to gouerne of himselfe, he recovered that which had bene lost in Scotland, by great victories obtained against his aduersaries in that land, and passed further into the same, than euer his grandfather king Edward the first had done before him, subduing the countie on each hand, so that he placed gouernors, and bestowed offices, lands, and liutings in that realme at his pleasure.

Amongst other (as I remember) there is yet remaining a charter under his great seale containing a grant made unto John Cure and his heires for his god seruice done in those parts, of a manour called Ketnes in the countie of Forfar (which lieth in the north of Scotland) with a market euerie mondaie, and a faire for three daies together at Epiphallmasse, as the euene, the daie, and the morrow after. Also he granted to the same John Cure, free warren throughout the same lordship. This John Cure was ancestor unto the lord Cure that now liueth, who hath the same charter in his possession. As for this kings victories in France, the same were such as might seeme incredible, if the consent of all writers in that age confirmed not the same. But as these victories were glorious, so yet they proued not so profitable in the end: for whereas he had sore burdened his subiects with taxes and subsidies, at length they wearied wearie, and began to withdraw their forward minds to helpe him with such summes as had bene requisite for the maintenance of the warres, which the Frenchmen prolonged of purpose, and refused to trie their fortune any more in pight fields, wherby when he was constrained to be at continuall charges in such lingering warres; to defend that which he had erst gotten by force, and covenants of the peace; the finewes of warre, to wit monie, began to faile him, and so the enemies recovered a great part of that which before time they had lost, both on the further side the seas, and likewise in Scotland.

This must needs be a great graefe unto a prince of such a stout and valiant stomach, namelye fith he had bene so long time before accustomed to find fortune still so favourable unto him in all his enterprizes. But finallye the thing that most graued him, was the losse of that most noble gentleman, his deere sonne prince Edward, in whom was found all parts that might be wished in a worthy gouverneur. But this and other mishaps that chanced to him now in his old yeares, might seme to come to passe for a reuenge of his disobedience shewed to his father in vsurping against him, although it might be said, that he did it by constraint, and through the aduise of others. But whether the remorse hereof, or of his other offenses moued him, it may seme (as some write) that the consideration of this worlds mutabilitie, which he tried to the full, caused him (as is thought) to haue in mind the life in the world to come, and therefore of a pure deuotion founded the church and colledge of saint Stephen at Westminster, and another at Cambridge called The kings hall, giuing thereunto lands and reuenues, to the maintenance of them that would giue themselves unto learning.

Towards the maintenance of his warres, and furnishing forth of such other charges and expences as he toke in hand to beare out, he had some helpe by the siluer mines in Devonshire and Cornewall, in like manner as his grandfather king Edward the first had. For one Matthew Crowthorne keeper of his mines in those parts, yeldeb diuerse accounts of the siluer and profits of the same, betwene the second and fifteenth yeare of his reigne, as well for the siluer as for the lead, after the siluer was fined from it. Also John Moneron succeeding in the same office, accomptant of the profits of the same mines, from Michaelmasse in the nineteenth yeare of his reigne, unto the second of Nouember in the thre and twentieth yeare, yeldeb vpon his accounts, both the siluer and the lead thereof remaining. Moreover he let by indenture in the two and thirtieth yeare of his reigne, unto John Ballancer, and Walter Goldbeater, his mines of gold, siluer, and copper, in the countie of Devonshire, for terme of years. There is an account thereof remaining, and by the same (as it appeareth) was answered for the first yeare twentie markes. The second yeare the patentees died, and the king then disposed the same to others. In the eight and twentieth yeare of his reigne, he committed by indenture his said mines in Devonshire, to one master John Hamner, and one Herman Kainethorpe of Wiche, minours, yeldeb to the king the tenth part of the oare, as well of the gold and siluer, as of the lead and copper that should be gotten forth of the said mines.

In this kings daies, there liued manie excellent men, both in learning, in vertue, and in martiall prowesse, as partlie is touched in this discourse of his reigne; and first, the said noble and most valiant king, the prince of Wales his sonne surnamed the blacke prince, the duke of Lancaster John of Gaunt sonne to the king, and his father in law duke Henrie, Comund earle of Cambridge, and after duke of

Porke, the earles of Marwarke, Huntingdon, Salisburie, Stafford, Northampton, Arundell and others; the lord Reginald Cobham, the lord Bassett, the lord Thomas Holland, the lord Walter de Hanne and Henuier, the lord Edward Spenser, the lord John Chandois, the lord James Audley, Sir John Copland, sir Thomas Felton, sir Robert Knolles, who (as I haue said) being borne in Cheshire of meane parentage, through his manlie prowesse, and most skillfull experience in the warres, grew to be right famous.

Moreover, sir Hugh Caluerlie borne in the same shire, the capitall de Beuse a Gascoigne, sir Thomas Percie, sir Hugh Hastings, sir Baldwin Freuill, sir John Barleston, sir James Pipe, sir Thomas Dagworth, & that valiant English knight sir John Hawkewood, whose fame in the parts of Italie shall remaine for euer, where (as their histories make mention) he grew to such estimation for his valiant achieved enterprizes, that happie might that prince or common-wealth accompt themselves, that might haue his seruice, and so liuing there in such reputation, sometimes he serued the pope, sometimes the lords of Millane, now this prince or common-wealth, now that, and other whiles none at all, but taking one towne or other, would keepe the same, till some liking entertainment were offered, and then would he sell such a towne, where he had thus remained, to them that would giue him for it according to his mind. Barnabe lord of Millane gaue unto him one of his base daughters in marriage, with an honorable portion for his dowry.

This man was borne in Essex (as some write) who at the first became a tailor in London, & afterwards going to the warres in France, serued in the roome of an archer, but at length he became a capteine and leader of men of war, highly commended and liked of amongst the souldiers, in so much that, when by the peace concluded at Bretaignie, in the yeare 1360, great numbers of soldiers were discharged out of wages, they got themselves together in companies, and without commandement of any prince, by whose authoritie they might make warre, they fell to of themselves, and soze harried and spoiled diuerse countries in the realme of France, as partlie ye haue heard: amongst whom this sir John Hawkewood was one of the principall capteins, & at length went into Italie, to serue the marques of Monferrato, against the duke of Millane: although I remember that some write, how he came into that countrie with the duke of Clarence, but I thinke the former report be true: but it may well be, that he was readie to attend the said duke at his coming into Italie. And thus much concerning such famous capteins as serued this noble king Edward the third, although for breuenesse I passe ouer diuerse other, no lesse famous and worthy for their high manhood and tried valiance to be remembred, than these afore mentioned.

Of learned men, these we find by Iohn Bale registred in the Centuries; John Baconthorpe borne in Blackney in Northfolke, a frier Carmelite, and prouinciall of his order, so excellentlie learned, as well in diuinitie, as in both the ciuill and canon lawes, that he proceeded doctor in either facultie at Orenford and Paris, and wrote diuerse treatises, to his high and singular commendation; William Drham, John Worham a Carmelite frier, Nicholas Triuet borne in Northfolke, sonne to sir Thomas Triuet knight, & one of the kings iusticiers, prouid excellentlie learned, and wrote diuerse treatises, and amongst other, two histories, and one booke of annales, he was by profession a blacke frier, and departed this life about the second yeare of this king Edward the third, in the yeare of Christ 1328; William Alnecliffe bozne in Northumberland, in the towne whereof he toke name, a frier Spinoz; John Tanet bozne in the Ile of Tanet, an excellent musician, and a monke in Canturburie; Hugh of saint Peol, a Carmelite frier in Hertfordshire, a notable diuine as those daies gaue; William Alton bozne in Hampshire, a blacke frier and a diuine.

Furthermore, Richard Stradley bozne in the marches of Wales, a monke and a diuine, writing certeine treatises of the scripture; William Herbert a Welchman and a frier Spinoz, wrote also certeine goodlie treatises of diuinitie; Richard Comington a frier of the order of the Cordeliers, a preacher, and a writer of diuinitie; William Greter a doctor of diuinitie, and a prebendare canon in Exeter, whereas it is thought he was bozne; Lucas Borden a wessterne man, and by profession a Carmelite frier; Thomas Walleys a Dominike frier, a great diuine, as by such bookes as he wrote it may appeare; Thomas Pontius a monke of Canturburie, John Kidelwall a grate frier, Henrie Coffesay or Coffey a frier Spinoz, Gessrie Aleuant bozne in Northeshire, a frier Carmelite; John Guerden, a monke in Burie in Suffolke, an historiographer; Simon Burneston, a doctor of the Uniuersitie of Cambridge, and prouinciall of the friers Dominike or blacke friers, as they called them here in England; Walter Burlie a doctor of diuinitie, who in his youth was brought vp, not onlie in Martine college in Oxford, but also in the Uniuersities and scholes abroad beyond the seas, in France and Germanie, & afterwards for his wisdome, goddemeane & learning, he was retained with the bishop of Almes in Suabenland, a region in high Germanie.

Amongst other treatises which he compiled, being mantle, and namelie of naturall philosophie, he wrote a commentarie of the ethikes of Aristotle, and dedicated the same vnto the said bishop, a worke which hath bene highlie esteemed, not onelie in the Uniuersities of Italie, Germanie and France, but also here in our Uniuersities of England. To conclude, such was the fame of this doctor Burlie, that when the ladie Philip, daughter to the earle of Helnauld should come ouer into England to be married to king Edward, this doctor Burlie was retained by hir, and appointed to be hir almoner, and so continued in great estimation, in so much that after Edward prince of Wales, eldest sonne to king Edward commonlie called the blacke prince, was bozne, and able to learne his booke, the said Burlie among other was commanded to be one of his instructors.

By reason hereof, sir Simon Burlie, of whom I haue made some mention heretofore in this kings life, and more intend to speake, as occasion serueth in the next king, being sonne to sir John Burlie, nere kinsman to the said doctor Burlie, was admitted among other yong gentlemen, to be scholeselow with the said prince, by occasion whereof he grew in such credit and fauour with the said prince, that afterwards when his son Richard of Burdeaur, that succeeded king Edward his father, was bozne, the said prince for speciall trust and confidence which he had in the said sir Simon Burlie, committed the gouernance & education of his son the said Richard vnto him, whereby he was euer after highlie in fauour with the said Richard, and no lesse aduanced by him, when he came to introy the crowne of this realme.

But now to other learned men of that age. John Barwik a frier Spinoz, and reader to his fellowes of that order in Oxford; William Pottingham, Roger Clacton, bozne in Huntingdonshire, an Augustin frier; John Polested bozne in Suffolke, a Carmelite frier in Ipswich; Cipestwich as they write it;

Walter Bingham a frier also of the order of those Dominikes, which they called pied friers; Roger of Chester a monke of that cite and an historiographer; Thomas de Hales a frier Spinoz, Robert Elphat a grate frier, Gessrie Grandfield an Augustine or blacke frier, Hugh Wiclie a Carmelite frier of Ipswich, William Cincourt a blacke frier of Boston, Hugh Ditton bozne in Cambridgeshire a frier preacher, Adam Carthusianus a doctor of diuinitie, John Luttrell an excellent philosopher and well scene in the mathematical, Walter Cotton and Thomas Eckleson both grate friers, John Folsam a Carmelite frier in Ipswich, Benet of Northfolke, William Southhampton so called of the towne where he was bozne, a blacke frier.

Moreouer, John Burgh a monke wrote an historie, and certeine homilies; Adam Ridyard a master of art, Edmund Albon, Robert Counton a grate frier, William Lisse a frier Spinoz, John Kepingale bozne in Lincolneshire a Carmelite or white frier, as they called them; Christopher Pothulensis a blacke frier, Richard Aungerulle bozne in Suffolke, who was bishop of Exeter, and lord chancellor of England; John Pandurith, Walter Hemingford a canon of Ely bozne an historiographer, John Dnie bozne in Gloucestershire, in an Ile so called, whereof he toke his surname a Chartreux monke; Thomas Staueshatw a frier Spinoz in Wyke, Robert of Leicester taking that surname of the towne where he was bozne, a Franciscane or grate frier; John of Northampton bozne in that towne, and a Carmelite frier, an excellent mathematician.

Adde to the foresaid learned men, Robert Wolsop bozne in Northeshire, and a blacke frier in Eickill; William Buntard a blacke frier, Richard Chichester, a monke of Westminster wrote an excellent chronicle, beginning the same at the coming in of the Saxons, about the yeare of our Lord 449, and continued it till the yeare 1348; Richard Rolle also Hampole an excellent diuine wrote many treatises; John Guent a Welchman, a Franciscane frier, and prouinciall of the order; Kobulph Radiphtus a frier Spinoz, Robert Holcosh a blacke frier, bozne in Northampton, excellentlie learned, and wrote manye workes, both of diuinitie and other arguments; William Spiluerie a logician or rather a sophister, John Tenkesburie, Thomas Bradwardin bozne in Warwiche, a towne within the diocesse of Ely, archbishop of Canturburie succeeding John Dord, he wrote against the Pelagians; Richard Wethereset, William Byeton a grate frier, a Welchman bozne, as Bale suppoeth; John of saint Faith, bozne in Northfolke, a Carmelite frier of Bzurnham.

Furthermore, John Godwicke bozne also in Northfolke, an Augustine frier of Lin; William Kothwell a blacke frier, Gessrie Waterton monke of Burie, Richard Fitz Rafe, whom some take to be an Irishman, but a student in Oxford, and scholer to John Baconthorpe profited highlie, & wrote manye treatises, he was first archdeacon of Lichfield, and after chancellor of the Uniuersitie of Oxford, and at length archbishop of Ardmachan in Ireland; Richard Bilington a doctor of diuinitie, William Grisant a notable physician, surnamed of the countrie where he was bozne Anglicus, he led the later end of his life at Parfeilles in Pouance, & had a son that was abbat of the regular canons of that cite, who at length was aduanced to gouerne the see of Rome, & named Urbane the fift; John Paschall bozne in Suffolke, a Carmelite frier in Cipestwich, and by h. Edward the third preferred to the bishopricke of Landaffe; Adam Woodham a frier Spinoz, Simon Denton a blacke frier, William de Pagula; of John Wiclicke ye haue heard before, furthemore, Simon Hey, founder of Canturburie collodge in Drenford, wrote diuerse treatises, he was archbishop of Canturburie, as befoze wee haue heard; George Chable, John of Timmouth be-car of that towne in the bishoppike of Durham, Peter Babion, Walter Wilbozne. or Wilmbozne, Picholas de Lin bozne in the towne of that name in Northfolke, a Carmelite frier by profession, but as excellent an astronomer as was in those daies : John Widington bozne in Lincolneshire a frier minor in Stafford, Adam a monke of the Cisteriorder, Roger Wilshepale a mathematician, Simon de freuertham parson of Birton in Kent, Mattheu Welfmonasterienles, who wrote the booke called Flores historiarius ; John Clin a Carmelite bozne in Northfolke, liued in these daies, but departed this life in king Richard the seconds daies ; Thomas de Sturey an Augustine frier, Hertoxious Gualensis a Welfman bozne.

[illegible]

To conclude, John Spauentille knight, that great traveller, liued in those daies, and departed this life at Alege, the seventeenth of Nouembur, in the yeare 1372. Thomas of Dotter a monke of the abbeteiie of here, Henrie Knighton wrote an hystorie intituled De gestis Anglorum, John Stokes bozne in Suffolke an Augustine frier, John Homebie a frier Car-mite of Bolton, Henrie Deuerike (as our father will) of Worre an Augustine frier, Simon Alcocke a diuine, Utrud Walton bozne in the marches of Wales a monke of Durham, William Jordan an Augustine frier, John Hilton a frier minor, William de Lincoln a Carmelite, bozne and professed in that citie, whereof he toke his surname, Adam Sarlingham a frier of the same order, but bozne in Norfolke; Simon Speham a prebend of Ciche-ster, and a great diuine; John Winton a Car-mite, and student in Cambridge; John Wylkingham a gray frier; and diuerse other, which for that we are not certein in what age they liued, we here

Thus farre Edward the third, sonne to Edward the second and queene Isabell.

Richard the second, the second sonne to Edward prince of Wales.

Richard, the second of that name, and sonne to prince Edward, called the blacke prince, the sonne of king Edward the third, a child of the age of eleuen yeares, began to reigne over the realme of England the two and twentieth daie of June, in the yeare of the woold 5344, of our Lord 1377, after the conquest 310, about the two and thirtieth yeare of the emperour Charles the fourth, and in the fourteenth yeare of Charles the sixt king of France, and about the seventh yeare of the reigne of Robert the second king of Scotland;

he was named Richard of Burdeam; because he was borne at Burdeam in Calcoigne, whilst his father reuled there. The day before it was understood, that his grandfather king Edward was departed this life, being the one and twentieth of June on which date neuerthelesse he deceased; the citizens of London hauing certeine knowledge that he could not escape his sickness, sent certeine aldermen vnto Kingston, where the prince with his mother the princeesse then late, to declare vnto the said prince their readie good wills, to accept him for their lawfull king and gouernour; immediatlie after it should please God to call to his mercie his grandfather, being now past hope of recouerie of health. Wherefore they before him, to have the citation read, and he said to his godson, and that it should please him to quit the same with his power, of which the interest is in all sorts to God, and to the king, and to the lord lived and dwelt in his castle, if he required, and if not, they be sought him, that it might please his grace to take no more of the same, but to the citizens, and the duke of Lancaster, which through the malice of some had bene valued, to the commodity of money, to the discommodity of divers. When John Holland, one of the said aldermen, that had the words in all their names, benched his seat, he was answered by the prince and his council, that he should endeavour himself in all things to satisfy their requests, and so were they sent home to bring a full answer of their message to the city. The morrow after, there were sent to London from the king, the lord Latimer, sir Nicholas Bond, sir Simon Burle, and sir Richard Aderburie, knights, to bring them full news of the assured death of king Edward, who (as we have said) oppressed the happy fore; but comfortable news again, of the great fortitude and god meaning of the young king, who promised to love them and their city, and to come to the same city, as they had desired him to do. And further, that he had spoken to the duke of Lancaster in their behalf, and that the duke had submitted himself to him in all things touching the cause, whereby on the kings pleasure was, that they should likewise submit themselves, and he would do his endeavour, that an agreement might be had to the honour of the citizens, and profit of the city.

The duke of Lancaster &
the Londoners submit their quarrels to the kings order.

The citizens liked not of this forme of proceeding in the dukes matter, because the king was young, and could not give order therein, but by substitutes: yet at length with much ado, they were contented to submit themselves, as the duke had done before; though not, till that the knights had undertaken upon their oath of fidelitie and knighthood, that their submission should not rebound to the temporal or bodily harme of any of them, consenting to the kings will in this point. And so with this caution they took their journey towards Shene, where they found the new king with his mother, the duke of Lancaster and his brethren, uncles to the king, and diverse bishops, about the bodie of the deceased king. When it was known that the Londoners were come, they were called before the king, by whom the matter was so handled, that the duke and they were made friends. After this, when the king should ride through the city towards the coronation, the said duke and the lord Percie riding on great horses before him, as by vertue of their offices appointed to make way before, used themselves so courteously, modestly, and pleasantly, that where before they two were greatly suspected of the common people, by reason of their great puissance in the realme, and huge rout of retainers, they ordered the matter so, that neither this day, nor the morrow after, being the day of the kings coronation, they offended any manner of person, but rather by gentle and sweet demeanour they reclaimed the hearts of many, of whom before they were greatly had in suspicion, and thought evil of. What note, if we are entered into the matter of this kings coronation, we have thought good briefly to touch some particular point thereof (as in Thomas Walsingham we find it) though nothing so largely here, as the author himselfe setteth it forth, because the purpose of this worke will not so permit.

The king, in riding thorough the city towards Westminster, on the 15. day of Julie being wednesday, was accompanied with such a traine of the nobilitie and others, as in such case was requisite. Sir Simon Burle bare the sword before him, and sir John Holland bare the same before him, by the handle on foot. Behind him were pumps and other instruments, which were all going forth, and he carried a bag of gold, and the bag that he bore long looked for, because it was supposed that in it were the high treasures and good jewels of the king, which through the roughness of the age, and the death of the king, and the death of those that ruled about him, had bene long hidden, should not be neglected and hidden againe in the city, but to be used in all sorts of right. The water conductes in the city, for the space of three houses together in the upper end of the city, was a certain castle made with four towers, out of the which castles, the four sides of it, there are four wine abundant. In the towers were placed four beautiful virgins, of stature and age like to the king, apparelled in white vestures, in euerie tower one, the which blew in the kings face, at his approaching nere to them, leanes of gold; and as he approached also, they threw on him and his horse showers of gold counterfeit.

When he was come before the castle, they took cups of gold, and filling them with wine at the spouts of the castle, presented the same to the king and to his nobles. On the top of the castle, betwixt the four towers, stood a golden angel, holding a crowne in his hands, which was so contrived, that when the king came, he bowed downe & offered to him the crowne. But to speake of all the pageants and shewes which the citizens had caused to be made, and set forth in honour of their new king, it were superfluous; for one in their quarters striving to surmount other, and so with great triumphing of citizens, and top of the lords and noble men, he was conveyed unto his palace at Westminster, where he rested for that night. The morrow after being thursdaie, and the 16. day of Julie, he was fet to the church with procession of the bishops and monks, and coming before the high altar, where the pavement was covered with rich clothes of tappetrie, he there kneeled downe and made his prayers, whilst two bishops song the Letanie, which being finished, the king was brought to his seat, the quere singing an anthem, beginning, Firmetur manus tua.

That done, there was a sermon preached by a bishop touching the dutie of a king, how he ought to behave himselfe towards the people, and how the people ought to be obedient unto him. The sermon being ended, the king received his oath before the archbishop and nobles: which done, the archbishop having the lord Percie Percie lord marshall going before him, turned him to euerie quarter of the church, declaring to the people the kings oath, and demanding of them, if they would submit themselves unto such a prince & gouernor, and obey his commandments: and when the people with a loud voice had answered that they would obey him, the archbishop using certaine prayers, blessed the king; which ended, the archbishop came unto him, and tearing his garments from the highest part to the lowest, stripped him to his shirt. Then was brought by earles, a certaine coverture of cloth of gold, under the which he remained, whilst he was annointed.

The archbishop (as we haue said) having stripped him, first annointed his hands, then his head, breast, shoulders, and the ioints of his armes with the sacred oile, saying certaine prayers, and in the meane time did the quere sing the anthem, beginning, Incipit regem Salomonem, &c. And the archbishop added another prayer, Deus Dei filius, &c. Which ended, he and the other bishops song the hymne, Veni creator spiritus, the king kneeling in a long vesture, & the archbishop with his suffraganes about him. When the hymne was ended, he was lift up by the archbishop, and clad first with the coate of saint Edward, and after with his mantel, mitted a shoale being cast about his necke, the archbishop in the meane time, saleng certeyn prelates appointed for the purpose. After this, the archbishop and bishops delivered to him the sword; saleng, Accipe gla- dium, etc.

When that word was ended, the archbishop gived him with the sword, which done, the archbishop gave to him by accels, saleng, Accipe munus, etc. After this, the archbishop bowed upon him on uppermost knee, called a pall, saleng, Accipe pallium, etc. In the meane time, whilst the archbishop blessed the kings crovone, he to whose office it appertained, did put spurs on his heeles. After the crovone was blessed, the archbishop set it on his head, saleng, Cornu te Domi, etc. Then did the archbishop deliver to him a ring, with these words, Accipe anulum, etc. Immediatlie herewith came the lord Furnival by vertue of his office, offering to him a red glove, which the archbishop blessed, and putting it on his hand, gave to him the scepter, with these words, Accipe sceptum, etc.
Then did the archbishop deliver to him in his other hand a rod, in the top whereof stood a dove, with these words, Accipe virgam virtutis, etc. After this the archbishop blessed the king, saleng, Benedicte de Deu, etc.

These things done, the king kissed the bishops and abbats, by whome he was lead afterwards unto his seat, the bishops beginning to sing (Te deum) which ended, the archbishop said to him, Sta et retine amodo locum, etc. When these things were finished, they began masse, the bishop of Worcester read the epistle, and the bishop of Ely the gospel. At the offertorie, the king rose from his seat, and was brought to offer.
He therfore offered first his sword, and after so much gold as he would, but no lesse than a marke, by reason of the custome; for more he might offer to God and St. Peter, but lesse he could not. After this, he offered bread and wine, with which he and the archbishop did after communicate. This done, the earle, to whome it appertained to, heare the sword before the king, redeemed the sword which the king had offered with monie, and receiving the same, bare it afore the king. When masse should be song, the king was brought againe to the altar, & there kneeling downe, and saleng Confiteor to the archbishop, did communicate, and so was brought backe to his seat. The wardens of the cinque ports by their office, as well in time of the procession, as when he was annointed also at masse time, and as he returned from the church to the palace to dinner, held over him a large cano-pie of blew velvet, fastened unto foure stauces at the four corners.

In the meane time, sir John Dimmoche, that claimed to be the kings champion, had been at the kings armorie and stable, where he had chosen according to his tenure, the best armour saue one, and the best sadd saue one: albeit, sir Baldwine Freuill claimed the same office, but could not obtaine it; so that the said sir John Dimmoche hauing armed himselfe, and being mounted on horsebacke, came to the abbie gates, with two riding before him, the one carrieng his speare, and the other his shield, staing there till masse should be ended. But the lord Henrie Per-cie lord marshall, appointed to make waie before the king with the duke of Lancaster lord steward, the lord Thomas of Woodstoke lord constable, and the lord marshals brother sir Thomas Percie, being all mounted on great horses, came to the knight, and told him, that he ought not to come at that time, but when the king was at dinner, and therefore it should be good for him to tynarne himselfe for a while, and take his ease and rest, till the appointed time were come.

The knight did as the lord marshall willed him, and so after his departure, the king hauing those loves riding afore him, was brought into his choul-der into his palace, and so had to his chamber, where he rested a while, being somewhat faint with trauell, and took a small rest. After this, coming into the hall, he came into foure new castles, before he saboured to meat; to wit, his burle the lord Thomas of Woodstoke, earle of Buckingham, and to whome he gave a thousand markes a peece out of his treasury; till he provided him selfe lands to the like value: the lord Piershardre, earle of Huntingdon, to whome he gave a thousand markes a peece; till he was provided of lands of like value. The lord Spotobyate was created earle of Northampton, and the lord Henrie Percie earle of Northumberland. He made also nine knights the same daie.

To shew what roiall seruice was at this feast, it passeth our understanding to describe; but to conclude, the fare was exceeding sumptuous, and the seruice princelie in all things, that if the saute should be rehearsed, the reader would perhaps doubt of the truth therof. In the midst of the kings palace was a marble pillar raised hollow vpon steps; on the top whereof was a great gilt eagle placed; under whose feet in the chapter of the pillar, diuers kinds of wine came gushing forth at foure severall places: all the daie long, neither was anye forbidden to receiue the same, were he neuer so poore or abject. On the morrow after the coronation, there was a generall procession of the archbishop, bishop, and abbats then present, with the lords, and a great multitude of people, to praise for the king and the peace of the kingdome.

At the going forth of this procession, the bishop of Rochester preached, exhorting them, that the dissenti-ons and discords which had long continued betwixt the people and their superiours, might be appeased and forgotten, prouing by manie arguments, that the same highlie displeased God. He admonished the lords, not to be so extreme and hard towards the people. On the other part, he exhorted the people in necessarie causes, for the aid of the king and realme, cherefullie, and without grudging, to put to their helping hands, according to their bounden duties.
He further exhorted those in generall that were appointed to be about the king, that they should forsake vice, and studie to liue in cleanness of life and vertue.
For if by their example the king were trained to godnesse, all should be well; but if he declined through their sufferance from the right waie, the people and kingdome were like to fall in danger to perish. After the sermon and procession were ended, the lords and prelats went to their lodgings.

But now, because the Englishmen should haue their soles mingled with some foreigners, it chanced that the Frenchmen (which about the same time that the kings grandfather departed this life, were wasting on the seas) within sir or seauen daies after his deceasse, burnt the towne of Rie. Whereupon, immediatlie after the coronation, the earles of Cambridge and Buckingham were sent with a power unto Do-uer, and the earle of Salisburie unto Southampton; but in the meane time, to wit, the one and twentieth of August, the Frenchmen entring the Ile of Wight, burnt diuerse townes in the same. And though they were repelled from the castell, by the valiant manhod of sir Hugh Tirrell capitaine thereof, who lade no small number of them on the ground; yet they con-stained the men of the Ile to giue them a thousand marks of silver to saue the residue of their houses and goods, and so they departed from thence, sailing still along the coasts, and where they saw advantage, set on land, burning sundrie townes nere to the shore, as Portsmouth, Dartmouth, and Plimmouth.

towards Dover, burnt Hastings, but William the first could not win; being valiantly defended by the abbat of Beſtall, and others. After this, they landed one day not far from the abbey of Lewes, at a place called Rottington, where the prior of Lewes, and two knights, the one named Sir Thomas Cheine, and the other Sir John Falleſte, having assembled a number of the countrie people, incouered the Frenchmen; but were overthrowen; so that there were slaine about an hundred Englishmen; and the prior, with the two knights, and an esquier called John Brokas, were taken prisoners, but yet the Frenchmen lost a great number of their owne men at this conflikt, and so with their prisoners retired to their ships and gal-lies, and after returned into France.

But now touching the doings about the new issue, you shall understand, that by reason of his young yeares, as yet he was not able to gouverne himselfe, and therefore John duke of Lancaster, and Edmund earle of Cambridge, with other pères of the realme, were appointed to haue the administration. He was of good disposition and towardeſſe, but his age being readie to incline which way ſoeuer a man should bend it, those that were appointed to haue the gouvernement of his person, did what laie in them now at the first, to keepe him from all manner of light demeanour.
But afterwards, when euerie one began to studie more for his owne private commoditie, than for the aduancement of the common-wealth, they set open the gates to other, which being readie to corrupt his good nature, by little and little grew familiar with him, and dimming the brightnesse of true honour, with the counterfeit shine of the contrarie, so make-red his understanding, that in the end they brought him to tract the steps of lewd demeanour, and so were causers both of his and their owne destruction. This saemeth to be touched by C. Okland, who speaking of the death of the old king and the erection of the new, saith of him according to our annales, as followeth:

*Indecum puer hic nondum tranſegerat annum, Cum iuuenile caput geſſit diademate cinctum.
Qui poſtquam princeps iuſſu adoleuerat annis, Dicere non facile eſt quantum diſtaret auitis Moribus atque animo, fuit hic quam diſparemẽte, Diſſimili ingenio clara matricque patrique.*

The Frenchmen not ignorant of such miſchiefs as were like to grow in England, suffered no time to paſſe, but toke occasions of advantage when they were offered. ¶ Among other enterpriſes I find, that shortly after the decaſſe of king Edward, the duke of Burgogne wan Arde, and two or three other fortreſſes in thoſe marches. The Scots this yeare alſo wan the caſtell of Berwikke by ſtealth one moning, but shortly upon knowledge had, the earles of Northumberland and Nottingham, the lords Spenill, Lucie, Craſſoke, & Stafford, with other lords, knights, and eſquiers, came with their powers in all haſt thither, and entering the towne, beſieged the caſtell, and finally, aſſaulting them that kept it, wan it of them by force, and ſue all thoſe Scottiſhmen which they found within it, except Alexander Ramſie their capitaine. When the Englishmen had thus recovered the caſtell, they entered into Scotland, in hope to find the Scots, and to fight with them whom they knew to be assembled.

The English hoſt was three thousand men of armes, & ſeuẽ thousand archers, but they ſent forth Sir Thomas Spilgrave with three hundred ſpeares, and three hundred archers to ſpurre, to ſee if he might diſcover any thing of the Scots in thoſe parts, with whom the whole Engliſh, having ſent him three hundred ſpeares, and three hundred of other called pomen with glaives and other weapons, incouered by ſtealth, and ſo ſuddenly, that his compaignie, Sir Thomas Spilgrave himſelfe, and ſome other, were taken prisoners, beſides thoſe that were ſlaine; the reſt ſcaped by flight, making the beſt they could for the ſeaſon. The lord Spilgrave, Sir Thomas Ramſie, Sir William de la Pole, and ſome of other valiant capitaine of England, were ſent into Calſaigne this yeare, which firſt landed at Burdeaux, and on the ſeaſon of the ſtation of our laſte, where after they had reſted ſome while, they went and raiſed the ſiege, which the Frenchmen had held before Poſſaigne in Poitou a long time before.

Gouverneur of this ſiege at the firſt, was John of Dover of Wales, but he was murdered one moning as he ſat alone viewing the caſtell, and combing his head, by one of his owne countreimen, which under colour to ſerue him, was become with him verie familiar. This John of Dover whether ye will (for all is one) was ſonne to a noble man of Wales, whom Sir Edward had put to death for ſome offenſe by him committed, where this John got him into France, being as then verie young, and was brought up in the French court, and proved an expert man of warre, ſo that great lamentation was made for his death by the Frenchmen. But the Engliſhmen, although they miſliked the manner of his death, yet they were not greatlie ſorrowfull for the chance, ſith they were rid thereby of an extreme en-mie.

After that the Englishmen had raiſed the French men from the ſiege of Poſſaigne, they returned to Burdeaux, and after recovered ſundry caſtels and fortreſſes in the marches of Burdelois, and about Batonne. Alſo they aſſeſſed the king of Navarre, a-gainſt the king of Caſtile, and made a road into the confinnes of Caſtile. But shortly after, a peace was concluded betwixt thoſe two kings, ſo that the lord Charles of Navarre ſhould marrie the daughter of the king of Caſtile upon certaine conditions: and ſo the Englishmen had their waiges trulie paid them to their full contentation, and thereupon returned.
About Michaelmas began a parlement that was ſummoned at Weſtmiſter, which continued till the feſt of ſaint Andrew. In this parlement the ſecond promiſed by oth in the ſaid laſt parlement, ſhe had

There were two tenths granted by the clergy to the king in this parlement, and two fifteens of the temporalitie, to be paid the ſame yeare; and two citizens of London, William Malworth, and John Whilpot were appointed to haue the keeping of that monie, to the end it might be imploied to the kings neceſſarie uſes, for the deſenſe of the realme. Sir Hugh Caluerlie being deputie of Calis, comming one morning to Bullongne, burnt certaine ſhips which laie there in the haven, to the number of ſix and twenty, beſides two proper barks, being veſſels of no ſmall account: and having ſpoiled and burnt the moſt part of the baſe towne, he returned to Calis with a great rich bootie of goods and cattell.

capitaine sir Robert de Salle, that was gone ouer into England, was lost through negligence of them that were left in charge within it, the same sir Hugh Caluerlie made such speed in the matter, that he recovered it againe the same daie it was lost, by force of assault, taking the Frenchmen prisoners that were gotten into it, and hanging certaine Picards sherpardie soldiers in the said castell, vnder the said sir Robert de Salle, for that whilst the Englishmen were gone forth, to see the shooting of a match which they had made amongst themselves, a little off from the castell, those Picards being left within, that the gates against them, and receiued in the Frenchmen, with whom they had practised in treason, keeping the Englishmen forth, to whom the safe keeping of that castell was committed.

This yeare was a bull sent from the pope vnto the vniuersitie of Orentford, to apprehend John Wickliffe, parson of Lutterworth in Leicestershire, within the diocesse of Lincolne. Also, there were other bulles to the same effect, sent vnto the archbishop of Canturburie, and to the bishop of London. Likewise to the king were letters directed from the pope, to requite his fauour against the said Wickliffe, so greuouslie was the pope incensed against him, and not without cause, for if his conclusions in doctrine toke effect, he well perceived his papistcalle authoritie would shortly decaye. As for the popish cleargie, to them not onelie the sect but also the name of Wickliffe was so odious, that in recording his opinions and searices, they exceded the bounds of all modestie, aggravating such reports as they infer concerning him or his with more than hyperbolicall lies: as appereth by that long and tedious discourse which he wrote, that compiling certaine annales intituled De eventibus Anglie, prefixed this verse in the front of his volume, in letters of red vermilion, as desiring to haue his name notoziouslie knowne to the world;

But of Wickliffes life and doctrine to read at large, I remit the reader to the acts and monuments of the church, published by maister Iohn Fox: and now will we returne to matters of state and policie. There went forth this yeare a verie great naue of ships to the sea, vnder the guiding of the earle of Buckingham, the duke of Britaine, the lord Latimer, the lord Fitz Walter, sir Robert Banolles, and other valiant capitaine, meaning to haue intercepted the Spanish fleet that was gone to Sluse in Flanders, but thorough rage of tempest, and contrary winds, they were diuinen home, although twice they attempted their fortune: but sir Hugh Caluerlie, deputie of Calis, slept not his business, doing still what displeasures he could to the Frenchmen. Shortly after Christmasse, he spoiled the towne of Chaples the same daie the faire was kept there, to which a great number of merchants of Ballongne were come to make their markets, but the sellers had quicke utterance, for that that might easilie be carried awaie, the Englishmen laid hands on, and caused the owners to redeme the residue with great sums of monie, which they undertooke to paie; or else sir Hugh threatened to haue burnt all that was left, together with the houses.

We haue heard, how at the first the duke of Lancaster was one of the chiefe about the young king in gouernement of his person and realme, who prouidentlie considering, that sith there must needs be an alteration in the state, & doubting least if any thing chanced otherwise than well, the fault and blame might be chiefele imputed to him, and thanks (how soeuer things went) he looked for none, he gaue therefore the slip, obtaining licence of the king to depart, and so got him home to his castell of Killingworth, permitting other to haue the whole swaie: for before his departure from the court, there were with his consent ordeined such as should be attending on the kings person, and haue the rule and ordering of matters pertaining to the state, as William Courtine, then bishop of London (though shortly after removed to the archbishops see of Canturburie) Edmund Spoximer earle of March, & diuerse other, of whom the people had conceiued a good opinion: but yet because the bishop of Salisburie, and the lord Latimer were admitted amongst the residue, the commons murmured greatlie against them.

The earle of Northumberland resigned his office of lord marshall, in whose place succeeded sir John Arundell, brother vnto the earle of Arundell. The duke of Lancaster, although retired from the court, yet desirous to haue the monie in his hands that was granted the last parlement, at length obtained it, vpon promise to defend the realme from inuasion of all enemies for one yeares space: he therefore prouided a great naue to go to the sea, hiring nine ships of Basonne, to assist his enterpryse herein, the which in making saile hitherwards, encountered with the Spanish fleet, and toke fouretene vessels laden with wines and other merchandize. But in the meane time, one Spencer a Scottishman, with certaine saile of Scots, Frenchmen, and Spaniards, came to Scarburgh, and there toke certaine ships, and led them awaie to the sea, as it were in reuenge of his fathers imprisonment, named John Spencer, who before being caught by certaine ships of the north parts, and deliuered to the earle of Northumberland, was committed to prison within the castell of Scarburgh.

John Philpot that worshipfull citizen of London, lamenting the negligence of them that should haue prouided against such inconueniences, made forth a fleet at his owne charges, strongly furnished with men of warre and munition necessarie: the men of warre meeting with the same Spencer, accompanied with his owne ships, and fiftene other Spaniards that were newlie ioined with him, fet vpon them, and so valiantlie behaued themselves, that they toke the said Spencer with all them that were then in his companie, so recovering againe the ships that were taken from Scarburgh, besides great riches which were found aboard, as well in the fiftene Spanish ships, as the other that were of the old retinue, belonging to the same Spencer. John Philpot was afterwards blamed of the lords, for presuming thus far, as to set forth a naue of men of warre, without the the aduise of the kings counsell: but he made his answer in such wise vnto the earle of Stafford, and others that laid the fault to his charge, that he was permitted to depart, without further trouble for that matter.

Before all such prouision as the duke of Lancaster prepared for his iournie to the sea could be readie, the earles of Salisburie and Arundell sailed ouer into Normandie, where, by such composition as was taken betwixt the king of England and the king of France, who of new was become enemie to the French king, the towne of Cherbourg was deliuered vnto the said earles, who sending knowledge thereof backe into England, there were sent ouer such as should haue in charge the keeping of that towne; and so the two earles returned. ¶ We find, that the king of France, hauing bene here in England with the king and his counsell, had agreed with the king for a certeine yearelie rent, to demise vnto him the said fortreffe of Cherbourg, whereby the Englishmen might haue free entrie into Normandie, when they should, as well to aid the king of France in his necessitie, as to worke any enterprise that should be thought expedient to the aduantage of the king of England as occasion serued. But the obtaining of possession of Cherbourg brought not so much joy to the English nation, as the mishap that happened at the going forth of the said earles did cause lamentation and heauinesse.

For vpon the first entring into the sea, it fortuneth that sir Philip, and sir Peter Courtenie, disconcred a certeine number of ships that were enemies, and vndiscretlie entered amongst them, there suddenlie came vpon them the Spanish fleet, so that the English ships that were in companie with the said Philip and sir Peter, were not able to make their partie good, in somuch that finalie after that sir Philip had lost diuerse of his men that were there slaine, he got auaie by flight himselfe, though greuouslie wounded, but sir Peter was taken prisoner with a few other knights that were with him; and the most part of all the valiant esquiers of Summerseithire & Devonshire, being there abroad with him, were slaine and drowned, which was esteemed no small losse to the whole common-wealth.

Thus were the Englishmen occupied in this first yeare of king Richard with troubles of warre, and not onelie against the Frenchmen, but also against the Scots. For euen in the beginning of the same yeare, the Scots burnt Rokeburgh, in reuenge whereof the new earle of Northumberland entered Scotland with ten thousand men, and sore spoiled the lands of the earle of March for the space of thre daies together; because the said earle of March was the chiefe author and procurer of the burning of Rokeburgh, & so for that time the Englishmen were well reuenged of those enemies. But at an other time, when the Northerne men would needs make a road into Scotland, entring by the west borders, they were encountered by the Scots and put to flight, so that manie of them being slaine, the Scots took the more courage to inuade the borders, till at length, Edmund Mortimer earle of March came at the daie of truce, and took an abstinence of warre betwixt both nations for the time, though the same continued not long.

Anon after Midsummer, the duke of Lancaster with a strong power took the sea, and landing in Britaine, besieged the towne of Saint Mallo de Lisle, a fortreffe of great importance. Where went ouer with him the earles of Buckingham, Warwick, Stafford, and diuerse other of the English nobilitie, the which made their approaches, and fiercelie assailed the towne, but it was so valiantlie defended, that in the end, the duke with his armie fallen from thence, and returned without atchiuing his purpose. ¶ About the same time; there was a notable and bairous murder committed within saint Peters church at Westminster, by occasion of variance betwene the lord Latimer and sir Rafe Ferrers on the one partie, and two esquiers, the one called Robert Hall and the other John Shakell on the other partie, about a prisoner which was taken at the battell of Magers in Spaine, called the earle of Deane, who (as some write) was taken by one sir Franke de Hall at the said battell; and because he remained in his hands at the death of the said sir Franke, he bequeathed him vnto his sonne the said Robert Hall esquier.

But as other write, the said earle was taken by the said Robert Hall himselfe & John Shakell jointly, and iudged to be their lawfull prisoner, by the sentence of the prince of Wales, and sir John Chandois that was master to the said esquiers. Whereupon afterwards the said earle obtained so much fauor, that by leaving his sonne and heire in gage for his ransom, he returned into Spaine, to prouide monie to discharge it; but he was so slow in that matter, after he was at libertie, that he departed this life before he made any payment, and so his lands fell to his sonne that remained in gage for the monie with the two esquiers. Whereupon it happened afterwards, that the duke of Lancaster, desirous to haue the yong earle in his hands (in hope through his means the better to accomplish his enterprise which he meant to take in hand against the king of Castile, for the right of that kingdome) procured his nephue king Richard to require the said earle of Deane, at the hands of the said esquiers.

But they refused to deliuer him, keeping their prisoner forth of the waie, so that none wist where he was become: the esquiers therefore were committed to the tower, out of the which they escaped vnto Westminster, and there registred themselves for sanctuary men. The duke of Lancaster was herewith sore offended, and their enemies the said lord Latimer and sir Rafe Ferrers took counsell together, with sir Alane Borhull and others, how they might be reuenged of this despite. This sir Alane Borhull was constable of the tower, and therefore it grieved him not a little, that the esquiers had broken from him, and kept themselves thus at Westminster, vnder protection of that privileged place. Whereupon it was concluded, that sir Rafe Ferrers, and the said Alane Borhull, taking with them certeine men in armour, to the number of fiftie persons, should go and fetch them by force from Westminster, vnto the tower againe.

The morrow therefore after saint Laurence daie, being the eleuenth of August, these two knights accompanied with certeine of the kings seruants and other, to the number afore mentioned, came into the church at Westminster, whilist the said esquiers were there hearing of high masse, which was then in celebrating; and first laung hands vpon John Shakell, bled the matter so with him, that they drew him forth of the church, and led him straight to the tower. But when they came to Robert Hall, and fell in reasoning with him, he would not suffer them to come within his reach, and perceiving they meant to take him by force, he drew out a falchion or short sword which he had girt to him, and therewith laid so frælie about him, traueling twise round about the monks quier, that till they had beset him on eche side, they could do him no hurt.

Howbeit, at length when they had got him at that aduantage, one of them cloue his head to the verie braines, and an other thrust him through the bodie behind with a sword, and so they murdered him among them.

Cherbourg deliuered to the Englishmen.

them. They shew also oile of the monkes that would haue had them to haue saued the equiers life. And thus about this matter, for the breaking thus of the sanctuary, in somuch that the archbishop of Canturburie, and five other bishops his suffragans, openly pronounced all them that were present at this murder accursed, and likewise all such as aided or counselled them to it, chieflie and namele sir Alan de Borsall, and sir Raife Perreters; captains and leaders of them. The king, the queene, and the duke of Lancaster were yet excepted by speciall names. The bishop of London a long time after, euerie sūdate, wednesday, and friday, pronounced this excommunication in the church of S. Paule at London.

The duke of Lancaster (though excepted in the same) yet in behalfe of his friends was not a little offended with the bishops doings, in so much that in a counsell holden at Windsor (to the which the bishop of London was called, but would not come, nor yet cease the pronouncing of the curse, albeit the king had requested him by his letters) the duke said openly, that the bishops froward dealings were not to be borne with, but (saith he) if the king would command me, I would gladlie go to London, and fetch that disobedient prelat, in despite of those ribaulds (for so he termed them) the Londoners. These words procured the duke much enill will, as well of the Londoners, as of other: for it was commonlie said, that whatsoever had bene done at Westminster, concerning the murder there committed in the church, was done by his commandement.

A parliament
at Gloucester.

About the feast of S. Luke, a parlement was holden at Gloucester, for the displeasure (as was thought) which some of the counsell had conceived against the Londoners, or rather (as some take it) for feare of them, least if any thing were done contrarie to their minds, they should be about to hinder it, if the parlement had bene kept nere them: for manie things (as some iudged) were meant to haue bene put forth and concluded in this parlement, albeit few in effect came to passe of those matters that were surmised, sauing that it was enacted, that the king should haue a marke of the merchants for euerie sacke of their woolles, for this present yeare; and for euerie pounds worth of wares that was brought in from beyond the seas, and here sold, six pence of the butlers. Also, certeine priuileges were granted in this parlement to merchant-strangers, that they might buy and sell in grosse, or by retails within this realme, as in the printed booke of statutes it appeareth.

sendeth to the king for aid.

Kousa was captaine by
the Scots.

This yeare came messengers from the new elected pope Urbane, with letters to require the kings assistance and aid against such cardinals as he named schismatikes, that had elected an other pope whome they named Clement, which cardinals sent likewise their messengers with letters, to beseech the king to aid them with his fauourable assistance: but through perswasion of the archbishop of Canturburie, Urbans request was granted, and Clements rejected. About the same time, to wit, on thursdaie before the feast of S. Andrew the apostle, the Scots by stealth entered by night into the castell of Berwik, and slue sir Robert Bointon, a right valiant knight, that was constable thereof, permitting his wife, children, and seruants to depart, with condition, that within three weekes next ensuing, they should either paie them three thousand marks, or else yeld their bodies againe to prison.

The morrow after, the same Scots fetched a great bottie of cattell out of the countries next adioining, but immediatlie after the earle of Northumberland being aduertised hereof, hasted thither with foure hundred armed men, and assauleing the castell on each side, after two houres defense, wan it, slaying of the defendants about eight and fortie, reseruing onelie one of the whole number alive, that he might informe the Englishmen the thought of the Scottismens purposes. At this enterprise was the earle of Northumberland eldest sonne, spreading there first his banner, and doing so valiantlie, that he deserved singular commendation; as likewise did sir Alan de Beton, and sir Thomas de Alderton, with those of the surname of the Berons, euerie of these hauing their quarters assigned to assault. Thus was the castell recovered the ninth daie after the Scots had entered the same, so that they enioied not long that victorious exploit.

And because this enterprise was taken in hand against the covenant of the truce, the earle of Northumberland, before he attempted to recover the castell, sent to the earle of March in Scotland, to understand if he would auow that which his countrymen had done, touching the winning of that castell, who sent him knowledge againe, that he neither understood of their enterprise, nor would be partaker with them therein: but if it so pleased the earle of Northumberland, he would come himselfe, and helpe to recover it to the R. of Englands use, out of those Scottismens hands, which without publike authoritie had made that exploit. This yeare, sir Robert Kous, capteine of Chierburg, was called home, after he had taken sir Oliuer de Clifton, and atchued manie other worthie aduentures against the kings enemies. In his place was sent sir John Herleson, to remaine upon the gard of that castell. Also, sir Hugh Caluerlie, depute of Calis, that had so valiantlie bozne himselfe against the Frenchmen, was likewise discharged; and comming home, was made admerall, being ioined in commission in that office with sir Thomas Percie.

Sir William Montacute earle of Salisbury was sent ouer to Calis, to be the kings lieutenant there, who shortly after his comming thither fetched a great bottie of cattell out of the enemies countrie adioining, so that Calis was furnished with no small number of the same. Sir Hugh Caluerlie, and sir Thomas Percie, going to sea, toke seauen ships laden with merchandise, and one ship of warre. The archbishop of Castile in Ireland, returning from Rome, brought with him large authoritie of binding and loosing, granted to him by pope Urbane, in fauour of whome at his comming to London, in a sermon which he preached, he declared to the people, how the French king, holding with the antipape Clement, was denounced accursed; and therefore now was the time for Englishmen to make warre in France, hauing such occasion, as greater could not be offered; speciallie, sith it was like that the excommunicated king should haue no courage to make resistance. This is I will not saie the diuinitie (for what heauenlinesse can there be in such damnable doctrine, to set people together by the eares?) of the Romanists; so farre off are they from the studie of peace and concord betwixt man and man, that they set whole monarchies and empires vp to the mid leg in streams of blood, imitating their great grandfather sathan, who hath bene a makebate and a murderer from the beginning: renouncing the softsteps of Christ with open mouth, and forswearing to follow him either in demeanour or doctrine, and therefore;

In a parlement holden at Westminster this yeare after Easter, it was ordeined, that the priuileges and immunities of the abbey of Westminster should remaine whole and inuiolate; but yet there was a proviso against those that toke sanctuary, with purpose to defraud their creditors, that their

To the end the commons might be spared, the dukes of Lancaster and Britaine paid shewentie markes, euery earle six markes, bishops and abbats with miters as much, and euery monke three shillings foure pence: also, euery iustice, shiriffe, knight, esquier, parson, vicar, and chapleine, were charged after a certeine rate, but not any of the commons that were of the laitie.

Anno Reg. 3.
A notable exploit done by sir John Harleston.

We haue heard how sir John Harleston was sent to Chierburg as capteine of that fortreffe, who issuing abroad on a day, with such power as he might take forth, leaving the fortreffe furnished, came to a place, where within a church and in a mill, the Frenchmen had laid up, as in storehouses, a great quantitie of vittells, for prouision; which church and mill the Englishmen assaulted so ballantlie, that notwithstanding there were within a good number of the enemies, that did their best to defend themselves, yet at length they were taken, and sir John Harleston with his companie, returned with the vittells towards Chierburg, but by the way they were incountried by one sir William de Bourdes, whome the French king had appointed to lie in Mountburg with a strong power of men of war, to countergarison Chierburg.

Whereupon ensued a fore conflict, and manie an hardie man was beaten to the ground. And although it seemed that the Englishmen were ouermatched in number, yet they stucke to it manfully. Their capteine sir John Harleston, fighting in the foremost presse, was killed, and laie on the ground at his enemies feet in great hazard of death. The Englishmen neuertheless continued their fight, till at length sir Geoffrie Morsie, with a wing of armed footmen with axes, came to the rescue (so) to that end he was left behind, of purpose to come to their aid if need required) with whose comming the Frenchmen were so hardlie handled, that to conclude, they were broken in sunder, beaten downe and wholie vanquished: there were of them slaine about six score, and as manie taken prisoners, among which number was their chiefe capteine sir William de Bourdes taken, and brought to Chierburg with the residue, and there put in safe keeping. This exploit was atchieued by the Englishmen, on saint Martins day in winter, in this third yeare of king Richard his reigne.

Sir John Clarke a valiant capteine.

But least any ioy should come to the English people in that season, without some mixture of griefe, one sir J. Clarke a right balliant knight, & fellow in armes with sir Hugh Caluerlie, chanced this yeare to lie in garrison in a castell in Britaine, where was an haven, & diuers English ships lieng in the same, whereof the French gallies being aduertised, came thither, to set those ships on fire, appointing one of their gallies first to attempt the feat, and if fortune so would, to traine the Englishmen forth, till they should fall into the laps of foure other gallies which they laid as it had bene in ambush. Now as the enemies wished so it came to passe, for the Englishmen perceiuing their vessels in danger to be burnt of the enemies, ran euerie man aboard to saue the ships and goods within them; and amongst the rest, sir John Clarke their capteine, meaning to take such part as his men did, got aboard also, and freight falling in pursute of the gallee that withdrew for the purpose aforesaid, the Englishmen were shortly inclosed with the other gallies before they were aware, not knowing what shift to make to auoid the present danger.

Sir John Clarke, perceiuing how the case stood, laid about him like a giant, causing his companie still to draw backe againe, whilst he resisting the enemies, did shew such proofe of his balliance, that they were much astonished thereat. To be short, he so manfully behaved himselfe, that the most part of his companie had time to recover land; but when he that had thus preserved others, shuld leape forth of the ship to saue himselfe, he was stricken in the thigh with an arrow, that downe he fell, and so came into the enemies hands, being not able to recover that hurt, for his thigh was almost quite cut off from the bodie, so that he died of that and other hurts presentlie, leaving a remembrance behind him of manie worthie and through his balliance atchieued, to his high praise and great commendation. The barke of Morke was also lost the same time, being a proper vessel, and now taken suddenlie, sanke with all that were aboard in hir, both Englishmen, and the enemies also that were entered into hir, thinking to carrie hir auaie.

About the same time the duke of Britaine returning into his countrie, vnder the conduct of sir Thomas Percie and sir Hugh Caluerlie, landed at a haven not far from saint Malo, the fourth day of August, being receiued with unspeakable ioy of the Britaines, as well lords as commons, so that the louing harts which they bare towards him, might well appeare, although the loue which he bare to the king of England had caused his subjects, in fauor of France, to keepe him manie yeares forth of his dukedome as a banished prince, but at length, they being overcome with irkesomnesse of his long absence, with generall consents sent for him home, so that there were but few of the British nobilitie that withdrew their dutifull obedience from him, and those were onlie such as firmerlie linked in seruice with the French king, were loth to forgoe such romes and dignities as vnder him they inioied; namelie, the constable of France, sir Berthram de Cleauin, the lord Clifton, the lord de Rothen, and the lord Rochfort, and certeine others.

The lord de la Mall amongst other, came to him (as we find in Thomas Walsingham) offering him his seruice as well as the residue. At his landing, he was likelie to haue lost all such furniture, as well of vittells, apparell, hangings, bedding, armour, and other things, which either he or his traine had brought with them. For the French gallies espieng their time, immediately as he and his companie were set on land, before the ships in which the said furniture was fraught, could enter the haven, which was somewhat freight and narrow, came vpon them, and had them at such advantage, that if sir Hugh Caluerlie with his archers had not caused the master of his ship, to uen against his will to returne againe to the rescue, the gallies had taken and gone auaie with the other ships; but through the manfull prowes of sir Hugh, the gallies were repelled, & the ships saued: for according to his wonted balliance he would not returne, till he saw all other in safetie, & then defending himselfe so well as he might, withdrew into the haven, and landed safelie with the residue.

About the same time was an heinous murder committed in London, of a merchant Genowes, whom certeine English merchants vpon spite and enuie, which they bare towards him, caused to be slaine one euening in the street before his owne gates. The cause that moued the merchants so to procure his death was, for that he undertooke to furnish this land, hauing the staple allowed him at Southhampton, of all such wares as came forth of Leuant, so plentifully as was to be had in any place in all the west parts of chrestendome. In the summer of this yeare, a greuous mortalitie afflicted the north parts of this land, so that the countrie became almost desolate. And to the increase of that miserie, the Scots thinking the time to serue their turne, invaded the borders, and most cruelly harried, robbed, and spoiled the

the same, not letting passe any part, of most cruell murdering of the people that were left alive; and not made abate by that soze contagious sicknesse. The number of cattell was infinite which they droue out of the land with them, not sparing herds of swine which they toke at this time, where they neuer medled with that kind of cattell before that present.

Before the Scots made this iournie into England, whilest the mortalitie was most in force, they calling to certeine of the English borderers, asked of them how it came to passe, that so great a death reigned amongst them. The Englishmen, as good, plaine, and simple meaning men, told them, that trulle they knew not the cause, for Gods iudgements were hid from them in such behalfe. But one thing they knew, that all calamitie, death, and aduersitie that chanced vnto them, came by the speciall grace of God, to the end that being punished for their sinnes, they might learne to repent and amend their wicked liues. The Scots hearing this, when they should enter this land, understanding lewdlie that the Englishmen had told them concerning the disease, and the grace of God, deuised a blessing forsooth to be said euerie morning, of the most ancient person in euerie familie, as; Benedicite, said he: Dominus, said the residue. When began he againe, saying; God and saint spango, saint Romane and saint Andro, sheld vs this daie fra Gods grace, and the fewle death that Englishmen dien vpon. Thus the senselesse men misconstruing this word the grace of God, praied for their owne destruction, which if not in this world, yet for their brutish crueltie vled at that present, against the miserable creatures, whom the hand of God had spared in time of that greuous mortalitie, it is to be feared, least in another world it came to them, as the verie words of their praiers imposed.

About the same time, John Schakell esquier was set at libertie, the king compounded with him for his prisoner, giving fise hundred marks in redie monie, and lands to the value of a hundred marks by peare. When he should bring forth his prisoner, and deliuer him to the king, this is to be noted, as a thing verie strange and wonderfull. For when he should appeare, it was knowne to be the verie grome that had serued him in all the time of his trouble, and would neuer vtter himselfe that he was before that time, hauing serued him as an hired seruant all that while in prison, and out of prison, in danger of life, when his other master was murdered, where, if he would haue vttered himselfe, he might haue bene entertained in such honorable state, as for a prisoner of his degree had bene requisit, so that the faithfull loue and assured confidence in this noble gentleman was highlie commended and praised, and no lesse marvelled at of all men.

About the feast of S. Nicholas, in this third yeare of king Richards reigne, there went to sea an armie of men, that should haue passed ouer into Britaine, to the aid of the duke there, vnder the conduct of sir John Arundell, sir Hugh Caluerlie, sir Thomas Percie, sir William Elmham, sir Thomas Mowbray, sir Thomas Banester, & manie other knights and esquires, so long to rehearse, a sufficient powder vndoubtedlie to haue done a great enterprise: but they were no soner on the sea, but suddenlie there arose such an hideous tempest of wind and stormes, that they looked presentlie to be all cast awaie, they were scatterred here and there, and driuen they wist not whither. The ship wherein sir John Arundell was aboard, chanced to be cast on the coast of Ireland, and there driuen to soake his ship, that was ready to be broken in peeces by rage of waues, beating it there against the rocks: he was drowned before he could win to land, in an Ile, nere to the which they had thrust in the ship.

To the like end came sir Thomas Banester, sir Nicholas Trumpington, and sir Thomas Dale, impeaching each others, as they leapt forth of the ship: also one Musard an esquire, a most semelie personage and a bold; and an other esquier named Weni-oke, being almost out of danger, were fetched awaie by the surges of the sea, and so perished, with manie other. Robert Rust a cunning seaman, belonging to Blackie in Dorsetholke, & maister of the ship where in sir John Arundell was imbarked, was the first that got to land, giuing example to others how to shift for themselves. But when he saw his cheefe captaine, the said sir John Arundell got forth to the lands, and as one thinking himselfe past all danger, to shake his wet garments about him; the said Rust waileing the dangerous state wherein the said sir John Arundell yet stood, came downe, and raught to him his hand, inforcing himselfe to plucke him to the shore: but whilest he toke care for an other mans safetie, and neglected his owne, he lost his life, and so they both perished together; for through a mightie billow of the raging seas, they were both ouerthrowne, and with returning of the waues backe, drowne into the deepe, so that they could neuer recover foot-hold againe, but were drowned.

The said Rust was much lamented, because he was not onelie knowne to be a skilfull maister, but also counselled the said sir John Arundell in no wise to go to sea, at what time he would needs set forward, forking the said Rust and the mariners to hoist vp sailes and make awaie. They that escaped to land in that Ile, found nothing there to releue their miseries, but bare ground, so that diuerse starued through cold, wanting fier and other succour: the residue that were lustie and wise withall, ran vp and downe, and sometime wrestling, and otherwise chasing themselves, remained there in great miserie, from the thursdaie, till sundaie at none next insuing. At what time, when the sea was appeased and waen calme, the Irishmen that dwelled ouer against this Ile on the maine, came and fetched them thence, and releued them the best they could, being almost dead, through trauell, hunger, and cold.

The said sir John Arundell lost not onelie his life, but all his furniture and apparell for his bodie, which was verie sumptuous, so that it was thought to surmount the apparell of any king. For he had two and fiftie new sutes of apparell of cloth of gold or tisse, as was reported, all the which, together with his horses & geldings, amounting to the value of ten thousand marks, was lost at the sea. And besides this, there were lost at the same time fise and twentie ships, with men, horses, and other riches, which attended him in that voyage. Yet sir Thomas Percie, and sir Hugh Caluerlie, with sir William Elmham, and certeine others escaped, but cruellie tormented with vnmerrifull tempest: and before sir Thomas Percie could get to land, after the sea was quieted, he was assaulted by a Spaniard, against whome he so defended himselfe, that in the end he toke the Spanissh vessel, and brought hir, with all that he found aboard in hir, vnto the next shore, and sold the same for an hundred pounds, and without long delate, toke the sea, & passed ouer to Wexell, of which fortresse he was captaine, iointlie with sir Hugh Caluerlie, and therefore doubting least some inconuenience might chance thereto now in both their absence, he made the more hast, not taking rest till he came thither, notwithstanding his passed painefull trauels. Sir Hugh Caluerlie was neuer in his life in more danger of death, than at that time: for all that were in his ship (as Froissard writeth) were drowned, except cept himselfe & seauen mariners. We find, that there were drowned in one place & other, about a thousand Englishmen in that most unluckie voyage. ¶ Some writers impute this calamitie to light on the said sir John Arundell & his companie, for the lascivious and filthy rule which they kept before their setting forth, in places where they laie, till their prouision was ready; who not content with that which they did before they took ship, in rauishing mens wiues, maids and daughters, they caried them aboard, that they might haue the vse of them whilst they were vpon the sea, and yet when the tempest rose, like cruell and vniuersall persons they threw them into the sea, either for that they would not be troubled with their lamentable noise and crying, or for that they thought so long as they had such women aboard with them (whome they had abused so long) God would not cease the rage of the tempest. But it should appeare that this tempest was generall, for where the Spanish and French fleets were abroad at the same time, being assembled together to annoie the coasts of this land, their ships were likewise tossed and turmoiled, so as no small number of them were lost, in so much that the damage which they sustained, was thought far to passe that which hapned to the English naue.

Sir John
Deuereux
made deputie of Calis.

In this yeare about Christmasse, sir William de Spontacut earle of Salisbury, after he had remanent twelue moneths space at Calis, the kings lieutenant there was called home, & sir John Deuereux a right valiant knight, and an old man of warre, was sent thither in his place. ¶ Also, sir John Harleston was called home from Chierburg, and sir William Windeshore a noble knight was sent thither to be capteine of that fortreffe. ¶ After the Epiphanie, was a parlement called at London, which continued till the beginning of the kalendes of March. ¶ Also there as the yeare before there had bene certeine bishops, earles, barons, and iustices appointed, to haue the gouernement and rule about the king; now at the request of the lords and commons in this parlement assembled; the lord Thomas Beauchampe earle of Warwick was chosen to remaine continually with the king, as chiefe gouernour, both of his person, and to giue answer to all strangers that should come hither about any businesse whatsoever, and further to haue the rule and order of all things, in lieu of those that were chosen thereto before: it was perceiued that they had sought to enrich themselves, & had done little to the aduancement of the kings honor, or state of the common-wealth, but rather emptied the kings coffers.

In this parlement also, the lord Richard Scrope gaue ouer the office of chancelor, and Simon Sudburie archbishop of Canturburie toke it vpon him. ¶ In this parlement was granted a tenth by the cleargie, and a fifteenth by the laitie, with condition that from henceforth, to wit, from the kalends of March, to the feast of S. Michaele, which then should be in the yeare 1381, there should be no more parlements, but this condition was not performed, as after appeared. In the octaues of Easter, the lord Waleran earle of saint Paule married the kings halfe sister, the ladie Jone de Courtne: the solemnization of this marriage was holden at Windesore, with great triumphing. ¶ The princeesse that was mother to the hyde, was greatlie against the marriage, but the hyde hir selfe had such a liking to the earle, that the king was contented that they should marry together, and set him free of his ransom which he should haue paid, for that he had bene taken prisoner in the marches of Calis, and further, gaue with his sister by waie of endowment, the towneship and manour of Bielest.

On the seventh of June, a combat was fought afore the kings palace at Westminster, on the pavement there, betwixt one sir John Annelie knight, and one Thomas Battrington esquier: the occasion of which strange and notable triall rose herof. The knight accused the esquier of treason, for that where the fortreffe of saint Sauour within the Ile of Constance in Normande, belonging some time to sir John Chandois, had bene committed to the said Battrington, as capteine thereof, to keepe it against the enemies, he had for money sold and deliuered it ouer to the Frenchmen, where he was sufficientlie prouided of men, munition and vittels, to haue defended it against them; and fifth the inheritance of that fortreffe and landes belonging thereto, had apperteined to the said Annelie in right of his wife, as neereff couline by affinitie vnto sir John Chandois, if by the false conueiance of the said Battrington, it had not bene made awaie, and alienated into the enemies hands: he offered therefore to trie the quarrell by combat, against the said Battrington, whereupon was the same Battrington apprehended, and put in prison, but shortly after set at libertie againe.

Whilst the duke of Lancaster, during the time that his father king Edward late in his last sickness, did in all things what liked him, & so at the contemplation of the lord Latimer (as was thought) he released Battrington for the time, so that sir John Annelie could not come to the effect of his sute in all the meane time, till now. Such as feared to be charged with the like offenses staied the matter, till at length, by the opinion of true and ancient knights it was defined, that for such a foren controuersie that had not risen within the limits of the realme, but touched possession of things on the further side the sea, it was lawfull to haue it tried by battell, if the cause were first notified to the constable and marshall of the realme, and that the combat was accepted by the parties. Whereupon was the day and place appointed, and all things prouided ready, with lists railed and made so substantiallie, as if the same should haue endured for euer. The concourse of people that came to London to see this tried, was thought to exceed that of the kings coronation, so desirous men were to behold a sight so strange and vnaccustomed.

The king, his nobles, and all the people being come together in the morning of the daie appointed, to the place where the lists were set by, the knight being armed and mounted on a faire courser (himselfe trapped, entered first as appellant, staing till his aduersarie the defendant should come. And shortly after was the esquier called to defend his cause in this forme: Thomas Battrington defendant, come and appeare to saue the action, for which sir John Annelie knight and appellant hath publikelie and by writing appealed thee. He being thus called thise by an herald at armes, at the third call did come armed likewise; and riding on a courser trapped with traps imbodered with his armes, at his approaching to the lists he alighted from his horse, lest according to the law of armes the constable should haue challenged the horse if he had entered within the lists. But his shifting nothing auailed him, for the horse after his maister was alighted beside him, ran vp & downe by the railes, now thrusting his head ouer, and now both head & breast, so that the earle of Warwick, because he was high constable of England, claimed the horse afterwards, swearing that he would haue so much of him as had appeared ouer the railes, and so the horse was adiudged vnto him.

But now to the matter of the combat (for this challenge of the horse was made after, as soon as the esquier was come within the lists) the indenture was was brought forth by the marshall and constable, which had bene made and sealed before them, with consent of the parties, in which were contained the articles exhibited by the knight against the esquier, and there the same was read before all the assemble. The esquier (whose conscience was thought not to be cleare, but rather guiltie, and therefore seemed full of troublesome and grudging passions, as an offender already convinced, thought (as full well he might)

went about to make exceptions, that his cause by some means might have seemed the sounder. But the duke of Lancaster hearing him so state at the matter, swore, that except according to the conditions of the combat, and the law of armes, he would admit all things in the indentures comprised, that were not made without his owne consent, he should as guiltie of the treason forthwith be had forth to execution. The duke with those words tooke great commendation, and avoided no small suspicion that had bene conceived of him as parcial in the esquiers cause. The esquier hearing this, said, that he durst fight with the knight, not onelie in those points, but in all other in the world whatsoever the same might be: for he trusted more to his strength of bodie, and fauour of his friends, than to the cause which he had taken upon him to defend. He was in deed a mightie man of stature, where the knight among those that were of a meane stature was one of the least. Friends to the esquier, in whom he had great affiance to be bozne out through their assistance, were the lordes Latimer and Basset, with others.

Before they entered battell, they toke an oth, as well the knight as the esquier, that the cause in which they were to fight, was true, and that they delt with no witchcraft, no art magike, whereby they might obtaine the victorie of their aduersarie, no; had about them any herbe or stone, or other kind of experiment with which magicians vse to triumph ouer their enemies. This oth receiued of either of them, and therefore having made their prayers deuoutlie, they began the battell, first with speares, after with swords, and lastlie with daggers. They fought long, till finally the knight had bereft the esquier of all his weapons, and at length the esquier was manfullie overthrown by the knight. But as the knight would haue fallen upon the esquier, through sweat that ran downe by his helmet his sight was hindered, so that thinking to fall upon the esquier, he fell downe stoeling himselfe, not coming nere to the esquier, who perceiving what had hapened, although he was almost overcome with long fighting, made to the knight, and threw himselfe upon him, so that manie thought the knight should haue bene overcome: other doubted not but that the knight would recover his feet againe, and get the victorie of his aduersarie.

The king in the meane time caused it to be proclaimed that they should staie, and that the knight should be raised vp from the ground, and so meant to take up the matter betwixt them. To be short, such were sent as should take up the esquier; but coming to the knight, he besought them, that if might please the king to permit them to lie still, for he thanked God he was well, and mistrusted not to obtaine the victorie, if the esquier might be laid upon him, in manner as he was earst. Finally, when it would not be so granted, he was contented to be raised up, and was no sooner set on his feet, but he cheerfullie went to the king, without anie mans helpe, where the esquier could neither stand nor go without the helpe of two men to hold him up, and therefore was set in his chaire to take his ease, to see if he might recover his strength.

fought him & his nobles, to grant him so much, that he might be effones laid on the ground as before, and the esquier to be laid aloft upon him: for the knight perceiued that the esquire through excessive heat, and the weight of his armour, did maruellouslie faint, so as his spirits were in manner taken from him. The king and the nobles perceiving the knight so couragiously to demand to trie the battell forth to the uttermost, offering great summes of monie, that so it might be done, decreed that they should be restored againe to the same plight in which they laie when they were raised up: but in the meane time the esquire fainting, and falling downe in a swoone, fell out of his chaire, as one that was like to yeld by his last breath presentlie among them. Those that stood about him cast wine and water upon him, seeking so to bring him againe, but all would not serue, till they had plucked off his armour, & his whole apparell, which thing proued the knight to be vanquisher, and the esquier to be vanquished.

After a little time the esquier began to come to himselfe, and lifting up his eyes, began to hold up his head; and to cast a ghoslie loke on euerie one about him: which when it was reported to the knight, he commeth to him armed as he was (for he had put off no piece since the beginning of the fight) and speaking to him, called him traitor, and false perjured man, asking of him if he durst trie the battell with him againe: but the esquier hauing neither sense nor spirit whereby to make answer, proclamation was made that the battell was ended, and euerie one might go to his lodging. The esquier immediately after he was brought to his lodging, and laid in bed, began to war raging wood, and so continuing still out of his wits, about nine of the clocke the next day he yelded up the ghost. ¶ This combat was fought (as before ye haue heard) the seventh of June to the great reioicing of the common people, and discouragement of traitours.

About the same time, or rather somewhat before, the lord Oliver de Clisson, with a number of ships and gallies of France and Spaine, toke the sea, and coming on the coast of England, landed in diuerse places of the west countrie, and also in the south parts, spoiling and burning sundrie towne, taking such ships and vessels as they might laie hold upon, and so continued to indamage the English people that inhabited nere to the sea side, all that summer following. ¶ In the beginning of the fourth yeare of this king, Thomas of Woodstocke earle of Buckingham, vncle to the king, with an armie of seauen or eight thousand men of armes and archers, was sent ouer to Calis, that he might invade France, and passe through the same to come into Britaine unto the aid of the duke there. ¶ You haue heard how the French king had seized into his hands the more part of the duchie of Britaine, because that the duke had joined himselfe in league with the king of England: but yet there were diuerse of the good towne, and also manie of the barons and nobles of the countrie which kept themselves as neuters a long season; but at length, longing to see the returne of their naturall lord and duke, sent for him into England, requiring him to repaire home, and to see to the quieting of the troubled state of his countrie.

The duke being thus earnestlie desired to returne home, by the aduise of the king of England and his counsell, granted to their request that had so instantlie required him, both by letters and messengers: whereupon he toke the sea, and sailing forth, arrived in Britaine, hauing with him sir Robert Knolles, and a certeine number of Englishmen both armed men and archers (as before ye haue heard.) The king also promised to send him a great supplie verie shortlie, which was not forgotten. But fortune was so contrarie, that sir John Arundell general of those that were sent, and manie of his companie, were drownded by force of tempest, and the other driven backe againe into England (as before ye haue heard.) In the meane time, though the duke of Britaine with aid of his subiects, did manfully defend his townes and countrie against the Frenchmen, yet he was in doubt to be oppressed by the great puissance of the Frenchmen, if aid came not the sooner. Which being signified ouer into England, moued the king and his counsell to appoint the earle of Buckingham to take vpon him this boiage. He landed at Calis thre daies before the feast of Marie Magdalene.

There went ouer with him in that armie, the earls of Staffoꝝd and Deuonshire, the lord Spenser constable of the host, the lord Fitz Walter marshall, the lord Basset, the lord Darcie, sir William Windsoꝝe, the lord Poole, the lord Darcie, sir William Windsoꝝe, sir Hugh Caluerlie, sir Hugh Hastings, sir Hugh de la Sente, sir Thomas Percie, sir Thomas Triuet, sir Hugh Tirell, sir William Farrington; sir John and sir Nicholas Daubizicourt, Thomas Camois, Rafe Beuill sonne to the lord Beuill, sir Henrie bastard Ferrers, sir Hugh Broe, sir Gervise Mourlie, sir William Clinton, sir Iuan Fitz Warren, and diuerse other. After they had rested them at Calis two daies, they remoued the third day out of the towne, and came to Parquaignes, where they remained thre daies, till all their companie, cariages, and prouisions were come to them out of Calis: from thence they remoued and came before Arde, where the earle of Buckingham made knights these that follow: the earle of Deuonshire, the lord Poole, the son of the lord Fitz Walter, sir Roger Strange, sir John Ipe, sir John Colle, sir James Tirell, sir Thomas Hamston, sir John Beuill, and sir Thomas Ros or Kollie, as some copies haue. These persons were made knights, because they went in the vaward, which was sent to win a strong house called Jollant, which the owner had fortified against them. But though he defended himselfe manfully for a time, yet in the end both he and all his companie were taken prisoners.

After this the duke passed by saint Omers, theuing himselfe (about a mile off) with his host in order of battell aloft vpon a mountaine. Some of the Englishmen rode to the barriers, requiring that some of them within would come forth and breake stanes with them, but they could not be answered. The same day that the Englishmen thus came before S. Omers, the earle of Buckingham made againe new knights, as sir Rafe Beuill, sir Bartholomew Bourchier, sir Thomas Camois, sir Foulke Cobbet, sir Thomas Dangleure, sir Rafe Detipas, sir Helwes saint Albine, and sir John Hauilie or rather Hauilet. These Englishmen rode through the countrie, demanding iustis and daeds of armes, but they could not be answered. In deed the townes of the frontiers were well replenished and stuffed with men of war, and still were the Englishmen coasted, but they kept themselves so close together, without breaking their order, that their enemies could find them at none aduantage.

They passed by Cirtwine and by Bettwine, where they lodged one day. They made but easie iournies, and seemed to requite nothing but battell. They passed by Arras, by Miramont, and so to Clerie on the water of Some, and taried there thre daies, and in other places about in that countrie. The fourth day they dislodged, and dꝛe towards Cambꝛaie, and so to S. Quintines, & after vp towards Reimes. They found little riches, and small store of vittels abroad in the countrie, for the French king had abandoned all to his men of warre, who either wasted or conuerted all things of any value into the fortresses and walled townes. The Englishmen therefore sent to them of Reimes, requiring to haue some vittels sent to the host, for the which they would spare the countrie from wasting: but they of Reimes would not consent hereunto. Wherevpon the Englishmen began to light them such candels, as their eyes within the citie asked to behold the same a far off.

Whereouer the Englishmen approached so nere to the walles and ditches of the citie, that they brought a waie twentie thousand head of cattell, which the citizens had gotten within the compasse of their ditches; and further sent to them within, that if they would not send bread and wine forth to vittell the host, in that behalfe they would burne all their coine: for doubt whereof, the citizens sent forth to the host six charets laden with as much bread and wine as they might carie. Thus was their coine saued from destruction, and the Englishmen by loss and easie iournies dꝛe towards the citie of Tꝛois, in the which was the duke of Burgognie, with the dukes of Bourbon and Bar, the earle of Cleue, the lord Coucie, sir John de Alien high admerall of France, and a great number of others of the French nobilitie. They had made a battise without the towne able to receive a thousand men of armes, but vpon the Englishmens approach to assault it, they did forsake that strength, and withdꝛe to the towne. Sir Thomas Triuet was here made a baronet. Also there were certelie new knights made, as sir Peter Berton, sir John and sir Thomas Hauilie or Hauilet, sir John de Augulie, sir Thomas Doytingues, sir John Wastecroque, sir Thomas Bzatie, sir John Bzauin, sir Henrie Wernier, sir John Colenile, sir William Ceurat, sir Nicholas Stiugulie, and sir Hugh Lunit.

The English host perceluting the Frenchmen to withdꝛe into the towne, dꝛe together, and stood in order of battell for the space of two houres, and then returned to their lodgings. The next day they remoued to Paillerois le vicount nere unto Sens, and there they remained two daies, and after dꝛe into Castinois, and so into Beause. They were coasted all the waie by a great power of men of war, as many or more in number as they were themselves. But the French king being a politike prince, wiselie considered what losses the realme of France had suffered afore time, by giuing battell to the Englishmen, and therefore was fullie resolved, that in no wise he would giue licence to his people to fight with the earle of Buckingham; but thought better (as he had learned by good experience) to keepe his townes close against his enemies, and so in the end to locarie them, than by giuing battell to put things in hazard, where as he knew they could not take from him his countries by this kind of warre, though they soe indamaged the same for a time.

There chanced manie small skirmishes amongst those that rode forth to discouer the countrie, but no notable incounter at all. For the Englishmen in those daies were cats not to be catched without mitens (as Iacob Meir in one place saith) & againe the Frenchmen were as warie how they aduentured to come nere them, peraduenture for feare, as in the reigne of king Edward the 3. as C. O. noteth, saleng,

*Contra aciem magnam tremebundo corde Paleus

Non tamen Angligenas aduersum eist ausus aperto

Whelie they sought how to inclose them by in the countrie, and to fauillish them, that they might then fight with them at some great aduantage; but still the English host passed forward, holding on their boiage while the French king Charles the first was taken with a fore sicknesse, whereof he departed this life the same daie that the English armie passed ouer the ri-

September, his brethren the dukes of Anjou, Ber-rie, Bourbon, and Burgognie were at Paris with him at the houre of his death, where as a little before they had bene abroad in the countrie with their powders, to defend the cities and towncs of importance against the Englishmen, and meant indeed (if they could haue espied their aduantage, and gotten licence thereto of the king) to haue giuen their enimies battell. But now they were otherwise occupied: howbeit they had left their men abroad in the countrie to coast the Englishmen as they had done before. All the French power was assembled in the cittie of Paris, vnder the leading of the duke of Bar, the lord Coucie, and others.

into Britaine

In this meane while that the earle of Buckingham was passing through the realme of France, the French and Spanish gallies did much mischief on the coast of England: but about the latter end of June, by a fleet of Englishmen of the west countries part of them were forced to retire, and take harbour in an haven in Ireland called Kingale, where being assailed of the Englishmen and Irishmen, they were banquished, so that to the number of foure hundred of them were slaine, and their cheefe captaines taken, as Consaluc de Verfe, and his brother John Martin de Gortrigo, Turgo lord of Spozants; also the lord of Keith, Piers Martin of Cermew, John Modit of Cermew, the seneschall of Margarie, the seneschall of S. Andrew, Cornelis of S. Sebastiano, Paschale de Willeke, John Martinis, Sopogorge of S. Sebastiano, and diuerse other.

There were taken foure of their barges with a ballenger, and one and twentieth English vessels recoured, which they had robbed and taken awaie from their owners. There escaped yet foure of their notable capteins fro the hands of our men, Martin Grantz, John Piers Pantago, John Pulce Citario, and one Garcias of S. Sebastiano, so that the malice of those robbers ceased not. For they with the French gallies still lieng on the seas, when they espied anie aduantage, would land their people, and do what mis-chiefe they could, in taking preies, and burning townes and villages, although now and then they came thort to their vessels againe, losing sometimes an hundred, sometimes fourescore that were overtaken by the Englishmen that came forth against them. But among other inuasions which they made this summer on the coasts, we find that they burnt the towne of Winchelfe, & put the abbat of Battell to flight with his people, comming to succor that town and take one of his monks that was there in armor with the abbat. Some write also, that they burnt Kie, Hastings, and Portsmouth. Finally, their boldnesse so farre increased, that in August they entring with their gallies into the riuer of Thames, came by to Grauesend, where they burnt the most part of the towne, and on the other side of the riuer, as well in Essex as Kent, they burnt and spoiled diuerse places, and with their prisoners and booties returned without receiving anie hurt, bringing with them to France, both rich spoiles and good prisoners.

But to returne to the earle of Buckingham where he left. The English armie drew still towards Bri-taine, but with so small doubt of their adueraries, that they laie there or foure daies sometimes still in one place. At their approaching to the marches of Bri-taine, they came to Warric, a towne situate at the first entring into that countrie, and from thence went to Chateau Blant, and there rested, whither came to them certaine knights sent from the duke of Britaine, which signified to the erle of Buckingham that the dukes meaning was. And by the death of the French king, the dukes malice was greatlie abated towards the Frenchmen, so that he had not much passed if the Englishmen had bene at home againe. Howouer, his towncs were not determined to receiue the Englishmen, as enemies to the crowne of France: so that he was in a perplexitie how to order his businesse. At length, to shew himselfe a sted-fast friend to the Englishmen, and one that was no changeling, he determined by their support, to force all those to allow the league which he had established with the Englishmen, who had denied to beare armour against the crowne of France. And first, because they of Poants were the ringleaders of that rebellious demeanour, he appointed first to besiege their citie. They having knowledge thereof, sent into France for aid.

The dukes of Anjou, Berrie, Burgognie, and Bourbon, brethren to the late king, and uncle to his sonne the yong king, having the gouernance of the realme vnder him, sent six hundred speares with all speed to strengthen them of Poants, which defended the citie in such wise from the puissance of the Englishmen, who enuironed the same with a strong siege, that in the end, because the duke came not to them (according to his promise) the siege was raised the morrow after. The yeres daie, two moneths and foure daies after the same was first laid. The duke of Britaine would gladlie haue come to the siege of Poants, in strengthening of the English host, but he could not perswade his lords to aid him in anie such enterprise. And therefore now that the earle of Buckingham had broken vp his siege, he caused him to be lodged in the citie of Vannes, & his men abroad in the countrie, some here, and some there, acquitting himselfe as well towards them as he might.

But suerlie the hearts of the Britains were won-derfullie changed, and in no wise would consent to haue anie warre with the Frenchmen, if anie reasonable peace might be concluded. For manie that hated the father, bare good will and heartie lone to wards the sonne, whose yong yeares and great towardnesse allured the hearts of manie to wish him well. Verbpone was meanes made for a peace, which by the duke of Anjou his consent (who bare the greatest rule in France in that season) a finall accord was made, betwixt the yong king and the duke of Bri-taine, so that the duke should come and do his homage vnto the French king, and sweare to be true and faithfull vnto him; also that he should rid the Englishmen out of his countrie, and helpe them with ships and vessels to transport them home into England.

The earle of Buckingham, when he vnderstood of this peace, was not a little displeased in his mind, considering that the duke of Britaine had delt so vn-justlie with him and his nephew the king of England. But the duke still excused him by his subtleties, as though if he had not thus agreed, he should haue bene in danger to haue lost his heritage of that countrie. Finally, the earle after he had ships prouided for his passage, the eleuenth of Apill departed out of Vannes, and came to the haven where his ships laie, and so went abroad in like manner as other of his men did from other hauens, and shortly after (when the wind serued) took the sea, and returned into England, soze displeased with the duke of Bri-taine for his great vntruth and dissimulation (as he toke it) notwithstanding all excuses to cloake the matter by him alledged.

The Scots invade the English borders and spoile whole countries carrying away great booties.

An armie lingering in the north parts greatly impoverisheth the countrie.

Additions to Adam Merisuch.

Treason in letters writt by sir Rafe Ferrers to certeine French lords.

Whilest the Englishmen were thus occupied in warres against the Frenchmen (as before ye have heard) the Scots could not rest in quiet, but in revenge for a ship, which the townsmen of Newcastle and Hull had taken on the sea, knowing them to be pirates, determined to do what mischief they could unto the English borders: for the losse of that ship grieved them, because it was esteemed to be verie rich, the goods that were in it being valued at seven thousand marks. Whereupon the Scots entring by the west borders, invaded & spoiled the countries of Westmerland and Cumberland, and coming into the forest of Inglewood, they took a waite with them such a number of beasts and cattell, that they were reckoned at fourtie thousand heads of one and other. Besides this, they cruellie slew all such as they could lay hands upon, and burnt up all the townes, villages, and houses as they passed: and not content herewith, they stalle upon the towne of Penrith, when the faire was kept there, slaing, taking, and chaling a waite the people, and after gathering together all the goods and riches there found, took it a waite with them, whereof there was such plenty as might have satisfied the covetous desire of a most greedie armie. They returned by Carlisle, but hearing that there were gotten into it a great number of men out of the countries adjoining, they durst not staie to make any attempt against that towne, but compassed their waie to escape with their booties home into their countrie, which they did, although they lost some of their companie as they passed by an ambushment of certeine archers of Westmerland and Cumberland, that were laid for them of purpose. When the earle of Northumberland would have gone forth to revenge those injuries done to the countrie by the Scots, he was written to from the king and his counsell, to forbear till the date of truce, at what time it might be knownen what was further to be done in the matter.

About Michaelmasse the duke of Lancaster, the earles of Warwick, and Stafford, with other lords and men of honoz, having with them a great power of souldiers and men of warre, went into the north parts, and coming to the borders, they laie there till they had consumed no small summes of monie, and indamaged the countrie as much as if the Scottish armie had invaded the same. The good they did, was, that after long treatie with the Scottish commissioners, a truce was agreed upon till Easter following, which being concluded, they returned home without any more ado. For the space of halfe a score yeares together now last past, the Englishmen euerie yeare had one or two such treaties with the Scots about the incursions and rodes which they yearelie made into the English borders, soe indamaging the inhabitants of those north parts of the realme, notwithstanding any truce or abstinence of warre that might be concluded.

Whilest the armie (as ye have heard) late stole in the north parts, there were certeine letters found by a poze man about London, who delivered them unto the worshipfull citizen John Whilpot, who calling unto him certeine other worshipfull citizens, opened one of them, in which was contained matter of high treason: and perceiving by the seale that it belonged unto sir Rafe Ferrers knight, one of the kings private counsell, delivered that letter with foure other letters closed with the same seale, first to the lord chancellor, and after to the king, the which being read and the seale knowne to be the said sir Rafe Ferrers his seale, manie greatlie marvelled that so ancient a knight, and one in whom so great trust was put, should go about any such treasons.

Cleaguin, an other to the lord de la Riuere the chamberlaine of France, an other to the lord Clifton, and an other to the patron of the gallics, and to the capitaine of the armie of Frenchmen and Spaniards, which at the same time waisting alongst the coasts, did much hurt in diuerse places of the land. For with the said Whilpot and others were sent in post from the king to the duke of Lancaster, that for so much as the said sir Rafe Ferrers was then in the north parts with him, intreating with the Scots, he should arrest him and put him in safe keeping, which commandement the duke did accomplish, and committed him to be safely kept in the castell of Duresme, but shortly after in the next parlement he was set at libertie, foure barons being bound for his forth coming, till time that he might more evidently declare his innocencie.

About the feast of S. Martine, was a parlement holden at Northampton to the more trouble of them that came to it, because in that season of the yeare they were constrained to come where there was no stoe of felwell to make them fiers: and beside that, lodgings were verie streit for so great a multitude. But the cause that moved the counsell to appoint this parlement there, was to the end that they might the more easily proceed to the triall of John Kirbie a citizen of London, that had murdered the Wenzis (as before ye have heard) which Kirbie was condemned at this parlement, and drawne and hanged in the sight of the Londoners that were come thither, which execution if it should have bene done at London, the lords doubted least some tumult might have bene raised by the citizens, who were reckoned in those daies verie rash and presumptuous in their doings.

But now to the effect of this parlement. There was a new and strange subbidde or taske granted to be levied for the kings vse, and towards the charges of this armie that went ouer into France with the earle of Buckingham; to wit, of euerie prest secular or regular six shillings eight pence, and as much of euerie nunne, and of euerie man & woman married or not married being 16 yeares of age (beggars certeinlie knowne onlie excepted) foure pence for euerie one. Great grudging & manie a bitter curse followed about the leuieng of this monie, & much mischief rose thereof, as after it appeared. ¶ In this fourth yeare of king Richards reigne, immediatlie after Christmasse, Thomas Beantingham bishop of Exeter and lord tresuroz, was discharged of his office of tresurozship, and sir Robert Hales lord of S. Johns was advanced in his place, a right noble and manlie knight, but not beloued of the commons.

About this time did John Wickliffe chieslie set forth his opinion touching the sacrament of the altar, denieng the doctrine of transubstantiation, and that it ought not in any wise to be worshipped in such sort as the church of Rome then did teach. ¶ There were ambassadoz sent into Germanie, to treat with the emperor for a marriage to be had, betwixt the king of England, and the emperours sister. About the beginning of March they returned, bringing with them the cardinall, intituled of saint Wared, and the duke of Arllis, and other nobles that came from the emperor, to treat with the king & his counsell about the same marriage. This cardinall, when he passed the bounds of his commission and authority to him granted by the pope (as some write) whether he was furnished with such facilities, he was verie liberrall in bestowing of them abroad on all such as would come with monie. Indulgences, which the pope had vnto onelie to reserve for himselfe to be sold, this man granted the same liberrallie, both biennials and triennials. He gave also letters comel tionall, to all those that would paie for them, admitting aswell beneficed men as other, to be the popes chapleins. He made notaries for monie, and denied not altars portative to any that would pay for them.

He received forie pounds, besides other gifts, of the monks of the Cisterciur order, to grant to them a generall licence to eat fleshy indifferentlie, as well abroad, as they had bene accustomed to do at home within their monasteries. To those that were excommunicate he gave absolution: those that had bowed to go in pilgrimage to Rome, to the holie land, or to saint James, he would not first release them, till he had received so much monie, according to the true valuation, as they should have spent in their toznes: and to be byese, nothing could be asked, but for monie he was ready to grant it. And when he was requested to they by what power he did all these things, with great indignation he answered, that he would let them understand at Rome, if they would needs know the authoritie which he had. At length his males were so filled with siluer, that his servants disdaind to make them any answer, except they brought gold saing: Bring vs gold, for we are full of your siluer.
But at his departure he toke all awaie with him, vellous. This hath bene the practise of the Roma-niss from time to time, wherevpon greiv this com-

But now to returne to other matters concerning the state of the realme. After the returne of the earle of Buckingham, it was ordeined by aduise of the councell, that the duke of Lancasser should effones go as ambassadoz from king Richard into Scotland, to see if he might renew the truce (which whortlie would have bene expired) for thre yeres longer. Also whereas there was variance and open war mainteined, betwixt John king of Castile, and John king of Portingale, the earle of Cambridge, the lord Willliam de Beauchampe, the lord Botreux, and sir Spatthelw Courne, were sent into Portingale with five hundred armed men, and five hundred archers to aid the king of Portingale against the king of Castile, who was some to the bassard Henrie: for the duke of Lancasser refused greatlie, that he might haue such a friend as the king of Portingale, to soine with him in aid against the king of Castile; meaning (as some as oportunitie would serue) to go ouer with an armie to chalenge his right, and pursue his claime to the crowne of Castile and Leon, against the usurper, in right of his wife quene Constance, eldest daughter to the late lawfull king Peter, whom Henrie the bassard as before (ye haue heard) did still persecute, till he had bereft from him both his life and kingdome.

It was meant therefore that if the duke of Lancasser could compasse his purpose, for the which he went at that time into Scotland, to the honour of the king and realme, then should he shortly after follow his brother of Cambridge with a great power, to trie what chance God would send to him, against his aduersarie the king of Castile. ¶ In the meane time other incidents fell within the realme in the fourth yere of king Richard, soe to the disquieting of the same, and utter disappointing for that time of the duke of Lancassers intent. The commons of the realme soe repining, not onelie for the pole grotes that were demanded of them, by reason of the grant made in parliament (as ye haue heard) but also (as some write) for that they were soe oppressed (as they toke the matter by their land-lords, that demanded of them their ancient customes and seruices, set on by some diuelliish instint & persuation of their owne beastlie intentions, as men not content with the state whereinto they were called, rose in diuerse parts of this realme, and assembled together in companies, purposing to enforce the prince to make them free, and to release them of all seruitude, whereby they stood as bondmen to their lords and superiours.

Where this rebellion of the commons first began, diuerse haue written diuerslie. One authoz writeth, that (as he learned by one that was not farre from the place at that time) the first beginning should be at WERTFORD in Kent: for when those pole shillings, or rather (as other haue) pole grotes, were to be collected, no small murmuring, cursling, and repining among the common people rose about the same, and the more indeed, through the lewd denimour of some vndiscreet officers, that were assigned to the gathering thereof, inasmuch that one of those officers being appointed to gather by that monie in WERTFORD aforesaid, came to the house of one John Tiler, that had both seruants in his house, and a faire yong maid to his daughter. The officer therefore demanding monie for the said Tiler and for his wife, his ser-uants, and daughter, the wife being at home, and hir husband abroad at worke in the towne, made answer that hir daughter was not of age, and therefore she denied to paie for hir.

Now here is to be noted, that this monie was in common speech said to be due for all those that were undergrowne, bicause that yong persons as well of the man as of the womankind, comming to the age of fouretene or fiftene yeaeres, haue commonlie haire growning forth about those priue parts, which for honesties sake nature hath taught vs to couer and keepe secret. The officer therefore not satisfied with the mothers excuse, said he would seele whether hir daughter were of lawfull age or not, and therewith began to misuse the maid, and search further than honestie would haue permitted. The mother streightwaies made an outcrie, so that hir husband being in the towne at worke, and hearing of this ado at his house, came running home with his lathyng staffe in his hand, and began to question with the officer, asking who made him so bold to keepe such a rule in his house: the officer being somewhat presumptuous, and highminded, would forthwith haue flowne vpon this Tiler; but J. Tiler auoiding the officers blow, raught him such a rap on the pate, that his braines flew out, and so presentlie he died.

Great noise rose about this matter in the streets, and the poze folks being glad, euerie man arai-ed himselfe to support John Tiler, & thus the commons drew together, and went to Spaldesone, and from thence to Blackheath, where their number so increased, that they were reckoned to be thirtie thousand.
And the said John Tiler toke vpon him to be their chefe capteine, naming himselfe Jacke Straw.
¶ Others write, that one Thomas Baker of Fobhings was the first that procured the people thus to assemble togither: and that one of the kings ser-uants named John Leg, with thre of his fellows, practised to seele yong maids whether they were vndergrowne (as ye haue hard the officer did at WERT-ford) which dishonest and vnseemlie kind of dealing did set the people streight in such a rage and bypaze, that they cared not what they did to be reuenged of such iniuries.

But Thomas Walsingham affirmeth, that the first sparkes of this rebellion kindled in Essex, where the inhabitants of two tostones onelie at the first, that the commons were the authozs and first stirrers of all this mis-chance, did send vnto euerie little towne about, that all manner of men, as well those that were aged, as others that were in their lustiest time and youthfull peares, should come to them with speed, setting all ercuses apart, in their best arrate and furniture for warre, threatening to such as came not, that their goods should be spoiled, their houses burnt or cast downe, and they to lose their heads when they were taken. The terror of this threatening caused the ignorant people to flocke to them by heappes, leaving all their businesse, lett ing plough and cart stand; for taking wife, children, and houses, so that in a short time there were five thousand gotten together of those commons and husbandmen, of which number manie were weaponed onelie with staves, some with rustie swords and billes, and other with smokie bowes, more ruddie than old puerie, not hauing past two or three arrowes, and the same happilie with one feather

Among a thousand of those kind of persons, yee should not haue sene one well armed: and yet by reason of their multitude, when they were once got together, they thought the whole realme had not beene able to resist them; and supposed that they could with facilltie (in respect of the aduerser part) make the states of the land scope to them, and by their permission to Moreouer, to make their part the stronger, these Esmermen sent ouer into Kent, aduertising the people there of their enterpryse, and therefore willed them to make them readie to ioine with them for their obtaining of libertie, and reforming of the euill customs of the realme. Whether the Kentishmen through persuasions of their neighbors of Essex, by occasion of that which had chanced at Wertford (as before yee haue heard) or (as it may be) the same chancing at that selfe time, they being moued as well by the one as the other, by they got (as yee haue heard) and gathering their power out of the next quarters adjoining, by the like policie which had bene practised by the Essexmen, they stirred by the most part of the countrie to ioine with them, and forthwith stopping the waie that led to Canturburie, and arresting all such as passed by the same, they caused them to sweare that they should be true to king Richard, and to the commons, & neuer to receiue anie king that should be called John. And this was for the enuie which they bare to John of Gant the duke of Lancaster, who in right of his wife Constance, that was daughter to king Peter of Castile, did name himselfe king of Castile.

The oth mi-

Also they caused them to sweare that they should be readie to come to them whensoever they sent for them, and induce all their neighbours to take part with them. And further, that they should neuer yeld to anie tax to be leuied in the realme, except a fifteenth onelie. Thus it came to passe, that after it was spred abroad that thus these Essex and Kentishmen kept; the commons also in the counties of Sussex, Wertford, Cambridge, Suffolke, and Dorsetolke, and other shires about, bukked vp and ran together on heappes, so that the number of those brutlie people maruellouslie increased, in such wise as now they feared no resistance, and therefore began to shew prou-de of those things which they had before conceiued in their minds, behading all such men of law, iustices, and iuroz as they might catch, and laie hands vpon, without respect of pitie, or remorse of conscience, alledging that the land could neuer enioy hir native and true libertie, till all those sort of people were dispatched out of the waie.

This talke liked well the eares of the common vplandish people, and by the lesse conueieng the more, they purposed to burne and destioie all records, eni-dences, court rolles, and other muniments, that the remembrance of ancient matters being remoued out of mind, their landloz might not haue whereto to chalenge anie right at their hands: Their number still increased: for all such as were in debt or danger of law for their misdemeanors and offenses, came out of all coasts vnto them, so that when the Essex-men, and other of the hither side the Thames, were passed ouer and ioined with the Kentishmen, & those that were assembled on that side the riuer by Blackheath; they were esteemed to be an hundred thousand, hauing diuerse capteins besides the said Jacke Stratw, as William Watw, Wat Tiler, Jacke Shepheard, Tom Spilner, and Hob Carter.

Whilste they were lodged on Blackheath, the king sent to them certeine knights, to vnderstand of them the cause of their gathering thus together, to whome answer was made, that they were come together to speake with the king, about certeine causes and businesse, & therefore they bad the messengers returne, and declare to the king that there was no remedie but he must needs come and speake with them.

When this tale was told to the king, there were some that thought it best that he should go to them, and know what their meaning was: but Simon de Sudburie the archbishop of Canturburie, that was lord chancelor, and also sir Robert Hales lord of S.
Johns, and as then lord tresuroz, spake earnestlie against that aduise, and would not by anie meanes that the king should go to such a sort of barelegged ribalds; but rather they wished that he should take some order to abate the pride of such vile rascals. After the commons vnderstood that the king would not come to them, by reason of the contrarie aduise giuen to him by those two persons, the lord chancellor and the lord tresuroz, they were maruellouslie moued against them, and swore that they would not rest till they had got them; & chopped off their heads, calling them traitors to the king and realme.

Peuerthelesse there be that write, that the king (to cut off the branches of such mischefe now in the first budding thereof) to satisfie in part the desire of those rude people, went downe the riuer in his barge to Kethereth, and there nere the shore keeping himselfe still on the water, talked with a great number of them that came downe to the riuer side. But forsomuch as he would not come forth of his barge to them on land, which they seemed most to desire, they were in a great rage, and so for that they could not haue him amongst them (as they wished) in furious wise they ran to the citie, and at the first approach, they spoiled the burrough of Southwarke, brake vp the prisons of the Sparthalsea, & the Kings bench, set the prisoners at libertie, & admitted them into their compante.

This was on Corpus Christi daie, as the same authors write, that the king should thus talke with them: but their first entring into Southwarke, was on Corpus Christi euen, as Thomas Walsingham saith, passing at their pleasure to and fro the bridge all that night: for although the lord maior, and other of the best citizens would gladlie haue closed the gates against them, yet they durst not do it, for feare of the commons of the citie, who seemed to fauour the cause of the rebels so apparantie, that they threat-ned to kill both the lord maior, & all other that would take vpon them to shut the gates against the commons. The Londoners liked better of the commons, for that they protested the cause of their assembling together, was not but to take out the traittors of the realme, and when they had found them forth, and punished them according to that they had deserued, they ment to be quiet. And to giue the more credit to their satings, they suffered none of their companie to rob or spoile, but caused them to paie for that they toke.

On the morrow being Corpus Christi day, on the which day it is reported that the king should talke with them at Ketheresh (as before ye haue heard) after that they saw that they could not haue him to come and talke with them in land, as they wished, and that now they had filled their heads full with the fume of such wines as they dranke in euerie mans cellar that was set open for them, enter who would: they fell in talke with the Londoners of manie lewd deuises, as of the apprehending of traitors, and speciallie concerning such misliking as they had of the duke of Lancaster, whom they hated about all other persons. And hereupon agreeing in one mind, after diuerse other of their outrageous doings, they ran the same day to the said dukes house of the Sauoie, to the which in beautie and stateliness of building, with all manner of princelie furniture, there was not any other in the realme comparable, which in despite of the duke, whom they called traitor, they set on fire, and by all waies and means indeuoured utterly to destroye it.

The shamefull spoile which they there made was wonderfull, and yet the zeale of iustice, truth, and vpright dealing which they would seeme to shew, was as nice and strange on the other part, speciallie in such kind of misgouerned people: for in that spoiling of the dukes house, all the iewels, plate, and other rich and sumptuous furniture which they there found in great plentie, they would not that any man should see the better by it of a mite, but they all into the fire, so to be consumed; and such things as the fire could not altogether destroye, as plate and iewels, they brake and crashed in peces, throwing the same into the Thames. One of them hauing thus a faire silver peece into his bosome, meaning to conueie it awaie, was espied of his felloshes, who toke him, and cast both him and the peece into the fire; saying they might not suffer any such thing, sith they professed themselves to be zealous of truth and iustice, and not theues nor robbers.

There were 32 of them, that being gotten into the cellar of the Sauoie, where the dukes wines late, dranke so much of such swete wine as they found there, that they were not able to come forth, but with stones & wood that fell downe as the house burned, they were closed in, so that out they could not get. They laie there shewing & crying seven daies together, and were heard of manie, but none came to helpe them, and so finally they perished. Now after that these wicked people had thus destroyed the duke of Lancasters house, and done what they could deuise to his reproch; they went to the temple, and burnt the men of lawes lodgings, with their bookes, writings, and all that they might lay hand vpon. Also the house of saint Johns by Smithfield they set on fire, so that it burned for the space of seven daies together. On Friday a great number of them, esteemed to 20 thousand, went to the manor of Weiburie that belonged vnto the lord of saint Johns, and setting fire on it, sought utterly to destroye the whole buildings about it.

They were now diuided into thre parts, one under the leading of Jacke Straw, toke in hand to ruiinate that house, and an other number of them lay on mile end greene, and the third companie kept vpon the tower hill, and would not suffer anye vittels to be conueied into the tower, where the king at that time was lodged, and was put in such feare by those rude people, that he suffered them to enter into the tower, where they sought so narrowlie for the lord chancellor, that finding him in the chappell, they drew him forth together with the lord treasurer, and on the tower hill without reuerence of their estates and degrees, with great noise and fell cries, they stroke off their heads. There were also beheaded at the same tyme by those rude people, one of the kings seruants that was a sergeant at armes called John Leg, who had used himselfe somewhat extremelie in gathering vp of the pole moine, as by one wyse it appeareth. Also to make by the myeste, they beheaded a franciscane frier, whom they had taken there at the same tyme, for malice of the duke of Lancaster, because he was verie familiar with him. Some write that this frier was confessor, and other say that he was physician to the king; but whatsoeuer he was, the commons chopped off his head, to beare the other companie, not sparing for anye respect that might be alledged in any of their behalves.

On the same day also they beheaded manie others, as well Englishmen as Flemings, for no cause in the world, but onelie to satisfie the crueltie of the commons, that then were in their kingdome, for it was a sport to them, when they gat any one amongst them, that was not sworne to them, and seemed to mislike of their doings, or if they bare but neuer so little hatred to him, straightwaies to plucke of his hood, with such a yelling noise as they toke vp amongst them, and immediatlie to come thronging into the streets, and strike off his head. Neither had they any regard to sacred places; for breaking into the church of the Augustine friers, they drew forth thirtene Flemings, and beheaded them in the open streets; and out of the parish churches in the citie, they toke forth seuentene, and likewise stroke off their heads, without reuerence either of the church or feare of God.

But they continuing in their mischeuous purpose, shewed their malice speciallie against strangers, so that entring into euerie street, lane, and place, where they might find them, they brake vp their houses, murdered them which they found within, and spoiled their goods in most outrageous manner. Likewise they entered into churches (as before ye haue heard) into abbeies, monasteries, and other houses, namelie of men of law, which in semblable sort they ransacked. They also brake vp the prisons of newgate, and of both the counters, destroyed the bookes, and set prisoners at libertie, and also the sanctuarie-men of saint Martin le grand. And so likewise did they at Westminster, where they brake open the eschequer, and destroyed the ancient bookes and other records there, doing what they could to suppress law, and by might to beate downe equitie and right, as it is said, Tunc ius calcatur violentia cum dominatur.

They that entered the tower, used themselves most presumptuouslie, and no lesse vnreuerentlie against the princesse of Wales, mother to the king: for thrusting into his chamber, they offered to kill him, and swaht downe vpon his bed, putting him into such feare, that he fell into a swoone, and being taken vp and recovered, was had to the water side, and put into a barge, & conueied to the place called the quaines wardrobe, or the tower stall, where he remained all that day and the night following, as a woman halfe dead, till the king came to recomfort him. It was strange to consider, in what feare the lords, knights & gentlemen stood of the cruell proceedings of those rude & base people. For where there were sir hundred armed men, and as manie archers in the tower at that present, there was not one that durst gainsaie their doings.

Finally, when they had eased their stomachs, with the spoiling, burning, and defacing of sundrie places, they became more quiet, and the king by the aduise of such as were then about him, vpon god deliberation of counsell, offered to them pardon, and his grace,

peace, with condition that they should cease from burning and ruining of houses, from killing and murdering of men, and depart euery man to his home without more adoe, and there to tarrie for the kings charters confirmatorie of the same pardon. The Cistermen were content with this offer, as they that were desirous to see their wiues and children, being wearie of continuall trauell and paines which they were constrained to take. The king went forth vnto Spile end, and there declared vnto the commons that they should haue charters made to them of his grant, to make them all free. And further that euery shire, towne, lordship and libertie should haue banners of his armes deliuered vnto them, for a confirmation of his grant. Hereupon they seemed well appeased, and the king rode to the queenes wardrobe, otherwise called the tower roiall, to visit his mother, and so did comfort hir so well as he could, and taried with hir there all night.

The Cistermen satisfied with the kings promises, immediately departed homeward; howbeit they appointed certeine of their companie to remaine still and tarie for the kings charters. The Gentlemen also remained, and were as busie in manner the next day being Saturday, in all kind of mischievous dealings, as they had bene before, to wit, in murdering of men, overthrowing and burning of houses. The king therefore sent vnto them such as declared in what sort their fellows were gone home well satisfied, & from thenceforth to liue in quiet, and the same forme of peace he was contented to grant to them, if it liked them to accept the same. Hereupon their chiefe captaine Wat Tyler, a verie craftie fellow, and indued with much wit (if he had well applied it) said, that peace indeed he wished, but yet so, as the conditions might be indited to his purpose.

He was determined to driue off the king and his counsell (because he was of greater force than they) with cauls and shifts till the next daie, that in the night following he might the more easilie haue compassed his resolution, which was, hauing all the power lost of the citie on his side, to haue spoiled the citie, and to set fire in foure corners of it, killing first the king and the lords that were about him; but he that resisteth the proud, and giueth his grace to the humble, would not permit the pugnacious deuises of the naughtie and lewd lozzell to take place, but suddenly disappointed his mischievous drift. For whereas diuerse formes of charters had bene drauone according to the effect of the agreement with the Cistermen, and none of them might please this lordlie rebell, at length the king sent to him one of his knights called sir John Peto, to request him to come to him, that they might talke of the articles which he stood vpon to haue inserted in the charter, of the which one was to haue had a commission to put to death all lawiers, escheaters, and other which by any office had any thing to doe with the law; for his meaning was that hauing made all those awaie that understood the lawes, all things should then be ordered according to the will and disposition of the common people. It was reported in deed, that he should saie with great pride the day before these things chanced, putting his hands to his lips, that within foure daies all the lawes of England should come forth of his mouth. The wretches had utterly forgotten all law, both diuine and humane; otherwise they would haue bene content to liue vnder law, and to doe vnto others as they would be done vnto, as the verie law of nature (than which there cannot be a better guide) teacheth,

Quod tibi vis fieri mihi fac, quod non tibi, noli,

Sic potes in terris viuere iure poli.

When therefore the said sir John Peto called vpon him to come awaie to the king, he answered as it were with indignation: If thou (saist he) hast so much hast to retorne to the king, thou maist depart, I will come at my pleasure. When the knight therefore was come from him, he followed indeed, but somewhat slowlie. And when he was come nere to the place in Smithfield where the king then was, with certeine lords and knights, & other companie about him, the said sir John Peto was sent to him againe, to vnderstand what he meant. And because the knight came to him on horsebacke, & did not alight from his horse, Wat Tyler was offended, & said in his furie, that it became him rather on foot than horsebacke to approach into his presence. The knight not able to abide such presumptuous demeanour in that proud and arrogant person, shapd him this answer: It is not amisse that I being on horsebacke, should come to thee sitting on horsebacke.

With which words Wat Tyler taking indignation, drew out his dagger, menacing to strike the knight, calling him therewith traitor: the knight declining to be misused at the hands of such a ribald, told him that he lied falselie, and with that plucked forth his dagger. Wat Tyler being among his men, shewed that he would not beare that iniurie, and forthwith made towards the knight to run vpon him. The king perceiving the knight in danger, bad him alight from his horse, and deliuer his dagger to Wat Tyler: but when that would not pacifie his proud and high mind, but that he would needs slee by on him, the maior of London William Wallworth, and other knights and esquires that were about the king, told him that it should be a shame for them all, if they permitted the knight in their presence before the eyes of their prince so to be murdered: wherefore they gaue counsell to succor him forthwith, and to apprehend the vile naughtie ribald. The king though he was but a child in yeares, yet taking courage to him, commanded the maior to arrest him. The maior being a man of incomparable boldnesse, forthwith rode to him and arrested him, in reaching him such a blow on the head, that he sore astonished him therewith: and streightwaies other that were about the king, as John Standish an esquier, and diuers more of the kings seruants drew their swords, and thrust him thorough in diuerse parts of his bodie, so that he fell presently from his horse downe to the earth, and died there in the place.

When the commons beheld this, they cried out, Our captaine is traitorously slaine, let vs stand together and die with him: let vs shote and reuenge his death manfully: and so bending their bowes, made them readie to shote. The king shewing both hardnesse and wisdome at that instant, more than his age required, set his spurs to his horse, and rode to them, saing; What is the matter my men, what meane you? Will you shote at your king? We not troubled nor offended at the death of a traitor and ribald; I will be your king, captaine and leader, follow me into the fields, and you shall haue all things that you can desire. This did the king, to the end he might appease them, least they should haue set fire on the houses there in Smithfield, and haue attempted some further mischefe, in reuenge of the displeasure which they took for the death of their chiefe leader. They moued with these the kings words, followed him and the knights that were with him, into the open fields, not yet resolved whether they should set vpon the king and slea him, or else be quiet, and retorne home with the kings charter.

In the meane time, the lord maior of London was returned into the citie, with one man onelie attending vpon him, and cried to the citizens; Ah ye good and vertuous citizens, come forth out of hand, and helpe your king readie to be slaine, & helpe me your standing in the same perill; or if ye will not helpe me for some fautes committed by me against you, yet forsake not your king, but helpe and succour him in this present danger. When the twochipfull citizens and other, that in their loiall hearts loved the king, had heard these wordes, incontinentlie they put themselves in strong and sure armoz, to the number of a thousand men, and gathering themselves together into the streets, carried but for some lord or knight that might conduct them to the king: and by chance there came unto them sir Robert Knolles, whome all of them requested that he would be their leader, least comming out of arrate and order, they might the sooner be broken, who willinglie led one part of them, and certaine other knights led other of them, clad in faire bright armour unto the kings presence. The king with the lords, knights and esquires, not a little reioiced at the comming of those armed men, and straightwaies compassed the commons about, as they had bene a flocke of sheepe that should have bene closed within some fold, till it pleased the shepheard to appoint forth, which should be thrust into pasture, and which taken to go to the shambels.

There was to be scene a marvellous change of the right hand of the lord, to behold how they throwing downe staves, bills, axes, swordes, bowes and arrows, humble began to sue for pardon, which a little before gloried to have the life of the king and his seruants whole and altogether in their hands, power, and disposition. The poore wretches sought to hide themselves in the coyne that grew in the fields, in ditches, hedges, and demmes, and wheresoeuer they might get out of the way, so to save their lives. The knights that were with the king would gladlie have bene doing with them, and requested licence of him to strike off the heads of some one or two hundred of them, that it might be a witnesse in time to come, that the force of the order of knightthod was able to do somewhat against the carters and ploughmen: but the king would not suffer them, alleging that manie of them were come thither by compulsion, and not of their owne accord, and therefore it might come to passe that those should die for it, that had nothing offended: but he commanded that there should be proclamation made in London, that the citizens should have no dealings with them, nor suffer anie of them to come within the citie that night, but to cause them to lie without dozes.

In the report of this commotion chonographers do somewhat varie, as by this present extract out of Henric Knighton canon of Leicester abbey, living at the time of this tumult may appeare: which Abraham Fleming hath faithfully and trulie translated out of the annales of the said canon written in parchment in old Latine letters, as followeth. Upon a Saturday, these malcontents [to wit, Thomas Baker the first mover but afterwards the principall leaders, Jacke Straw, Jacke Miller, Jacke Carter, Jacke Trewoman, and their frechetous traine] met together in Smithfield, whither also the king repaired in the morning, who although in private he was but young, yet in wisdom and discretion he was well grown. The ringleader of this tumultuous rout, whose right name was Wat Tyler, which he had now changed into Jacke Straw, approached nere the king, in so much that he might in a manner touch him, beating the mouth of all the residue, and having in his hand a yron dagger, which he tolde from hand to hand, boy-like playing with it, & waiting due time therewith, if not to kill, yet fadde to hit the king, if he denied their requests. Whereupon they that were next and about the king were greatly affraid, least his pretended mildnes should come to passe,

How he creawed of the king that all warrens, waters, parks and woods should be common, so that as well poore as rich might feelee in any place wheresoeuer practise fishing in ponds, poles, rivers, or any waters, and might hunt deere in forrests and parkes, and the hare in the fields, with diuerse other requests, which he would have granted without contradiction or gaine-saying, and exercise without controulment. How then the king in the grant hereof by deliberation used some delate, Jacke Straw drew nearer unto him, and speaking unto him certaine threatening wordes, took hold of the horses bable whereon the king rode, upon that presumptuous enterpryse he wot not. Which John Malworth a burgeise of London beholding, and fearing present death to hang over the kings head, caught a weapon in his hand, and therewith thrust Jacke Straw through the throte, which when another that was by being an esquier, named Rafe Standish did see, with his weapon also ran him through the sides; in so much that he fell flat on his backe to the ground, and beating with his hands to and fro a while, at last he gaue up his unhappy ghost.

When a great clamor and lamentable outcrie was made, and heard a great while together, saying, Our guide is dead, our capitaine is dead. And indeed so he was, being dragged by the hands and feet in a vile and contemptible sort into saint Bartholomewes church hard by. Then did manie of the unrulie multitude withdraw themselves, and vanishing awaie betooke them to their heeles, being about the number (as it was thought) of ten thousand. Then the king minding to make amends and to requite received courtesie, knighted the said John Malworth, & Rafe Standish, with foure burgesses more of the citie, namelie John Philpot, Nicholas Wembze, John Laund, and Nicholas Twisseld, girding them about the waist with the girdle of knightthod, which was the manner of their graduating. Then the king having ordeined and made the foresaid six knights, commanded that the residue of the cursed crew should depart and get them into the field, that meeting together in a companie, he might fall unto a treatie of agreement with them.

The rout being there assembled, behold a multitude of armed men ran rushing out of the citie, sir Robert Knolles being their capitaine, who with these his soldiers compassed & hedged in the poore captives distressed in the field like sheepe that have lost their shepheard. When the king of his accustomed clemencie, being pricked with pittie, would not that the wretches should die, but spared them being a rash and wilful multitude, and commanded them euerie man to get him home to his owne house; howbeit manie of them, at the kings going awaie suffered the danger of death. In this miserable taking were reckoned to the number of twentie thousand. Thus saith Knighton, not as an eye-witnesse, but as taught by heare-saie, whereby he compiled the greatest part of his annales, as he himselfe confesseth, fearing so that he was so constrained, as by part of the addition at the foot of the first page, intituled Lamentium compilatoris, appeareth in manner and forme following.

*Sum cecum factus subita caligine tactus, Nec opus inceptum iam corrigo forsitan inceptum.
Me memio dulium pro veris saepe locutum, Plus audita loquor quam mihi visa sequor.*

All the foresaid villantes notwithstanding against the king and the state, tending whole to the subversion of law and euill gouernement, albeit the lawes deserved no sparke of fauour, but executed the iudgement to be executed upon them; yet (as ye haue heard) besides the great clemencie of the king, exhibited unto them in remitting their offense, offense, and acquiting them from the rigor of the law, he granted and gave to them the charter, which they had requested, faire written and sealed, to avoid a greater mischief, & commanded it for a time to be delivered them, knowing that Cister and Kent were not so pacified, but that if they were not the sooner contented, and that partlie after their minds, they would up againe. The tenor of the charter which was gotten thus by force of the king was as followeth.

Albions not yet quieted.

The commons having obtained this charter departed home, but ceased not from their riotous demeanour in sundrie parts of the realme, and especially at saint Albions, where after the townesmen were returned home, they kept such a coile against the abbat and monks, to haue certeine ancient charters delivered them that concerned their liberties, and to haue such new made and delivered to them as might serue their purpose; that because such old charters as they requested were not to be had, the abbat and monks looked euerie houre when their house should be set on fire and burnt ouer their heads. The prior and certeine other as well monks as laie men that were seruants to the abbat, fled for feare of the rage of those misgouerned people, knowing that they hated them deadlie, and therefore looked for no courtesie at their hands. They had obtained the kings letters vnto the abbat, commanding him to deliver vnto them such charters as they had giuen information to be remaining in his hands, so that vnder colour thereof, they called for those writings in most impotunate wise, threatening sore, if they were not brought to light, vntill they destroyed the house by setting it on fire.

But to speake of all the vnrulle parts of those unrulle people, it were too long a proceesse: yet at length after they understood how their grand capteine and cheefe ringleader Wat Tyler was slaine, they began somewhat to allwaie their presumptuous attempts, the rather for that there came a knight with the kings letter of protection in behalfe of the abbat and his house, and yet they were not so calmed; but that they continued in requiring to haue charters made to them by the abbat, of the like forme and effect to that which the king had made, concerning the infranchising them from bondage, where they had obtained such charters in the past times, so that they were charged of all seruices and accustomed labours, so that they meant not to do any further works, nor yeld such customes as befoze time they vsualtie had bene accustomed to do and yeld vnto their lordes.

Neither did the townesmen of saint Albions, and the tenants of other townes and villages thereabout, that belonged to the abbey of saint Albions, thus outrageously misdemean themselves, but euerie where else the commons kept such like stir, so that it was rightlie called the hurling time, there were such hurlie burlies kept in euerie place, to the great danger of ouerthrowing the whole state of all good gouernment in this land. For euerie the selfe same saturday after Corpus Christi day, in Suffolke there were got together to the number of fiftie thousand men, by the setting on of John Wratw, a naughty lewde priest, that had bene first among the Cistermen at London, and was sent downe in all post hast from Wat Tyler, to stirre the commons in those parts to commit the like mischief as he had seene begun about London. These fellows therfore, after they were assembled together, fell to the destroing of the manors and houses of men of law, & such lawiers as they caught, they slue, and beheaded sir John Cauendish lord chiefe iustice of England, and set his head vpon the pilloie in the market place in saint Edmundsburie.

Also sir John of Cambridge the prior of saint Edmundsburie, as he would haue fled from them, was taken not far from Mildehale, and likewise beheaded, his bodie being left naked in the open field, and no man presuming to burie it, during the space of fife daies, for feare of the cruell commons. His head was set vpon a pole, and caried befoze John Wratw and other of those wicked people; the which coming to Burie, and entring the towne in maner of a procession, when they came into the market place where the pilloie stood, as it were in token of the old friendship betwixt the lord chiefe iustice, and the said prior, they made sport with their heads, making them sometime as it were to kisse, other whiles to sound in either others eare. After they had taken their pastime inough herewith, they set both the heads againe aloft vpon the pilloie. After this, they beheaded an other monke called Dan John de Lakinghuish, whose head was likewise set by the other two vpon the pilloie. Moreover, they caused the monks to come forth and bring vnto them all such obligations, in which the townesmen stood bound vnto the monastrie for their good abearing; likewise such charters of liberties of the towne of Burie, which king Eate the founder of the said monastrie, and his successors had granted to the same: which writings when they had brought forth, and protested that they knew of no more, the commons would scarcele beleue them, and therefore called the townesmen forth; and had them see if that there were all such writings as they thought stood with their advantage to haue brought to light. The townesmen feigned as though they had bene faine to see such rule kept against the monks, where in deed they had set the commons in hand with all these things. To conclude, the commons took this order with the monks, that if the townesmen might not obtaine their ancient liberties, by the hauing of those writings, they should declare that the same liberties were, which they were wont to inioy, and the abbat of Burie, Edmund Hammfeld, being then in prison at Nottingham whom they purposed to deliuer (so that he should celebrat diuine seruice in his monastrie on Whitsunmoe daies next) within fourte daies after his coming home, should confirme with his seale such charter as was to be desired and made concerning the same liberties of the said townesmen, and the priest should likewise put there vnto their common seale.

Moreover, they constrained the monks to deliuer vnto unto the townesmen, a crosse and a chalice of fine gold, and other iewels that belonged to the abbey, being in value above the worth of a thousand pounds in monie, the which was to remaine in the hands of the townsmen, upon this condition, that if Edmund Spumfield being deliuered out of prison inioied the dignitie of abbat there, and with all put his seale together with the consent seale within the time limited, unto a writing that should containe the liberties of the towne, that then the same crosse, chalice, and other iewels should be restored unto the monastrie, or else the same to remaine for ever to the townesmen as forfeited. Such were the doings of those rebels in and about the towne of Wurie: and the like disorders & breach of peace followed by the commotions of the commons in Cambridgeshire, and in the Isle of Elle, resembling the others in slaughters of men, destruction of houses, and all other sorts of mischief.

In like maner in Norfolk there was assembled an huge number of those unruly countrie people, which under the guiding of a dier of cloth, commonly called John Littleser, that had dwelt in Norfolk, attempted and did all such vngratious feats, as they had heard that other did in other parts of the realme, yea and greater also, putting forth their hands unto rapine and robbery. And whereas they were wholie conspired together, and bent to commit all kind of mischief, yet esteeming their owne authoritie to be small, they purposed to haue brought William Suffolk earle of Suffolke into their felowship, that if afterwards they might happilie be impeached hereafter, for such their naughtie and most wicked doings, they might haue had some shadow or colour, as it were through him, whie they had delt in such unruly foie. But the earle aduertised of their intention, suddenlie rose from supper, and got him a waie by unknowne waies, still fleeing from the commons, till at length he got to Alborne, and so from thence to the king.

The commons missing of their purpose for the hauiing of him, laid hold vpon all such knights and other gentlemen as came in their waie, and were found at home in their houses, compelling them to be sworne to them, and to ride with them through the countrie, as the lord Scales, William lord Spolie, sir John Welwes, sir Stephan Hales, and sir Robert Salle: which sir Robert continued not long alieue among them, for he could not dissemble as the residue, but began to reproue openlie their naughtie doings, for the which he had his bzaines dasyt out by a countrie clowne, one that was his bondman, and so he ended his life, who if he might haue come to haue tried his manhood and strength with them in plaine battell, had bene able to haue put a thousand of those villaines in feare, his valiancie and prowesse was such. The residue taught by his example that they must either dissemble or die for it, were glad to currie fauour, praisling or dispraisling all things as they saw the commons affected, and so comming into credit with their cheefine John Littleser, that named himselfe king of the commons, they were preferred to serue him at the table, in taking the assaie of his meats and drincks, and doing other seruises, with kneeling humbly before him as he sat at meat, as sir Stephan Hales who was appointed his caruer, and others had other offices assigned them.

At length, when those commons began to wearie of taking paines in euill doings, they toke counsell together, and agreed to send two knights, to wit, the lord Spolie, and sir John Welwes, and three of the commons, in whom they put great confidence, unto the king, to obtaine their charter of manumission and enfranchising, and to haue the same charter more large than those that were granted to other countries. They deliuered great summes of monie unto those whome they sent, to bestow the same for the obtaining of pardon, and such grants as they suied for, which monie they had got by force of the citizens of Norwich, to saue the citie from fire and sack. These knights as they were on their iourne, at Norwich looking for any such thing, met with sir Henrie Spenser bishop of Norwich, a man more fit for the field than the church, & better skilled (as may appere) in arms than in diuinitie. This bishop had aduertised at his manor of Burlie nere to Dham in the parties about Stamford, of the sturre which the commons in Norfolk kept, and thereupon resolved straightwaies to see what rule there was holden. He had in his companie at that time, not passing eight lances, and a small number of archers.

The bishop meeting thus with the knights, examined them straightwaies if there were any of the traitours there with them. The knights at the first were doubtfull to betraie their associates: but at last emboldened by the bishops words, declared that two of the cheefe doers in the rebellion were there present, and the third was gone to prouide for their dinner. The bishop straightwaies commanded those two to be made shorter by the head, and the third he himselfe went to seeke, as one of his shepe that was lost; not to bring him home to the fold, but to the slaughter-house, as he had well deserued (in the bishops opinion) sith he had so mischeuouslie gone astrate, and alienated himselfe from his dutifull allegiance. These persons being executed, and their heads pight on the end of poles, and so set by at Norwich, the bishop with the knights toke their waie with all speed towards Northwalsham in Norfolk, where the commons were purposed to staie for answer from the king: and as he passed through the countrie, his number increased, for the knights and gentlemen of the countrie, hearing how their bishop had taken his speare in hand, and was come into the field armed, ioined themselves with him.

When therefore the bishop was come into the place where the commons were incamped, he perceiued that they had fortified their campe verie stronglie with ditches, and such other stuffe as they could make shift with, as doores, windowes, boards, & tables, and behind them were all their cariages placed, so that it seemed they meant not to flie. Herewith the bishop being chafed with the presumptuous boldnesse of such a sort of disordered persons, commanded his trumpets to sound to the battell, and with his speare in the rest, he charged them with such violence, that he went ouer the ditch, and laid so about him, that through his manfull doings, all his companie found means to passe the ditch likewise, and so therewith followed a verie sore and terrible fight, both parts doing their best to banquish the other. But finallie the commons were overcome, and driuen to seeke their safegard by flight, which was sore hindered by their cariages that stood behind them, ouer the which they were forced to cline and leape so well as they might. John Littleser and other cheefe captaine were taken alieue. The bishop therefore caused the said Littleser to be arraigned of high treason, and condemned, and so he was hanged, and headed according to the iudgement.

The bishop heard his confession, and by vertue of his office absolued him: and to shew some parcell of sorrowing for the mans mischance, he went with him to the galloves. But it seemed that pittie wrought not with the bishop, to quench the zeale of iustice: for he caused not Littleser onelie to be executed, but sought for all other that were the cheefe doers in that rebellion, rebellion, causing them to be put vnto death, and so by that meanes quieted the countrie. ¶ To recite that was done in euerie part of the realme in time of those hellish troubles, it is not possible: but this is to be considered, that the rage of the commons was vniuersallie such, as it might seme they had generalie conspired together, to do what mischaunce they could deuise. As among sundrie other, what wickednesse was it, to compell teachers of children in grammar schooles to sweare neuer to instruct any in their art: Againe, could they haue a more mischeuous meaning, than to burne and destroe all old and ancient monuments, and to murder and dispatch out of the waie all such as were able to commit to memorie, either any new or old records: For it was dangerous among them to be knowne for one that was lerned, and more dangerous, if any men were found with a penner and inkyorne at his side: for such sel dome or neuer escaped from them with life.

But to returne to saie somewhat more concerning the end of their rebellious enterpryses, you must vnderstand, how after that Wat Tyler was slaine at London in the presence of the king (as before ye haue heard) the hope and confidence of the rebels greatlly decayed: and yet neuerthelesse, the king and his counsell being not well assured, granted to the commons (as ye haue heard) charters of manumission and infranchisement from all bondage, and so sent them awaie home to their countries: and forthwith here vpon he assembled an armie of the Londoners, and of all others in the countries abroad that bare him good will, appointing none to come, but such as were armed and had hoxles, for he would haue no footmen with him. Thus it came to passe, that within thre daies he had about him fourtie thousand hoxlesmen, as was esteemed; so that in England had not bene heard of the like armie assembled together at one time. And herewith was the king aduertised, that the Kentishmen began effronies to stir, where with the king and the whole armie were so grieuouslie offended, that they meant straight to haue set vpon that countrie, and to haue wholie destroyed that rebellious generation. But thorough intercession made by the lords and gentlemen of that countrie, the king pacified his mood, and so resolved to proceede against them by order of law and iustice, causing iudges to sit and to make inquisition of the malefactors, and especiallie of such as were authours of the mischeues.

And about the same time did the maior of London sit in iudgement, as well vpon the offenders that were citizens, as of other that were of Kent, Essex, Southser, Dorsetholke, Suffolke, and other counties, being found within the liberties of the citie; and such as were found culpable, he caused them to lose their heads, as Jacke Straw, John Kirkbie, Alane Tredera, and John Sterling, that gloried of himselfe, for that he was the man that had slaine the archbishop. This fellow (as it is written by some authours) straight waies after he had done that wicked deed, fell out of his wits, and comming home into Essex where he dwelt, tied a naked sword about his necke, that hong downe before on his brest, and likewise a dagger naked, that hanged downe behind on his backe, and so went by and downe the lanes & streets about home, crying out, and protesting, that with those weapons he had dispatched the archbishop; and after he had remained a while at home, he came to London againe, for that he shuld receiue (as he said) the reward there of the act which he had committed: and so indeed, when he came thither, and boldlie confessed that he was the man that had beheaded the archbishop, he lost his head in stead of a recompense: and diuerse other both of Essex and Kent, that had laid violent hands vpon the archbishop came to the like end at London, where they did the deed, being betwzaied by their owne confessions.

Here is to be remembred, that the king, after the citie of London was deliuered from the danger of the rebels (as before ye haue heard) in respect of the great manhood, and assured loialtie which had appeared in the maior, and other of the aldermen, for some part of recompense of their faithfull assistance in that dangerous season, made the said maior William Wallworth knight, with five other aldermen his brethren, to wit, Nicholas Bramble, John Philpot, Nicholas Twiford, Robert Aundre, and Robert Coston, also John Standish, that (as ye haue heard) holpe to slaine Wat Tyler. Whereouer, the king granted, that there should be a dagger added to the armes of the citie of London, in the right quarter of the shield, for an augmentation of the same armes, and for a remembrance of this maior his valiant act, as doth appeare vnto this daie: for till that time, the citie bare onelie the crosse, without the dagger.

Although the kings authoritie thus began to shew it selfe, to the terror of rebels; yet the commons of Essex effronies assembled themselves together, not far from Hatfield Beuerell, and sent to the king to know of him if his pleasure was, that they should enjoy their promised liberties: and further, that they might be as free as their lords, and not to come to any court, except it were to the great leet, twice in the yeare. When the king heard such presumptuous requests, he was in a great chafe, & dispatched the messengers awaie, with a sore threatening answer, saying that bondmen they were, and bondmen they should be, and that in more vile manner than before, to the terrible example of all other that should attempt any the like disorders: and forthwith, the earle of Buckingham, and the lord Thomas Percie, brother to the earle of Northumberland, were sent with an armie to repressse those rebels, whome they found fortified within woods, hedges and ditches verie stronglie, but with small adoe they were put to flight, & about five hundred of them slaine; the residue saved themselves as well as they might, by succour of the woods. There were eight hundred hoxles also taken, which those rebels had there with them, to drabe and carrie their baggage.

Those of the rebels that escaped, were not yet so tamed by that overthrow, but that assembling themselves together in a rout, they made towards Colchester: and comming thither, would haue persuaded the townesmen to haue ioined with them in a new rebellion. But when they could not bring their purpose to passe, they marched towards Sudburie. The lord Fitz Walter, and sir John Harleston, vnderstanding which waie they toke, followed them with a companie of armed men, and suddenlie setting vpon them as they were making their proclamations, due of them so manie as it liked them, and the other they saued, and suffered to depart, or else committed them to prison. After this, the king came to Haueering at the bowze, and from thence to Chelmsford, where he appointed sir Robert Triskian to sit in iudgement of the offenders and rebels of that countrie, where vpon an inquest being chosen, a great number were indicted, arraigned, & found guiltie, so that vpon some one gallowes there were nine or ten hanged together.

In euerie countrie were like inquiries made, and the chiefe offenders apprehended and put to death in euerie lordship through the realme, where anie of them were detected, by ten, twelue, twentie, thirtie, yea and in some places by fortie at once; so that the whole number grew to fiftene hundred and aboue. At the first, when the kings iustices began to sit in Essex, Kent, and at London, by reason of the multitude inde that were to be executed, they onelie chopped off their heads, but afterwards when that kind of death seemed to close and secret for so open offenses, they proceeded according to the accustomed law of the realme, by condemning them to be drawne and hanged, and according therunto they were executed.

In the meane time, the king by the aduise of his counsell, directed his letters reuocatozie into euerie countie there, to be proclaimed in euerie citie, borough, towne, and place, as well within the liberties as without, by the which letters he reuoked, made void and frustrate his former letters of infranchising the bondmen of his realme, and commanded that such as had the same letters, should without delaie bring them in, and restore them to him and his counsell to be cancelled, as they would answer upon their faith and allegiance which they ought to him, and upon paine of forfeiting all that they had. The date of which letters reuocatozie was at Chelmsford, the second daie of Julie, in the fift yeare of his reigne.

When the king had quieted the countie of Essex, and punished such as were the chiefe stirrers of that wicked commotion in those parts, he went to saint Albons, to see iustice done upon such as had demerited themselves most presumptuously against the kings peace in that towne, namely against the abbat and his house, who sought to defend themselves under a colour of friendship, that they trusted to find in some persons about the king. But that trust deceived them, and procured the more displeasure against them, for that they would not sue for fauour at the abbats hands in time, by submitting themselves unto his will and pleasure. To be briefe, the king came thither with a great number of armed men and archers, and caused his iustice sir Robert Trissilian to sit in iudgement upon the malefactors, that were brought thither from Hertford gaile.

Whither was brought also to the king from Couentrerie, John Wall prest, whome the citizens of Couentrerie had taken, and now here at saint Albons they presented him to the kings presence, whereupon he was arreigned and condemned, to be drawne, hanged, and beheaded for such notable treasons as he was there convicted of. He receiued iudgement upon the saturdaye the first daie that the said sir Robert Trissilian sat in iudgement, but he was not executed till the mondaye following. This man had bene a preacher the space of twentie yeares, and because his doctrine was not according to the religion then by the bishops mainteined, he was first prohibited to preach in anie church or chapel; and when he ceased not for all that, but set forth his doctrine in the streets and fields where he might haue audience, at length he was committed to prison, out of the which he prophesied that he should be deliuered with the force of twentie thousand men, and even so it came to passe in time of the rebellion of the commons.

When all the prisons were broken vp, and the prisoners set at libertie, he being therefore so deliuered, followed them, & at Blackheath when the greatest multitude was there got together (as some write) he made a sermon, taking this saleng or common prouerbe for his theme, whereupon to intreat,

When Adam delu'd, and Eue span,

Who was then a gentleman?

and so continuing his sermon, went about to proue by the words of that prouerbe, that from the beginning, all men by nature were created alike, and that bondage or seruitude came in by iniust oppression of naughtie men. For if God would haue had anie bondmen from the beginning, he would haue appointed who should be bond & who free. And therefore he exhorted them to consider, that now the time was come appointed to them by God, in which they might

(if they would) cast off the yoke of bondage, & recouer libertie. He counselled them therefore to remember themselves, and to take good hearts vnto them, that after the manner of a good husband that tilleth his ground, and riddeeth out thereof such euill weeds as choke and destroye the good corne, they might destroye first the great lords of the realme, and after the iudges and lawiers, quismongers, and all other whom they undertooke to be against the commons, for so might they procure peace and suertie to themselves in time to come, if dispatching out of the waie the great men, there should be an equalitie in libertie, no difference in degrees of nobilitie, but a like dignitie and equall authoritie in all things brought in among them.

When he had preached and set forth such kind of doctrine, and other the like fond and foolish toies vnto the people, they extolled him to the starres, affirming that he ought to be archbishop and lord chancellor, where he that then enioied that rone, meaning sir Simon de Sudburie that then was alieue, was a traitor to the king and realme, and worthy to lose his head, wherefoeuer he might be apprehended. Many other things are reported by writers of this John Wall, as the letter, which vnder a kind of darke riddle he wrote to the capitaine of the Essex rebels, the copie whereof was found in one of their purses that was executed at London.

The tenor of the said seditious preests letter.

When Schæpe S. Marie prest of Porke, and now of Colchester, greeteth well John namelesse, and John the Miller, and John Carter, & biddeth them that they beware of guile in Bourrough, & stand together in Gods name, & biddeth Diers ploughman go to his worke, and chastise well Hob the robber, & take with you John Trewman and all his fellowes, and no mo. John the Miller & ground small, small small, the kings sonne of heauen shall paie for all. Beware of yee be wo, know your friend from your fo, haue enough and saie ho, and do well and better, see time and seeke peace, and hold you therein, and so biddeth John Trewman and all his fellowes.

This letter he confessed himselfe to haue written, as Thomas Walsingham affirmeth, with manie other things which he had done and committed, to the disquieting of the realme, for the which he was drawne, hanged, and beheaded at saint Albons, the sixteenth of Julie, being monday, in this fift yeare of king Richards reigne. On the same daie, the kings iustice sir Robert Trissilian sat upon the rebels of saint Albons, and other of the countrie of Hertford, afoze whome, by such policie as he vsed, there were a great number indicted, and diuerse being arreigned, were found guiltie, as William Grindecob, William Cabindon, John Barboz, and certeine others, which were hanged and drawne, to the number of fiftene persons in all; diuerse chiefe men of the towne were committed to prison, as Richard Wallingford, John Carleke, William Berewill, Thomas Putoz and others of the countrie about. There were committed to prison to the number of fourescore persons, the which neuerthelesse, by the kings pardon, were released and dismissed.

were found to do contrarie therunto, the same commissioners had authoritie, and were commanded to arrest and imprison them, till for their further punishment, order might be taken and agreed vpon in that behalfie accordinglie.

On saint Margarets daie, the king being readie to take his iourne to Berkhamssted, in the great court of the abbey of S. Albons had all the commons of the countie of Hertford before him, that had summons there to appeare, all that were betwixt fiftene and thre score yerres of age, where they toke an oth together from thence forth, to be faithfull subiects vnto him, and neuer to rise o: make anie commotion, to the disturbance of his peace; and rather to die, than to consent vnto anie rebellious persons, whome they shoud to the vitermost of their powers do their best, to apprehend and deliuer them to the kings prison, that they might be forth comming. After they had receiued this oth, they were licenced to depart, and the king rode to Berkhamssted, where he remained for a time, and went to Cthamssted to recreate himselfe with hunting, where he was informed, that those which were hanged at S. Albons, were taken from the gallowes, and remoued a good waie from the same: with which presumption he was so wroth, that he sent forth with his letters to the bailiffes of the towne of S. Albons, commanding them vpon the sight of the same, to cause cheines to be made, and to bring the said bodies backe vnto the gallowes, and to hang them in those chaines vpon the same gallowes, there to remaine, so long as one peece might sticke to another, according to the forme of the iudgement giuen. The text of this writ thus directed to the bailiffes of saint Albons, was at Cthhamssted the third of August, in the fift yeare of this kings reigne, and in the yeare of our lord a thousand three hundred foure score and one.

The townemen of S. Albons durst not disobey the kings commandement, and so hanged by againe in chaines the dead bodies of their neighbors, great-lie to their shame and reproch, when they could get none other for anie wages to come nere the sinking carcases, but that they were constrained themselves to take in hand so vile an office. And such was the end of the tumults at S. Albons, where as well as in other places, the vnrulie commons had plaied their parts. To conclude and make an end of these vnrulie troubles, to the end it may appeare, in what danger as well the B. as the whole state of the realme stood, by the mischeuous attempts of the vnrulie people, I haue thought good to declare the confession of Jacke Straw one of their chiefe captiues (and next in reputation amongst them vnto Wat Tyler) when he came to be executed in London, according to indiciall sentence passed against him.

¶ At the same time (said he) that we were assembled vpon Blackheath, and had sent to the king to come vnto vs, our purpose was to haue slaine all such knights, squiers, and gentlemen, as shoud haue gi-uen their attendance thither vpon him: and as for the king, we would haue kept him amongst vs, to the end that the people might more boldlie haue repaired to vs, sith they shoud haue thought, that whatsoeuer we did, the same had bene done by his authoritie.
¶ Finally, when we had gotten power inough, that we needed not to feare anie force that might be made against vs, we would haue slaine all such noble men, as might either haue giuen counsell, o: made anie resistance against vs, speciallie the knights of the Rhodes; and lastlie we would haue killed the king and all men of possessions, with bishops, monks, chanons, and parsons of churches, onelie friers & peni-cants we would haue spared, that might haue sufficed for ministratation of the sacraments. And when we had made a riddance of all those, we would haue deuised lawes, according to the which the subiects of this realme shoud haue liued, for we would haue created kings, as Wat Tyler in Kent, and other in other countiees. But because this our purpose was disappointed by the archbishop of Canturburie, that would not permit the king to come to vs, we sought by all meanes to dispatch him out of the waie, as at length we did. ¶ Howouer, the same euening that Wat Tyler was killed, we were determined, hauing the greatest part of the commons of the citie bent to ioine with vs, to haue set fire in foure corners of the citie, and so to haue diuided amongst vs the spoile of the cheefest riches that might haue bene found at our pleasure. And this (said he) was our purpose, as God may helpe me now at my last end.

Thus may you see, after what sort they were conspired to the destruction of the realme, and to haue aduanced and enriched themselves; not considering o: foresceing the euill successe of their tumultuous broile, and that it would tend but little to their profit in the end, by a common spoile to amend their state, and to become mightie and rich with gods euill gotten, which though for a time (if lucke had serued them to haue possessed) they had enioied, yet could they not long prosper nor bring god vnto the possessors: for Non habet euentus sordida praeda bonos.

And lest this one mans confession might seeme insufficient, diuerse other of them confessed the same, o: much what the like in effect, when they saw no remedie but present death before their eyes. To declare the occasion whie such mischeues happened thus in the realme, we leaue to the iudgement of those that may coniecture a truth thereof, by conferring the manners of that age & behaviour of all states then, sith they that wrote in those daies, may happlie in that behalfe misse the truth, in construing things according to their affections. But truelie it is to be thought, that the faults, as well in one degree as another, speciallie the sinnes of the whole nation, procured such vengeance to rise, whereby they might be warned of their euill doings, and seeke to reforme the same in time conuenient. But as it cometh still to passe; when the danger is once ouerthot, repentance likewise is put ouer, and is no more regarded, till an other scourge cometh effronces to put men in remembrance of their dueitie; so in like manner (as seemeth) it chanced in this kings daies, as by that which followeth may more plainlie appeare.

In this meane time that these troubles were at the hottest in England, the duke of Lancaster being in Scotland, so behaved himselfe in the treatie which he had in hand with the Scots) dissembling the matter so, as if he had not understood of any trouble in England at all, that finally before the Scots had knowledge thereof, a truce was concluded to endure for two yeares, or (as other haue) for three yeares. When he had made an end there, and that all things were agreed upon and passed, for the confirmation of that accord, he returned to Berwike, but at his coming thither, the capitaine sir Pattheu Kedman would not suffer him to enter the towne, because of a commandement given to him from the earle of Northumberland, lord warden of the marches: wherefore the duke was glad to returne into Scotland againe, obtaining licence of the Scots to remaine amongst them, till the realme of England was reduced to better quiet. Whereupon, the commons in England that fauored him not, took occasion to report the worst of him that might be deuised, calling him now in time of their rebellious commotions, a traitor to the realme, declaring that he had joined himselfe to the Scots, and meant to take part with them against his owne native countrie.

The king indeed had sent commandement, during the time of the rebellious troubles, vnto the earle of Northumberland, that he should haue good regard to the safe keeping of all the townes & castels under his rule, & not to suffer any person to enter the same, having forgotten to except the duke of Lancaster being then in Scotland: whereupon the duke took no small displeasure with the earle of Northumberland, as after he well shewed at his coming home. But before he returned forth of Scotland, he wrote to the king to vnderstand his pleasure, in what sort he should returne, humbling himselfe in such wise, as he made offer to come with one knight, one equier, and a groom, if it should please the king so to appoint him; or if it so were that by his presence it was thought the realme was like to fall in any trouble, he was ready to depart into exile, neuer to returne into his countrie againe, if so be that through his absence the king and realme might injoy peace and quietnesse.

The king hearing such offers, wrote to him, that his pleasure was to haue him to returne home, with all his whole traine; and if the same were not thought sufficient to gard him, he should take of euery towne by the which he passed, a certeine number of men to attend him vnto the next towne for his safeguard, and so it was done, the king sending him commission to that effect, and thus coming to the court, he was of the king right honorablie receiued. Within few daies after his coming, he exhibited a grievous complaint against the earle of Northumberland, for abusing him in diuerse sorts, in time of the late troubles, so as his honour was greatlie thereby touched; for which the earle was sent for, and commanded to come vnto Berkhamssted; where all the lords in manner of the land were assembled in counsell.

Where, after the duke had laid diuerse things to the earles charge, for his disobedience, vnfaithfulness, and ingratitude; the earle after the manner of his countrie, not able to forbear, brake out into reprochfull words against the duke, although he was commanded by the king to cease, where the duke kept silence in humble manner, at the first word, when the king commanded him to hold his peace, so that by reason of the earles disobedience in that behalfe, he was arrested. But yet the earls of Warwike and Suffolke undertaking for his appearance at the next parliament, he was suffered to depart, and so the counsell brake up. About the feast of All saints the par-ment began, to the which the duke of Lancaster came bringing with him an exceeding number of armed men, and likewise the earle of Northumberland with no lesse companie came likewise to London, & was lodged within the citie, hauing great friendship shewed towards him of the citizens, who promised to assist him at all times, when necessitie required, so that his part seemed to be ouerstrong for the duke, if they should haue come to any trial of their forces at that time.

The duke laie with his people in the suburbs, and euery daie when they went to the parliament house at Westminister, both parts went thither in armour, to the great terror of those that were wise and graue personages, fearing some mischief to fall forth of that vnaccustomed manner of their going armed to the parliament house, contrarie to the ancient vsage of the realme. At length, to quiet the parties and to avoid such inconueniences, as might haue growen of their dissention, the king took the matter into his hands, and so they were made friends, to the end that some good might be done in that parliament, for reformation of things touching the state of the realme, for which cause it was especiallie called: but now after it had continued a long time, and few things at all concluded, newes came that the ladie Anne sister to the emperor Maximilian, & affianced wife to the king of England, was come to Calis, whereupon the parliament was proroged till after Christmas, that in the meane time the marriage might be solemnized, which was appointed after the Epiphanie: and forthwith great preparation was made to receiue the bride, that she might be conueied with all honour to the kings presence.

Such as should receiue hir at Douer repaired thither, where at hir landing, a marvellous and right strange wonder happened; for she was no sooner out of hir ship, and got to land in safetie with all hir companie, but that forthwith the water was so troubled and shaken, as the like thing had not to any mans remembrance euer bene heard of: so that the ship in which the appointed queene came ouer, was terrible rent in peces, and the residue so beaten one against another, that they were scattered here and there after a wonderfull manner. Before hir coming to the citie of London, she was met on Blackheath by the mayo and citizens of London in most honorable wise, and so with great triumph conueied to Westminister, where (at the time appointed) all the nobilitie of the realme being assembled, she was solemnized in marriage to the king, and crowned queene by the archbishop of Canturburie, with all the glorie and honour that might be deuised. There were also holden for the more honour of the same marriage, solemne iusties for certeine daies together, in which, as well the Englishmen as the new queenes countrymen shewed proofe of their manhood and valiance; whereby praise & commendation of knightlie prowess was achieved, not without damage of both the parties.

After that the solemnitie of the marriage was finished, the parliament estimes began in the which many things were enacted, for the behoofe of the commonwealth. And amongst other things it was ordained, that all manner manumissions, obligations, releases, and other bonds made by compulsion, duress, and menace, in time of this last tumult and riot against the lawes of the land, and good faith, should be utterlie void and annihilated. And further, that if the kings faithfull liege people did perceiue any gathering of the commons in suspected wise; to the number of six or seauen, holding conuenticles together, they should not staie for the kings writ in that behalfe for their warrant, but forthwith it should be lawfull for them to apprehend such people, assembling together, and to laie them in prison, till they might answer their doings. These and manie other things were established in this parlement, of the which, the most part are set forth in the printed booke of statutes, where ye may read the same more at large.

The sudden death of the earle of Suffolke.

In time of this parlement William Stafford the earle of Suffolke, being chosen by the knights of the shires, to pronounce in behalfe of the common-wealth, certeine matters concerning the same: the booke daie and houre in which he should haue serued that turne, as he went vp the staires, towards the upper house, he suddenlie fell downe and died in the hands of his seruants, busie about to take him vp, whereas he felt no greife of sicknesse when he came into Wellminster, being then and before merrie and pleasant enough, to all mens sights. Of his sudden death, manie were greatlie abashed, for that in his life time, he had shewed himselfe courteous and amiable to all men. ¶ The parlement shortly thereafter took end, after that the merchants had granted to the king for a subsoie certeine customes of their wools, which they bought and sold, called a maletot, to endure for foure yeares. ¶ The lord Richard Scrope was made lord chancellor, & the lord Hugh Degraue lord treasurer.

The earle of March his good seruice whilich he was deputed in Ireland, with his doctrine.

John Wylke.

About the same time, the lord Edmund Mortimer earle of March, the kings lieutenant in Ireland, departed this life, after he had brought in manner all that land to peace and quiet, by his noble and prudent gouernement. In this season, Wicliffe set forth diuers articles and conclusions of his doctrine, which the new archbishop of Canturburie, William Courteney, latelie removed from the see of London, unto the higher dignitie, did what he could by all shifts to suppress, and to force such as were the setters forth and maintainers thereof, to recant, and utterly to renounce. What he brought to passe, in the booke of acts and monuments set forth by master Fox, ye may find at large. The tuesday next after the feast of saint John Baptistine, an other parlement began, in which at the earnest sute and request of the knights of the shires, John Wylke priest that was the chiefe doer among the commons in Suffolke, at Burie, and Spildenhall, was adiudged to be drawn, and hanged, although manie belened, that his life should haue bene redeemed for some great portion of monie.

A coloprophet serued aright.

Ships of Rie win a good price.

A lewd fellow that toke vpon him to be skillfull in physike and astronomie, caused it to be published thorough the cite of London, that vpon the Ascension euen, there would rise such a pestilent planet, that all those which came abroad forth of their chambers, before they had said five times the Lords prayer, shen commonlie called the Water noster, and did not eate somewhat that morning, before their going forth, should be taken with sicknesse, & suddenlie die thereof. Spanie wols belened him, and obserued his order; but the next day, when his presumptuous Heng could be no longer faced out, he was set on horse backe, with his face towards the taile, which he was compelled to hold in his hand in stead of a bydle, and so was led about the cite, with two lordes pates about his necke, and a whetstone, in token that he had well deserved it, for the notable lie which he had made.

About the same time, certeine English ships of Rie, and other places, went to the sea, and meeting pirats, fought with them, and ouercame them, taking seven ships, with three hundred men in them. One of those ships had bene taken from the Englishmen afore time, and was called the falcon, belonging to the lord William Latimer. They were all richlie laden with wine, wax, and other good merchandise. This yeare the maior of London John de Poorthampton, otherwise called John de Comberton, did punish such as were taken in adulterie, heerie extremitie: for first he put them in the prison, called the tunne, that then stood in Cornhill, and after caused the women to haue their haire cut, as thous in those daies were serued that were appeachers of others, and so were they led about the streets with trumpets & pipes going before them. Neither were the men spared more than the women, being put to manie open shames and reproches. But because the punishment of such offenses was thought rather to appertene vnto the spirituall iurisdiction, than to the tempozall, the bishop of London, and other of the cleargie, toke it in verie euill part: but the maior, being a stout man, would not forbeare, but died his authority herein to the uttermost.

The Londoners favour of Wicliffes doctrine.

The fishermen gets for his maie.

About the same time also, when the archbishop of Canturburie fate in iudgement vpon a procelle that was framed against one John Aton, a maister of art, that was an earnest follower of Wicliffes doctrine, the Londoners bzake open the doores, where the archbishop with his diuines fate, and caused them to giue ouer, so that they durst proceed no further in that matter. The same yeare were the fishmongers of London sore disquieted by the foresaid maior, who sought to infringe their liberties, granting licence to forreners to come and sell all manner of fish, as fraile and more fraile than any of the companie of fishmongers: for they might not bue it at the forreners hands to sell it againe by any meanes, and so that companie which before had bene accompted one of the chiefest in the cite, was now so brought downe, as it seemed to be one of the meanest, being compelled to confesse, that their occupation was no craft, nor worthie so to be accompted amongst other the crafts of the cite.

In this yeare, the one and twentieth of Maie being wednesday, a great earthquake chanced about one of the clocke in the after none; it was so vehement, and natielie in Kent, that the churches were shaken therewith in such wise, that some of them were overthrowen to the ground. On the saturday after, being the four and twentieth day of Maie, earlie in the morning, chanced an other earthquake, as (as some write) a watershake, being of so vehement & violent a motion, that it made the ships in the hauens to beat one against the other, by reason whereof they were sore brused by such knocking together, to the great wonder of the people, who being amazed at such strange tokens, stood a long time after it more awe of Gods wrath and displeasure than before, for these so strange and dreadfull wonders thus shewed amongst them: howbeit when these terrozs were forgotten, they followed their former dissolateness, from the which for a time they were withdraue through feare of Gods heuie hand hanging ouer their heads; but afterward like swine they wallowed afresh in their puddels of pollutions; & as dogs licked by their filthy vomit of corruption and naughtinesse, for

About this season, the lord Richard Scrope lord chancellor was depofed from that roome, and the king returing the great seate at his hands, kept it a certeine time, and sealed therewith such grants and writings as it pleased him: at length, it was deliuered to Robert Braybrooke bishop of London, who was made lord chancellor. The cause why the lord Scrope was removed from that dignitie, was this. When the king vpon certeine respects had granted certeine gentlemen the lands and possessions that belounged to the late earle of March, and other that were deceased (which he, during the time of their belisminogities, ought to inioy by the lawes of the realme) realme) the said lord chancelor refused to seale such grants, alledging that the king being greatlie in debt, which he was to discharge, stood in need of such profits himselfe, and therefore (as he said) he toke not them for faithfull seruants, nor dutifull subiects to his grace, that respecting their owne priuat commoditie more than his or the realmes, did sue for such grants at his hands, aduising them to hold themselves contented with such other things, as it had pleased or might please the king to bestow upon them: for suerlie he would not consent, that they should inioy such gifts as those were. They that were thus relected, made their complaint in such sort to the king, that he taking displeasure with the said lord chancelor, deposed him from his office, to the great offense both of the nobles and commons, by whose consent he was preferred vnto that dignitie.

A new rebellion intended in Dorsetshire was betrayed by one of the conspirators before it burst out.

About Michellmasse this yeare, certeine naughty disposed persons in Dorsetholke, not warned by the successe of the late rebellion, went about a new commotion, intending to murder the bishop of Dorsetholke, and all the nobles and gentlemen of that countie. And to bring their wicked purpose the better to passe, they determined to haue assembled together at St. Faithes faire, and to haue compelled all those that should haue bene present at the same faire, to haue taken part with them, or else to haue lost their liues: and this being done, they would haue taken St. Benets abbey at Holme, which they would haue kept for a fortress, to haue withdrawne into vpon anie force that had bene against them. But yer they could bring their purpose to passe, one of the conspiracie betwixt the matter, they were taken, & lost their heads at Dorsetholke, for their malicious deuises.

The commissioners of Flanders relected for want of sufficient authority.

About the same time a parlement was called, to the which certeine commissioners from the countie of Flanders came, to treat of certeine agrements betwixt the king and realme, and the states of their countie: but because those that came ouer at this time, seemed not sufficient to conclude such treatie as then was in hand, they were sent backe to fetch other more sufficient, as from euerie towne in Flanders some such as might haue full authoritie to go through, and confirme the agrements then in hand. In this parlement, the maiors of London, with a great part of the commoners of the citie, vpon suggestion by them made against the fishmongers, for vsing great deceit in vttering of their fishes, obtained to haue it inacted, that from thenceforth, none of that companie, nor anie of the vintners, butchers, grocers, or other that sold anie provision of vittells, should be admitted maiors of the citie: and so by this they sought to cut off all meanes from the fishmongers to recover againe their old former beggar. And because it was knowne well inough of what authority Sir John Philpot knight was within the citie, and that he fauoured those whome the lord maiors the said John de Dorsethampton fauoured not, he was put off from the bench, and might not sit with them that were of the secret counsell in the cities affaires, whereas neuertheless he had trauelled more for the preservation of the cities liberties than all the residue. Sir Henrie Spenser bishop of Dorsetholke, receiued bulls a little before this present from pope Urbane, to signe all such with the crosse, that would take vpon them to go ouer the seas with him, to warre against those that held with the antipape Clement, that toke himselfe for pope, and to such as would receiue the crosse in that quarrell, such like beneficiall pardons were granted by pope Urbane, as were accustomed to be granted vnto such as went to fight against the Infidels, Turkes, and Saracens, to wote the remission of sinnes, and manie other graces. fits granted by those bulls, to all such as either would go themselves in person, or else giue anie thing toward the furtherance of that voiage, & maintenance of them that went in the same, shewed those bulls in open parlement, & caused copies to be written forth, & sent into euerie quarter, that his authoritie & power legantine might be notified to all men, for the better bringing to passe of that he had in charge. And truely it should appeare, there wanted no diligence in the man to accomplish the popes purpose: and on the other part yee must note, that the priuileges which he had from the pope, were passing large, so that as the matter was handled, there were diuerse lords, knights, esquires, and other men of warre in good numbers, that offered themselves to go in that voiage, and to follow the standards of the church with the bishop, and no small summes of monie were leuied and gathered amongst the people, for the furnishing forth of that armie, as after yee shall heare.

In this meane time the earle of Cambridge returned home from Portingale, whether (as yee haue heard) he was sent the last yeare, and promise made, that the duke of Lancaster should haue followed him; but by reason of the late rebellion, and also for other considerations, as the warres in Flanders betwixt the erle and them of Gaunt, it was not thought conuenient that anie men of warre should go forth of the realme: and so the king of Portingale not able of himselfe to go through with his enterpryse against the king of Spaine, after some small exploits achieved by the Englishmen, and other of the earle of Cambridge his companie, as the winning of certeine fortresses belonging to the king of Castile, and that the two kings had laine in field, the one against the other by the space of fiftene daies without battell, the matter was taken by, and a peace concluded betwixt them, soze against the mind of the earle of Cambridge, who did what in him laie, to haue brought them to a set field: but when there was no remedie, he bare it so patientlie as he might, and returned home with his people, soze offended (though he said little) against the king of Portingale, for that he dealt otherwise in this matter than was looked for. He had affianced his sonne, which he had by the daughter of Peter, sometime king of Castile, vnto the king of Portingales daughter, now in the time of his being there: but although he was earnestlie requested of the said king, he would not leaue his sonne behind him, but brought him backe with him againe into England (together with his mother) doubting the slippery faith of those people.

The earle of Cambridge returned out of Portingale.

The earle of Cambridge his son affianced to the king of Portingales daughter.

1383

In the Lent season of this first yeare of king Richards reigne, an other parlement was called at London, in the which there was hard hold about the bulls sent to the bishop of Dorsetholke from pope Urbane, concerning his iourne that he should take in hand against the Clementines (as we may call them, for that they held with pope Clement) whome the Urbanists (that is, such as held with pope Urbane) toke for schismatikes. Diuerse there were, that thought it not good that such summes of monie should be leuied of the kings subiects, and the same together with an armie of men to be committed vnto the guiding of a prelat vnskillfull in warlike affaires. Other there were that would needs haue him to go, that the enemies of the church (as they toke them) might be subdued.

Clementines. Urbanists.

And although the more part of the lords of the vpper house, and likewise the knights and burgeses of the lower house were earnestlie bent against this iourne, yet at length those that were of the contrary mind, prevailed, so it was decreed, that it should forward, and that the said bishop of Dorsetholke should haue the fiftenth granted to the king in the last parliament.

lement, to paie the wages of such men of warre as should go ouer with him: for soldiers without monie passed not much of pardons, no not in those daies, except at the verie point of death, if they were not assured how to be answered of their wages, or of some other consideration wherby they might gaine. ¶ The tenth that was granted afore by the bishops at Wyke, was now in this same parlement appointed to remaine to the king for the keeping of the seas, whilist the bishop should be lord of the realme in following those wars.

These things being thus appointed, the bishop sent forth his letters firmid with his seale into euerie prouince and countrie of this land, giuing to all parsons, vicars, and curats, though this realme, power and authoritie to heare the confessions of their parishioners, and to grant unto those that would bestow any parcell of their goods, which God had lent them towards the aduancing of the iourne to be made by the crossed soldiers against pope Urbans enemies, the abolition and remission of all their sinnes by the popes authoritie, according to the forme of the bull before mentioned. The people understanding of so great and grations a benefite (as they took it) thus offered to the English nation, at home in their owne houses, were desirous to be partakers thereof, and those that were warlike men, prepared themselves to go forth in that iourne with all speed possible. The residue that were not fit to be warriors, according to that they were exhorted by their confessors, bestowed liberallie of their goods to the furtherance of those that went: and so, few there were within the whole kingdome, but that either they went, or gaue somewhat to the aduancing forth of the bishop of Norwich his voyage.

Froissard.

This bishop chose diuerse to be associat with him, as captains that were expert in warlike enterprises. The first and principall was sir Hugh Caluerlie an old man of warre, and one that in all places had borne himselfe both valiantlie and politike; next unto him was sir William Farington, who stoutlie spake in the bishops cause, when the matter came in question in the parlement house, touching his going ouer with this croisie. Besides these, there went diuerse noble men and knights of high renowne, as the lord Henrie Beaumont, sir William Elmham, and sir Thomas Triuet, sir John Ferrers, sir Hugh Spenser the bishops nephew by his brother, sir Spatslew Kedman capitaine of Berwik, sir Nicholas Acreton, or Traiton, sir William Farington, and manie other of the English nation: & of Calcogne there went le sire de Chasteauneuf, and his brother sir John de Chasteauneuf, Rahmund de Sparfen, Gnilonet de Pam, Gariot Higlier, John de Cachetan, and diuerse other. Sir John Beauchampe was appointed marshall of the field, but because he was at that present in the marches of the realme towards Scotland, he was not readie to passe ouer when the bishop did. The duke of Lancaster liked not well of the bishops iourne, for that he saw how his voyage that he meant to make into Spaine was hereby for the time disappointed, and he could haue bene better contented (as appeareth by writers) to haue had the monie imployed vpon the warres against the king of Castile that was a Clementine, than to haue it bestowed vpon this voyage, which the bishop was to take in hand against the French king, and other in these neerer parts. Herevpon there were not manie of the nobilitie that offered to go with the bishop.

The statute against simoniers repealed, they are restored to their liberties.

But to saie somewhat of other things that were concluded in this last parlement, we find, that the stronger, which through meanes of the late lord marshal John of Northampton and his complices were put from their ancient customes and liberties, which they inioied aforesaid within the citie, were now restored to the same againe, sauing that they might not keepe courts among themselves, as in times past they used, but that after the maner of other crafts and companies, all transgressions, offences, and breaches of lawes and customes by them committed, should be heard, tried, and reformed in the maiors court. ¶ All this winter the matter touching the gathering of monie towards the croisie, was earnestlie applied, so that there was leuied what of the disme, and by the deuotion of the people for obtaining of the pardon, so much as betwix to the summe of five and thientie thousand franks.

When the bishop therefore had set things in god forwardness for his iourne, he drew towards the sea side, and was so desirous to passe ouer, and to inuade his aduersaries, that although the king sent to him an expresse commandement by letters to retorne to the court, that he might conferre with him before he took the seas; yet excusing himselfe, that the time would not then permit him to staie longer, he passed ouer to Calis, where he landed the 23 of April, in this first yeare of king Richards reigne. The armie to attend him in this iourne, rose to the number of two thousand horsemen, and fiftene thousand footmen (as some write) though other speake of a far lesser number. But it should seeme that they went not ouer all at one time, but by parts, as some before the bishop, some with him, and some after him.

Now when he and the captains before named, were come ouer to Calis, they took counsell together into what place they should make their first inuasion; and because their commission was to make warre onelie against those that held with pope Clement, the more part were of this mind, that it should be most expedient for them to enter into France, and to make warre against the Frenchmen, whom all men knew to be chiefe maintainers of the said Clement. But the bishop of Norwich was of this opinion, that they could not do better than to inuade the countrie of Flanders, because that a litle before, earle Aelwes hauing intelligence that king Richard had made a confederacie with them of Gaunt, had on the other part expelled all Englishmen out of his dominions and countrees, so that the merchants which had their goods at Bruges, and other places in Flanders, sustained great losses. Howbeit there were that replied against the bishops purpose herein, as sir Hugh Caluerlie and others; yet at length they yielded thereto, and so by his commandement they went straight to Grauelin, the 21 day of Maie, and immediatlie wan it by assault. Wherevpon Bruckburge was yielded vnto them, the lines and goods of them within saved. Then went they to Dunkirke, & without any great resistance entred the towne, and wan there exceeding much by the spoile, for it was full of riches, which the Englishmen pilfered at their pleasure. The earle of Flanders lieng at Lille was aduertised how the Englishmen were thus entred his countrie, wherevpon he sent ambassadors vnto the English host, to vnderstand why they made him warre that was a right Urbanist.

The bishop of Norwich for answer, declared to them that were sent, that he took the countrie to appertene to the French king, as he that had of late conquered it, whom all the whole world knew to be a Clementine, or at the least he was assured that the countrie therabouts was of the inheritance of the ladie of Bar, which likewise was a Clementine: and therefore, except the people of that countrie would come and loine with him to go against such as were knowne to be enemies to pope Urbane, he would suerlie seeke to destroye them. And whereas the earls ambassadors required safe conduct to go into England by Calis, to vnderstand the kings pleasure in this mater, the bishop would grant them none at all; wherefore they went backe againe to the earle their maister with that answer.

The Englishmen after the taking and spoiling of Dunkirke, returned to Grauelin and Bruckburge, which places they fortified, and then leauing garrisons in them, they went to Hardike, and toke it, for it was not closed. In the meane time, the countie-men of west Flanders rose in armour, and came to Dunkirke, meaning to resist the Englishmen: whereof when the bishop was certified, with all speed he marched thither, and comming to the place where the Flemings, to the number of moze than twelue thousand were ranged without the towne, he sent an herald vnto them to know the truth, of whether pope they held; but the rude people, not vnderstanding what appertained to the law of armes, ran vpon the herald at his approaching to them, and slue him before he could begin to tell his tale.

The Englishmen herewith inflamed, determined either to reuenge the death of their herald, or to die for it, and therewith ordered their battels readie to fight, and being not aboue five thousand fighting men in all, the bishop placed himselfe amongst the horsemen, and set the footmen in a battell marshalled twogewise, broad behind and sharpe before, hauing with them a banner wherein the crosse was beater. The archers were ranged on either side: the standard of the church went before, the field gules, and two heies silver, signifieng that they were souldiours of pope Urbane. Moreover, the bishop had his pennon there silver and azure quarterlie, a freat gold on the azure, a bend gules on the silver: and because he was youngest of the Spencers, he bare a border gules for a difference. At the approaching of the battels togither the trumpets blew vp, and the archers began to shot against the battell of the Flemings, the which valiantlie defended themselves, & fought egerlie a long time, but at length they were so galled with arrowes which the archers shot at them a flanke, that they were not able to indure, but were compelled to giue backe.

They were diuided into two battels, a batward, and a reuerward. When the batward began to thynke, the reuerward also bake order, and fled, but the Englishmen pursued them so fast, that they could not escape, but were overtaken and slaine in great numbers. Some saie, there died of them in the battell and chase five thousand, some six thousand; and others write, that there were nine thousand of them slaine: and Thomas Walsingham affirmeth twelue thousand. Some of them fled into the towne of Dunkirke for succour, but the Englishmen pursued them so egerlie, that they entered the towne with them, and slue them downe in the streets. The Flemings in diuerse places gathered themselves togither againe as they fled, and shewed countenance of defence, but still they were driuen out of order, and brought to confusion. The priests and religious men that were with the bishop fought most egerlie, some one of them slaying fiftene of the enimies.

There died of Englishmen at this battell about foure hundred. The Flemings had no horsemen amongst them, nor anie number of gentlemen, for they stood in such dread of English bowes, that they durst not come to anie battell with them, but keeping themselves out of danger, let the commons of the countie in hand to trie what they against the Englishmen were able to do without them. This battell was fought vpon a mondaie being the sixteenth of Maie. The countie was put in a wonderfull feare by this overthrow, so that the townes and castles were in great doubt, and some yielded themselves to the Englishmen, as Berghen and others; some were wone by force, as the castell of Dinchan, and the towne of St. Venant. To be short, the Englishmen became maisters of all the countie alongst the sea side, euen from Grauelin to Sluis, and got such riches by pillage and spoile, as they could not wish for greater. They preuailed so much, that they wan in manner all the close townes within the bailiue-wakes of Castell, of Popering, Pessines, and Furneis, with the townes of Helwport, Blankberke, and diuerse other.

Also entring into the woods Pepsle and Kutholt, they found a great botie of shepe and beasts, and toke a great sort of prisoners of the countie people, which were fled into those woods for feare of the enimies: but the Englishmen, plaieng the part of good bloudhounds, found them out, & sent all their boties and preie vnto Grauelin and Bruckburge. On the eight daie of Iune they came before the towne of Ppres, and laid siege thereto, whereat they continued the space of nine wakes. Thither came to their aid twentie thousand Gauntiners under the leading of Francis Akreman, Peter Wood, and Peter Winter: so that they within Ppres were streiallie beseged, but there were within it in garrison diuerse valiant knights & capteins, which defended the towne right manfullie: it was fenced with a mightie rampire, and a thicke hedge, trimlie plashed and wond with thornes, as the manner of fortifieng townes was in ancient time amongst them in that countie (as Strabo witnesseth.)

During the time that the siege laie before Ppres, the Englishmen swarmed abroad in the countie, for when it was once knowne that god successe the first companie that went ouer had found, there came daile forth of England great numbers to be partakers of the gaine. Sir John Philpot that fauoured the bishops iourne, prouided them of vessels for their passage, till the bishop vnderstanding that the moze part of those that came thus ouer were vnarmed, and brought nothing with them from home, but onelie swords, bowes and arrowes, did write vnto the said sir John Philpot, that he should suffer none to passe the seas, but such as were men able and likelie to do seruice: where a great number of those that were come to him, were sit for nothing but to consume vittels, much like the popish shanelings and the Romish rascalitie, of whome the like is spoken thus:

Nos numerus sumus & fuges consumere nati.

The multitude of Englishmen and Gauntiners at this siege was great, so that diuerse skirmitches chanced betwixt them, and such as were appointed by the earle to lie in garrisons about in the countie against them: but still the victorie abode on the English side. Also there was an English priest, one sir John Bozing that went to Gaunt with five hundred English archers, by whose aid Arriold Hans one of the capteins of Gaunt overcame his enimies in battell, which were laid in a castell nere to the haue of Allost, and stopped that no vittels might safelie come out of Holland or Zeland to be conueied to Gaunt. The earle of Flanders was not well contented in his mind, that the Englishmen were thus entred into his countie, and therefore earnestlie laboured to the duke of Burgognie (that had married his daughter, and should be heire of all his dominions and seignories after his decesse) to find some remedie in the matter.

The duke, whome the matter touched so nere, did so much with his nephew the French king, that at last he raised his whole puissance, and came downe into Flanders, so that the Englishmen perceiuing themselves not of power to incounter with this huge and mightie armie, were constrained after a great assault, fault, which they gaue the eight of August, to raise their siege from Pyper the mondaie after, being S. Laurence daie, and to withdrawe into Bruckburke, Wergben, Dirincto, Newpozt, Cassell, Dunkirke, Grauelin, and other places which they had toon. But at Newpozt the towncsmen set vp the earles banner, and assailing those that were come into the towne, slue diuerse of them. The Englishmen being soze offended therewith, came running thither with certelne Gauntiners, and made great slaughter of them that had so murdered their fellows. The towne was sacked, and all the goods aswell church iewels as other were sent awaie, partlie by sea into England, and partlie by waggonns into Berge. After this, they set fire in more than thirtie places of the towne, so that there remained nothing unburnt. The Englishmen & Gauntiners that were withdrabone into Berge, got together all the waggonns in the countrie about, placing the same vpon the ditches and rampiers, to scuffle the same against their enmies.

Some write, that after the breaking of the siege at Poyes, the bishop of Norwich would gladly haue perswaded the lords and knights that were there with him, to haue entred into Picardie, and there to haue offered the French king battell, befoze his whole puissance had bene assembled: but sir Thomas Truuet and sir William Elmham with other, would in no wise consent thereto, so that the bishop taking with him sir Hugh Caluerlie, that did neuer forsake him, bad the other farewell, and first making a road into Picardie, he after withdrew into Grauelin, whyles the other went to Buckburge. But by Froissard, and other writers it appeareth, that sir Hugh was certeinlie at Berge, with other that were retired thither, in purpose to defend it against the French king, who still followed them, and recovered diuers places out of their hands by force, as Mont Cassell, the cassell of Crinham, and other. Also at his coming to Berghen, the said sir Hugh Caluerlie, and other that were within it, perceiuing that they were not able to defend it against such a puissance as the French king had there with him, being greater than euer sir Hugh Caluerlie that ancient capteine would haue thought that France had bene able to haue set forth, departed, and left the towne to be spoiled of the Britons, and other French souldiers, which executed there all kinds of crueltie. The more part of the Englishmen went to Buckburge, but sir Hugh Caluerlie went to Grauelin, and so to Calis, as one forse displeased in his mind, so: that his counsell could not be regarded in all this voyage, which if it had bene followed, would haue brought it to a better issue than now it was, as was supposed.

The French king following the tract of good fortune, that guided his ſterne, marched forth to Burck-burge, ſo that the batward of his armie came before that towne on Holie roob daie in September, vnder the leading of the earle of Flanders, the duke of Britaine, the lord Oliuer de Clifton high conſtable of France, and the lord Valeran earle of St. Paule, the which demeaned themſelues in ſuch fort, that although the Engliſhmen within valiantlie defended the Frenchmens aſſault; yet the third daie after the Frenchmens coming thither, the Engliſhmen by composition that they might depart with bag and bagage, yielded by the towne, which on the nineteenth of September being ſaturdaie, as that yeare came about, was abandoned to the French ſoldiers, to riſe and ſpoile at their pleaſure, in the which ſea the Britons bare the bell awaie, doing more miſchefe vnto the poore inhabitants, than with tong can be recited. The duke of Britaine holpe greatlie to make the composition, that the Engliſhmen might depart in ſafetie: for the which doing he was in great hatred and obloquie of the scouldiers, who affirmed that he was not orrelie a friend to the Englishmen, but an ennemie to his countrie, and a traitour to the common-wealth.

The Englishmen comming to Crauelin, set it on fire, and departed streight to Calis, leaving the countrie of Flanders to the Frenchmen, and so returned into England, where they were not greatlie commended for their service, but were put so farre in blame, that sir Thomas Triuet, & sir William Elmham were committed to prison within the tower of London, as men suspected of euill dealing in the deliuerie of Bruckburge and Crauelin to the Frenchmens hands: for Immediatlie after that they had left Crauelin, the Frenchmen came thither, and fortified it for a countergarison to Calis. ¶ There be that write how the French king offered to giue the bishop of Norwich fiftene thousand marks to raze the towne of Crauelin, and so to leaue it vnto him, the bishop hauing libertie with all his people and goods to depart in safetie. The bishop required to haue libertie for certeine daies, to make herevnto a full and deliberate answer : which was granted, and in the meane time he sent into England to aduertise the king in what state he stood, and how the French king late before him with a mightie armie : and therefore if he meant euer to trie battell with the Frenchmen, now was the time.

In the same summer, the king with the queene went abroad in p[ro]gresse, visiting in their waie the rich abbots of the realme, as Burie, Betsford, Po[r]twich, & other; going about a great part of the realme. And when these newes came to him from the bishop of Po[r]twich, he was at Daunterie in Po[r]thampton-shire, and being the same time at supper, he put the tale from him, and rising with all hast, got him to horse backe, and rode in post that night, changing horse diuers times, with such speed that he came to S. Albons about midnight, and making no staie there longer than he had borrowed the abbats gelding, hastied forth till he came to Westminster: so that it appeared he would neuer haue rested till he had passed the sea, and giuen battell to the Frenchmen. But after his comming to Westminster, wearied with that hastie iourne, he got him to bed, and liked so well of ease, that he thought good to send a lieutenant in his stead to passe the seas, to deliuer the bishop from danger of his enemies.

Herebyon was the duke of Lancaster sent for, that he might with such powder as was readie to passe the seas, go ouer with the same, and giue battell to the French king: but he protracted time, till the respect granted to the bishop to make answer was expired, and so the bishop when he saw no succour come forth of England, raced the towne as the covenant was: but monie he would not or did not receiue, because he thought in so doing he should offend the councill. At his comming backe into England, he found the duke of Lancaster at the sea side with a great powder of men readie to haue come ouer: although some thought that he deferred time of purpose, for that he misliked of the bishops whole enterpryse; and now because it had thus quailed, he blamed the bishop for his euill gouernement therein: but sir Hugh Caluerlie he retained with him a time, doing him all honour, by reason of the old approued valencie, that had bene euer found in him. And this was the end of the bishop of Norwich his iourneie.

The Scots in the meane while sate not still, but made roades into England, toke and burnt the castell of Wulster. Whereouer, whilst the siege laie before Wyres, the Frenchmen armed certeine vessels, and sent them to the sea, namelie five balengiers, as well to intercept such as should passe betwixt England land and Flanders, as also to stop such as were appointed to go over into Gascoigne, that were soldiers also of the croisse, appointed thither under the leading of the lord Bitrigale de la Bret, and certeine others. When they of Portsmouth understood that these five ships were abroad, they made forth to the sea, and meeting with their aduersaries, fought with them a sore & cruell battell, and in the end slue all the enimies, nine excepted, and took all their vessels. An other fleet of Englishmen took eight French ships, which had aboard 1500 tunns of good wines, that comforted the Englishmen greatly.

About the feast of All saints was a parlement holden at London, in which was granted to the king one moiety of a fifteenth by the laitie, and thortie after a moiety of a tenth by the cleargie. Moreover, the king took into his hands the temporalities that belonged to the bishop of Norwich, because he obeyed not the kings commandment when he was sent for at the time when he took the seas to passe into Flanders. The knights also that had not shewed such obedience to the bishop as was requist in that sortie, were committed to prison; but thortie after they were set at libertie upon suerties that undertoke for them. ¶ It was also decreed in this parlement, that the erle of Buckingham the kings uncle should go to the borders against Scotland, with a thousand lances, and two thousand archers, to represse the presumptuous attempts of the Scots; who aduertised thereof, sent ambassadors to treat of peace; but they were dispatched home againe, without obtaining that which they came to sue for.

At the motion and instance of the duke of Bri-taine, immediatly upon the returne of the English armie out of Flanders, there was a meeting of cer-teine commissioners in the marches of Calis, at a place called Elleghehen, for the treatie of a peace to be concluded betwixt the two realmes of England and France. There appeared for king Richard, the duke of Lancaster, and his brother the erle of Buckingham, sir John Holland brother to the king, sir Thomas Percie, and a bishop. For the French king, thither came the dukes of Berrie and Burgognie, the bishop of Leon, and the chancelor of France. There were also the duke of Britaine, and the erle of Flanders.
Also there came a bishop with other commissioners from the king of Spaine: for the Frenchmen would do nothing, except the king of Spaine might be also compised in the treatie and conclusion. They were there twelke in communing of an agreement: but when nothing else could be brought to passe, they concluded a truce to indure till the feast of S. Michaell, which should be in the yeare 1384.

The erle of Flanders was indged most in blame, for that no peace could be accorded, because he would not that the Gauntiners should be compised therin, but the Englishmen would not agree either to truce or peace, except regard might be had of the Gaunt-iners, as their friends and allies. The kings of Spaine and Scotland were compised in this truce as conde-derats to the Frenchmen, which should have signified the same into Scotland, but did not till great harme followed through negligence bled in that matter, as after ye shall perceive. ¶ The same yeare in the night of the feast of the Purification of our lady, great lightnings and thunders shaked, with perill in no small feare, so huge and hideous was that tempest. Thortie after, there rose so small add in the cite of London about the election of the mayor: for such as favoured the late mayo John de Borthampton, other wise called John de Cornber-ton, stood against sir Nicholas Brounkes knight: that was chosen to succeed the said John de Borthamp-ton, inasmuch that a thomaker who was one of the same John de Borthampsons partakers, presumed through a number of voices that were ready to favour him, to take upon him as mayo: but through the counsell of sir Robert Anolles knight, he was suddenlie apprehended, bealoned, and beheaded, as a rebell and troubler of the kings peace.

In the Lent season, the duke of Lancaster with his brother the erle of Buckingham went towards the borders, having with him a mightie power of knights, esquieres, and archers, and after he had remained a certeine time upon the borders, about Caster he entered Scotland, and coming within thre miles of Edinburgh, he staid there thre daies, in which meane time the Scots conveyed all their goods out of the towne over the water of Firth: so that when the armie came thither, they found nothing but bare walles, which grieved the soldiers not a little.
The Scots would not come forth to give any battell to the Englishmen, but got them into woods and mounteines, or else passed over the river of Firth, suffering the Englishmen to fight with the behe-ment cold weather that then sore annoied those parts, in so much that on Easter daie at night, through snow that fell, and such extreme cold and boisterous stormes as sore afflicted the armie, being incamped within the compasse of a marish ground for their more suertie, there died above five hundred horses, to let passe the losse of men that perished at the same time, of whom we make no mention. To conclude, after the duke and his brother the erle had remained a time thus in Scotland, and burned certeine townes, they returned into England.

About the same time, to wit, in the quindene of Easter, a parlement of the nobles was holden at Salisbury, during the which an Irish frier of the order of the Carmelits, being a bachelor in divinitie, exhibited to the king a bill against the duke of Lancaster, charging him with heinous treasons: as that he meant upon a sudden to destroye the king, and to usurpe the crowne, shewing the time, the place, and circumstances of the whole contrived matter.
The king being young both in yeares and discretion, when he had heard the friers information, called too of his chapleins unto him, one sir Nicholas Slake, and an other, and asked their advise what they thought good to be done in such a weightie cause. ¶ How as they were busie in talke about the same, the duke of Lancaster came into the kings chamber asked his wonted manner, not understanding any thing of the matter wherof they were in talke. The king with a fterne countenance beheld the duke, not giving him the honoz that he was accustomed. The duke suspecting that the king had smitethat in his head that touched his person, withdrew. In the morning thortie twa that were thus in counsell with the king, fearing happlie the dukes power, rose up upon god, with their bare towars him, persuaded the king that in any wise he should call him to see and know what was laid to his charge.

The duke after he had read the bill of his treason on made such answer, and so excoised himselfe in be-claring his innocence, that the king gave oved to his words, and received his excuse. There with the duke besought the king, that the frier might be kept in safe gaw: till the time came that he might purge himselfe of that he had charged him with, and that lord John Holland the kings halfe brother might have the custodie of him till the day appointed that the duke should come to his full trial. The next morrow which day, the said lord Holland, and the worthy Greene knight, came to this frier, and putting a cord about his necke, tied the other end about his hand, inasmuch that after hanging him by from the chancel, laid a stone upon his belly, with the weight wherwith desired themselves better: for entering into the river of Swaine, they drowned foure of their enemies ships, and took other foure, with a barke of the lord Cliftons, one of the fairest that was to be found either in France or England. In these vessels the Englishmen had a rich pyrie of wines, and other merchandises. ¶ The king upon some occasion took great displeasure against William Courtnie archbishop of Canturburie, so storming against him, as few durst speake anie thing in his excuse. The lord chancellor Michaell de la Pole seeming to fauour his cause, was likewise to haue run in high displeasure. Sir Thomas Arriuet, and sir John Deuereux intreating for him, were sore rebuked at his hands. Yet at length, after that the archbishop was withdrawne, and had kept him close for a time, he was thorough mediation of some friends reconciled to the kings fauour.

About the same time the French king sent into Scotland the admerall of France, with a thousand men of armes, knights, and esquires, besides crossbowes and other to iouine with the Scots, and to make warres in England. The Scots encouraged with this new aid, sent to them out of France, leuied a power, & so together with the Frenchmen, entered into the English confines, and began to rob & spoile, and further took certeine castles and houses of defence. The king of England aduertised hereof, assembled an huge power of men of warre, and first sent before him the duke of Lancaster with part of the armie, and afterward followed him selfe, with all conuenient speed that might be. At his comming into the parts about York, he was informed that the Scots and Frenchmen were withdrawne vpon the duke of Lancasters approach towards them, but the king thought to keepe on his iournie. Whilest he was lodged in those parts, a great mischance happened, by reason of variance that fell betwixt certeine persons of the retinue of sir John Holland brother vnto the earle of Kent and halfe brother to the king, and other of the retinue of the lord Richard Stafford sonne to the earle of Stafford.

The cause of their falling out was about a knight of Boheme, called sir Miles, that was come to see the queene. This knight kept companie most an end with the lord Richard Stafford: and chancing to be at words with two of sir John Hollands seruants, there came two archers pertaining to the lord Stafford, which blamed them, that were so about to misuse the stranger in words, as they tolke it: the strife here by grew to that point in the end, that one of the archers shot at one of sir John Hollands seruants, and slue him. This mishap being reported to sir John Holland, set him in such a furie (by reason of the loue which he had to his seruant) that immediately he rushed forth of his lodging, to reuenge his death, and through misfortune meeting with the lord Stafford, slue him, and doubting in what sort his deed might be taken, fled straight vnto Wenerlie, and there took sanctuary. The erle of Stafford took this misadventure right heauilie, as reason was: yet because he would not trouble the host, nor disappoint the iournie which they had in hand, vpon the kings promise that he would do by right iustice in the matter, as should be thought meet and conuenient, he bare his graefe so patientlie as he might, so that he wan himselfe much praise for his wisdom therein shewed.

The king aduancing forwards with his armie, came to the borders, and entring into Scotland, passed thorough Mers and Louthian, waisting and spoiling all the townes, houses and villages in his waite. The abbeyes of Melros, Wintonburgh, and Jethvottell were burnt, and those monks and other people that were found in the same were slaine. At his comming to Edenburgh, he found all the people fled out of the towne, but the houses and buildings he consumed with fire, together with the church of saint Giles. At the humble sute of his vnckle the duke of Lancaster, Holie rood house was preserved from hurt, for that the same duke in time of the rebellion of the commons here in England, was lodged in that house, and found much gentleness and friendship in the abbat and conuent; so that he could do no lesse than requite them with kindnesse, at whose hands he found kindnesse; for we are bound in conscience to tender them by whom we haue bene benefited (vnlesse we will be counted vnciuill, according to the old adage)

Arbor honoratur cuius nos umbra tuetur.

Thus when the king had reuenged the displeasure afore receiued at the Scots and Frenchmens hands, (and remained in Edenburgh five daies) he returned without proffer of battell, or anie notable encounter. The admerall of France was earnestlie in hand with the Scottish lords to persuaide them to haue giuen battell to the English armie, till he and diuers other knights of France were brought to the top of a mountaine, from whence they might behold all the English armie, as the same passed vnderneath them by a passage that laie by the foot of that mountaine: for after that they had viewed the puissance of the Englishmen, and (as nere as they could) numbered them, they had no such eger minds to fight with them as before, for they esteemed them to be six thousand men of armes, and threescore thousand archers, and other men of warre; where the Scots and Frenchmen were not past a thousand speares, and thirtie thousand of all other sorts, and the most part of those but euill armed. Therefore they determined vpon an other point, which was, to invade England in an other quarter, whilest the Englishmen burnt by their countrie, and so they set forward towards the west borders, and passing ouer the mountaine that diuide Northumberland from Scotland, they entered into Cumberland, doing much hurt in the lands that belonged to the lord Poitimaie, to the earles of Northumberland, and Stafford, to the baron of Grailliocke, and to the Pulgranes.

Lastlie, they came to Carlisle, and boldlie assaulted the citie: but sir Lewis Clifford, and sir Thomas Pulgrane, Dauid Holgrane, and diuers other worthie captaine being within it, so defended the walles and gates, that their enemies got small aduantage: and finally hearing that the English armie was returning homewards, the Scots and Frenchmen drew backe into Scotland, doubting to be inclosed by the Englishmen, as they had bene in deed, if the duke of Lancaster and his brethren (vnckles to the king) might haue bene beleued, who counselled the king to pursue the enemies, and stop the passages through which they must needs passe in their comming backe. But the earle of Wrenford being most in fauour and credit with the king in those daies, as one that ruled all things at his pleasure, did aduise him to the contrarie, by putting him in beleafe (as was said) that his vnckles went about to bring him in danger to be lost and surprised of his enemies, where vpon he took the next way home, and so brake by his iournie.

When the Scots and Frenchmen were returned into Scotland, the Scottish king hauing conceiued a iust displeasure towards the French admerall, for that by his meanes the realme of Scotland had sustained such damage in that season, caused him and his frenchmen to be despoiled of the most part of their goods, and sent them to a waite out of his countrie, that the Scots might receiue some comfort by using those warres. In this yeare was the battell of Algebrota in Poytingale, where king John of Poytingale gale discomfited a great host of Spaniards and Frenchmen by the helpe and policie of certeine Englishmen which he had there with him, vnder the leading of two esquiers Forberie and Hartell. There were slaine diuers earles & great lordes of Spaniards, but for that our writers do not rightlie note the Spanish names, but write them corruptlie as strangers vse to do, we here omit them. The king of Portingale (after this victorie obtained against his enemies) sent six gallies vnto the king of England to aid him against his aduersaries, the which were well received and highlye made of by the Londoners and other, so that the Portingales had no cause to repent of their comming thither.

The French king this yeare besieged and won the towne of Dam, after he had bene at great charges about it. Whilste his nanie returned from Secluis, where the same had laien at anchor a long time, the ships by tempest were scattered & wether-biuen, so that in the feast daie of the exaltation of the crosse, two of their gallies, a great ship, a barge, and seauen balengers were cast on shore about Calis, & the Calisians toke five hundred Frenchmen and Portugals that escaped to land. An other day 72 French ships (as they were comming from Secluis, to passe by Calis, were met with by them of Calis, who behaued themselves so manfullie, that they toke 18 of those French ships, and a great barke, in which thre score armed men were slaine before it could be taken. Within thre daies after this, the Calisians met 45 other French ships, and after six houres fight obtained the victorie, taking thre of the most principall vessels, whereof one being a hulke of Castile was hired by the Portugals, to gard the residue. The other two that were taken were of such mold, that they could not enter into the haven at Calis, and therefore were sent to Sanduwich, the one of them being a new ship, which the lord Clifton had bought at Secluis, paying for hir 30000 franks. Henric Knighton saith it was pised or valued at 20000 florens, it was so tall, big, and large a vessel; and therefore of great capacitie.

On saint Denise daie the soldiors of Calis and other English fortresses thereabouts, made a secret iourne into France, and got a botie of foure thousand sheepe, and thre hundred head of great cattell, which they droue towards their holds; and as the lord de Hambures gouernour of Bullongne would haue recovered the preie, he was unhorsed with the encounter of an English speare, and being relieved by his companie, and mounted againe, withdrew himselfe, not attempting to trie any further masteries, and so the Englishmen safelie passed forth with their botie of cattell, and about a hundred good prisoners which they had taken at this rode. In this yeare about the feast of S. Martine, the king called his high court of parlement at Westmister, in the which amongst other things there concluded, he created two dukes, a marques, and five earles. First Edmund Langlie earle of Cambridge the kings uncle was created duke of York, Thomas of Woodstoke his other uncle earle of Buckingham was created duke of Glocester, Robert Here earle of Arford was made marques of Deuelin, Henric of Bollingbroke sonne and heire to John of Gaunt duke of Lancaster was created earle of Derby: Edward Plantagenet sonne and heire to the Duke of York was made earle of Rutland, Michaell lord de la Pole chancelor of England was created earle of Suffolke, & sir Thomas Spontmure earle of Nottingham was made earle marshall.

Also by authoritie of this parlement, Roger lord Spotmure earle of March, sonne and heire of Edmund Spotmure earle of March, and of the ladie Philip eldest daughter and heire vnto Lionel duke of Clarence, third sonne to king Edward the third, was established heire apparant to the crowne of this realme, and shortlye after so proclaimed. The which earle of March, anon after the end of the same parlement, sailed into Ireland to his lordship of Ulster, whereof he was owner by right of his said mother: but whilste he remained there to pacifie the rebellions of the wild Irish, a great number of them together assembled, came vpon him and slue him, together with the most part of his companie. This Roger earle of March had issue Edmund, Roger, Anne, Ales, & Eleanor, which Eleanor was made a nunne. The two sonnes died without issue, and Anne the eldest of the daughters was married to Richard earle of Cambridge, sonne vnto Edmund of Langlie before remembred: the which Richard had issue by the said Anne, a son called Richard, that was after duke of York, and father to king Edward the fourth, also a daughter named Isabell, afterwards married to the lord Bourcher. This Richard earle of Cambridge was put to death by Henric the first, as after ye shall heare.

Whereouer, in this yeare Henric of Bollingbroke earle of Derby married the daughter and heire of Humfrie Bohun earle of Hereford, in whose right he was after made duke of Hereford, and by hir he had issue Henric that after him was king of this realme, the ladie Blanch duchesse of Bar, and the ladie Philipp married to the king of Denmarke: also Thomas duke of Clarence, John duke of Bedford, and Humfrie duke of Glocester. The Gauntiners still mainteined warre against the earle of Flanders during his life, and after his deceasse against Philip duke of Burgogne, by such aid and comfort as they had from time to time of the king of England, till finallye this yeare about the eighteenth daie of December, a peace was concluded betwixt the said duke and the towne of Gaunt: and sir John Bourchier that had laine a long season there, as capteine vnder the R. of England, and Peter de Bois one of the chiefe captains of the Gauntiners (before the concluding of this peace) were safelie conducted to Calis by vertue of the duke of Burgogne his safe conduct, and so they came ouer into England, and the king gaue vnto Peter de Bois a pension of an hundred marks sterling, yearelie to be paid to him out of the Staples of the woollens in London.

This yeare king Richard holding his Christmase at Eltham, thither came to him Leo king of Armenia, whose countrie and realme being in danger to be conquered of the Turks, he was come into those west parts of chistendome for aid and succour at the hands of the christian princes here. The king honorablie receiued him, and after he had taken counsell touching his request, he gaue him great sommes of monie and other rich gifts, with a stipend (as some write) of a thousand pounds yearely to be paid to him during his life. After he had remained here two moneths space, he toke leaue of the king and departed. The chiefe point of his errand was, to haue procured a peace betwixt the two kings of England and France, but deslinie would not permit so good a purpose to take effect: for the hatred which either nation bare to other, would not suffer their lostie minds to yeld in any one point, further than seemed good in their owne opinions.

In this ninth yeare of king Richard (though by other writers it should seeme to be rather in the yeare following) the duke of Lancaster with a great power of men of warre went into Spaine, and lead with him thither his wife the ladie Constance, & a daughter which he had by hir named Batharine, and two other daughters which he had by his former wife. had bene about the preparing of an armie, and all furniture necessarie for this iourne two or three yeres before, and therefore hauing now seauen galleies and eightene ships sent to him out of Portingale (which arriued at Wythow) he caused all such vessels as he had provided to resort likewise thither, where making his generall assemblee, when all his men of warre were come together, he bestowed them aboard, with all their horses and purueances, and causing sailes to be hoisted vp, set forward on his long wished iourne. This was in the moneth of Maie, when the seas were calme, the aire sweet, and the winds pleasant and agreeable to his purpose. He appointed for admerall of his whole fleet sir Thomas Percie; and sir John Holland that was after created earle of Huntington and had married one of his daughters was ordeined constable of the host; and sir Thomas Pozeaur hauing married his bastard daughter was one of his marshals.

There were that attended him in this iourne manie other lords and knights of honoz, as the lord Lucie, the lord Talbot, the lord Bassett, the lord Willoughbie, the lord Fitz Walter, the lord Poinsings, the lord Badston, the lord of Pomiers a Calcoigne, the lord Poinsie fitz Warren, Henric lord Beaumont, William lord Beauchampe, sir Richard Burlic that was another of the marshals of the armie, sir Hugh Spenser, sir William Windsoze, sir John Daubreticourt, sir Hugh Hastings, sir William Farrington, sir Thomas Tresham, sir Gauburin de Liniers, sir Thomas Worcester, sir John Solwtric, sir Robert Clinton, sir Philip Tirrell, sir Lewes Rochester, Inguelin Caluerlie, David Holgrau, Thomas Alerie, Hobequin Beaucher, and diuerse other: they were in all to the number of fiftene hundred men of armes, whereof a thousand at the least were knights and esquiers, besides foure thousand archers, and other men of warre, so perfectlie appointed and arraid, as could be thought meet and conuenient. Of this chosen companie attendant vpon the duke of Lancaster, & of this his voiage into Spaine, the said C. Okland speaketh no lesse trulie & according to the report of our annales, than honorablie:

Henric Knighton reporteth of this voiage as foloweth, in somewhat a differing sort from this alreadie laid downe. On Easter daie (saith he) John the duke of Lancaster with his wife came to the king, to take their leaue; to the which duke the king gaue a crowne of gold, and the queene likewise gaue another crowne of gold to the duchesse. Besides this, the king commanded his people that they should call him king of Spaine, and do him honour in all things. He had with him a power of 20000 chosen men; of which number noted in the marshals bill 2000 were men of armes, and 8000 were archers.

Whereupon he caused the said bassides to be assailed, which was done by the lord Fitz Walter, and others, who bare themselves so manfullie, that the bassides were wone, broken downe, and a great preie with prisoners obtained, although not without losse of diuerse valiant personages. Thus were they within Wyth castell deliuered of their unfrendlie neighbours by the duke of Lancaster and his people. Who hauing done their feat toke the seas, and sailed forth till they came on the coasts of Gallis, where on S. Laurence euen, they arriued in the haue of Grogne, otherwise called Cozon, and there they vnsipped all their prouisions, & terminating to invade the countrie on that side. ¶ Where, because it is not vnprofitable to know the absolute truth of things done, by the collection of writers, I haue translated the besieging of Wyth, as the same is set downe by Henric Knighton in his annales, in a larger and more ample sort, with a fuller certificat of circumstances than hath hitherto bene declared. At the same time (saith he) the duke of Britaine had laid siege both by sea and land, to a certeine towne in Britaine, in old time subiect to the king of England, which was called Wyth, with a great multitude of Frenchmen and Britains. Now on the twelfth of the kalends of Iulie, he began to build a fort before the said towne of Wyth, of a wonderfull bignesse, the walles thereof being ten foot thicke, and seauen towres about it. A thousand workemen did worke daie by daie vpon it, and to defend the said workemen (that they might not be hindered in their busynesse by the citizens) ten thousand fighting men were appointed. So that this fort was begun and ended in nineteene daies space, and called the Douche house, because a douch house stood in the same place before. Furthermore he stozed this fort with all necessaries, as vittels, armour, guns, and other engines, and he placed therein as capteine of the warriors the lord John Galetret with a hundred and fiftie armed men, and as manie other soldiors, the whole number being three hundred.

The good duke of Lancaster hauing knowledge hereof, directed his fleet or naue towards the haue of Wyth, where when he had arriued, they all fled from the siege, both by sea and land, those onlie, which were in the fort, remaining behind. Now the prior of S. James in Calis desired the good duke that he might giue the first assault against the fort; who taking the repulse with his retinue, he ceased and gaue ouer. In like sort did manie more giue the assault to the same fort the space of two daies and more: in so much that some digging vnder the wals, and undermining the foundations of one towre, the same fell downe vpon sir Robert Swinarton a valiant knight of Staffordshire, and manie more, among whom was John de Bolton a couragious gentleman and an esquire by degree of Dorsetshire. As for those that were vpon the towre, they also came tumbling downe, and were presentlie slaine.

In the meane time the lord Galetret gardian of the fort, sent word to the duke of Lancaster, that he would yeld and surrender the hold into his hands vpon condition, that he and all his might frelie depart with such armour, goods, chatels and vituals as they had repored and laid vp in stozes for their necessarie prouision: wherevnto the good duke (as he was alwaies good) verie gentlie agreed; vpon condition also, that before their departure, they should ruinate the said fort, and laie it euen with the ground; and should likewise allow and paie him towards his costs and charges defraied in the siege of the same, twentie thousand scutes of gold. Then might you see the people flocking from all parts of the countrie, some with beires, some with cabbins, some with carts, and some with crutches to fetch alwaie the dead and the wounded: in so much that there was not one, either slaine outright, or deadlie maimed, for whom his frends did not moene and lament. ¶ And the lord Galetret himselfe was so mangled and hurt, that he could not go on his legs, but as he leaned on mens shoulders, and was borne vp on either side. It was reported, that manie dead bodies were hidden in heaps of salt, to the end that the Englishmen should not glorie and triumph in the multitude of the slaine, of whom [in sight] the number amounted to aboue

150. Thus farre goeth Henrie Knighton, whose report giueth no small light to the matter vnder hand. After the duke had remained a moneth at Croigne, he went to Compostella, and there sojourned for a season, during the which, his constable sir John Holland wone diuerse towncs and fortresses which the enemies kept: diuerse poynted to the duke with better will, for that the duchesse his wife was there with him, whom they knew to be right inheritor to the realme. ¶ At Moulson a towne on the confines betwixt Spaine and Portingale, the king of Portingale and the duke of Lancaster met, where they communed and toke counsell together for the more speedie proceeding in their enterprisse against their aduersaries of Castile. Also there was a mariage concluded betwixt the said king of Portingale, and the ladie Philip daughter to the said duke, which marriage shortly after was wholie consummated, the said ladie being first married by procurator at Compostella, and after sent into Portingale right honorable accompanied.

Philip the duke of Lancaster's daughter married to the king of Portingale.

The king of Portingale & the duke of Lancaster coming together at Moulson together with the duke of Castile.

Clarence amongst writers.

Great death in the English host in Spaine by reason of the great heat of that countree.

The duke continued at Compostella all the winter season, till towards March, and then (according to appointment taken betwixt him, and the king of Portingale, at their being together at Moulson, for their iourne to be made into Castile) the said king assembled an armie of a thousand men of armes, and ten thousand other souldiers, with the which entering the confines of Castile, he first toke the towne of Ferroule, and after joining with the duke, who had in the meane while by his marshall taken the townes of Ruelles, Vile Lopez, Pouncevoide, Dighos, Balonne in la Aparoll, Ribadan, Spaures, Belantes, and Drens, with others in the countree of Gallis, they marched forth with their whole powers both together, and passing ouer the river of Dure, entered into the countree de Campo.

¶ Here the English writers make mention of a battell, which the constable of Castile should giue to the duke, and that the victorie remained on the dukes side, and the Spaniards chased out of the field. ¶ But Froissard (who liued in those daies, and learned that which he wrote of those that were with the duke in his iourne) maketh no remembrance of any such thing, but that contrarie to the king of Castile following the aduise of such Frenchmen as were sent into Spaine to aid him, caused all the riches of the countree to be brought into the walled townes and fortresses, which he stuffed with men of warre, to defend them from the Englishmen and Portingales; and further to cut off their bitels, and to keepe them from hauing forage abroad in the countree, vntill such as were sent were garded with the greater troops for their furtie and defence.

Thus bestowing the most part of all such men of warre, both Frenchmen and Spaniards, as he could make in places most conuenient for that purpose, he fullie determined not to giue battell till his enemies had wearied themselves in keeping of the fields, and that a new power was come to his aid out of France, which he daily looked for. By which means it came to passe, that the Englishmen not used to such hot aire as they found in those parts in that season of the yeare (for it was about middsummer) fell daily into manie perillous diseases, whereof no small number died; and other became so faint, that they were not able to helpe themselves, that to consider the miserie in which they were, it would haue rued the hearts of their better foes. Whereupon was the duke constrained to fall to a communication for a peace, which in the end was accorded, though not at this instant.

Howbeit a truce was granted, in such wise as it might be at the Englishmens choise to returne into their countree, either by sea or by land, thorough

France, such as passed through Spaine to France, had safe conduits sealed and signed by the king of Spaine; but scarce the halfe of those that came out of England with the duke, returned thither againe, they died so fast, as well after the breaking vp of their campe, as before. Amongst other, there died before the breaking vp of the campe, one of the greatest barons of all the companie, named the lord Fitz Walter; and afterwards within the towne of Wille Arpent, there died (as Froissard saith) three great barons of England, and men of great possessions: sir Richard Burle a knight of the garter, who had bene as it were high marshall of the armie, the lord Poynings, and sir Henrie Berce couline germane to the earle of Northumberland.

In the towne of Poie deceased sir Hanburin de Liniers a Poitouin, and in the towne of Ruelles died the lord Talbot, and so here and there (saith Froissard) there died in all twelue great lords, foure score knights, two hundred esquiers, and of the meaner sort of souldiers aboute fise hundred. After that the armie was broken vp, the duke of Lancaster and the duchesse his wife went into Portingale, and there remained a season, and then taking the sea, sailed to Balonne in the marshes of Gascoigne, where he rested a long time after. ¶ In this meane while, there was communication and offers made for a mariage to be had betwixt the duke of Berrie, vncle to the French king; and the ladie Katharine daughter to the duke of Lancaster, and of the duchesse his wife the ladie Constance.

¶ When the king of Spaine vnderstood of that treatie, he began to doubt, least if that mariage toke place, it might turne to his disauantage; and therefore to be at quietnesse with the duke of Lancaster, whose puissance he doubted, and whose wisdom he perfectly vnderstood, by politike meanes and earnest sute, at length concluded a peace with him on this wise; That his eldest son Henrie should haue in marriage the ladie Katharine daughter to the duke of Lancaster, begot on his wife the duchesse Constance, and be intituled prince of Aulurgus. In consideration of which mariage to be had, and all claimes to cease, which the duke in right of his wife might challenge or pretend; it was agreed, that the said duke should receiue yearly the summe of ten thousand marks, to be paid to him, or to his assignes in the citie of Balonne in Gascoigne, during the terme of the liues of the said duke and duchesse; and further to haue in hand the summe of two hundred thousand nobles. ¶ Henrie Knighton in his relation of this composition betwene these persons of great estate, doth say, that it was told him by one of the good duke of Lancasters owne household, and attendant vpon him in this voiage into Spaine, that the Spanissh king did send seven and fourtie mules laden with coffers full of gold for the second payment whereupon they were agreed. As touching the first payment (saith Knighton) I asked no question of the partie. So that (besides the annuities, which mine author reporteth to be 16000 marks, during the parties liues iointlie, and 12000 marks, if it fortuned that the dukes daughter should suruiue and outliue hir husband) it should seeme there were other large allowaunces, which if they were (as it is likelie) after this rate, it was a right roiall munificence. And to this report of Knighton doth Ch. Okland make a kind of allusion, who speaking of the conditions of peace betwene the duke of Lancaster, and the king of Spaine, saith;

Causa diffidens exemplo Hispanis agelut De pace, acceptis conditionibus, offert Argenti ac auri plastrorum protinus octo Iustum onus, argenti que decem soluenda quotannis Milia nummorum, &c.

Froissard, The lord Fitz Walter.

I thinke that none of these were barons but only the lord Poynings.

The duke of Lancaster returned out of Portingale into Gascoigne.

A marriage concluded betwene the prince of Spaine, and the duke of Lancasters daughter.

The proouision of Englishmen to resist the power of Frenchmen.

Ab. Fl. ent. Henrie Knighton canon of Leicester abbey.

The aforesaid agreement and marriage was not concluded, till about the thirtieth yeare of king Edwards reigne, so that in the meane while manie incidents chanced in England and in other regions, which in their time and places shall be touched, as to purpose serveth.

And first it is not to be forgotten, that the French men never shewed more vanitie than they did this yeare, since the linage of the Capetes began first to rule in France. All the ships that they could provide from the confines of Spaine, unto the mouth of the Rhene, all alongst the coast, they assembled at Sluis and thereabouts, and made so great preparation for the warre, that the like had not bene heard of (meaning, as they boasted, and made their vanta) to passe over into England, and to denoure the whole countrie, in doing sacrifice to the soules of their elders with the blond of the English people. Howbeit these words were wind, & to them accorded the proverbe, Portumunt montes, nascetur ridiculus mus.

There were numbred in the moneth of September about Sluis, Dam, and Blankberke 1287 ships, besides those which were rigged in Britaine by the constable, who had caused an inclosure of a field to be made of timber, like ralles or barriers, that when they were landed in England, they might there, with inclose their field, and so lodge more at suertie, and when they remoued, it was so made with ioints, that they might take it by in peces and easilie conueie it with them.

This inclosure or wall of wood was twentie fot in heigh, and contained in length or in compasse, when it was set by, thre thousand pases, and at the end of euerie twelue pases stood a turret able to receiue ten men, that was higher than the rest of the wall by ten fot at the least. There were appointed to haue passed ouer in those ships twentie thousand men of armes, twentie thousand crossbowes, and twentie thousand other men of warre. To haue saue the great apparell, furniture and prouision, the shipping, trussing, bearing, and carrieng to and fro of things needfull for this iourne, a man might haue merueled, for suerlie the like hath seldome bene remembered. All that was done there on that side the sea by the frenchmen, was notified into England, so that the frenchmen were not more occupied to prepare themselves to inuade England, than the Englishmen were to make themselves readie to defend their countrie from all danger of enemies; so that euerie haven towne, especiallie alongst the west, south, and eastcoasts, were kept and warded with notable numbers of armed men and archers.

Notwithstanding the great confidence which the french king reposed in the fortification which he had imbarked, thinking thereby to haue wrought great wonders, to the discomfiture of the English: yet (contrarie to his expectation) it so fortuned, that about Michaelmas, the lord William Beauchampe capitaine of Calis took two ships; whereof one was laden with a peece of the said inclosure or wall of wood, and in the same ship was the maister carpenter of the inclosure, being an Englishman borne, but banished his countrie before that time for some offence. He also took another ship, wherein were engines, guns, gunpowder & other instruments of war. Not long after this, two more ships were taken likewise, whose burthen was parcels of the foresaid frame or inclosure: so that thre ships were met withall and seized upon, each of them laden with one kind of stiffe. Whereof king Richard hearing, he caused the said inclosure to be reared and set by about Winchelsea towne. In the meane while, namelie in September, the foresaid armie came into Flanders, and arrived at the haven of Sluis, intending to make their progresse into England: but by prolonging of the time there, they were diuen to great distresse and want of vittels: for it was reported that a loafe of bread, sold in England for a penie, was sold there for eightene pence; and a hens eg for a penie: so that in the end of Nouember they returned to France, missing their purpose as much as if they had neuer ment it.

There were readie with in the realme at that season, in one part and other 100000 archers, and ten thousand men of armes, besides those that were gone into Spaine with the duke of Lancaster. All this preparation lasted for the more part of the summer, euen till the beginning of winter: and still the french king that was come downe into Flanders, staied for the coming of his vnicle the duke of Berry: who at length in the moneth of Nouember came to Sluis, hauing protracted time, of purpose, that he might by the excuse of winter, cause this iourne to be put off till another season. Wherein he shewed more wit than all the counsellors which the french king had about him: for if he had not politikelie shifted off the matter, the king had landed here in England, to the great danger of his person and losse of his people. And yet if we shall beleue writers that liued in those daies, by reason of the hate that was spread through the realme, of that huge preparation which the french king made to inuade this land, no small feare entered into the hearts of manie, namelie of the Londoners, who (as if the enemies had bene alreadie landed) bestirred them, in making what prouision they might for their defense, though it seemed by their manner of doings, they stood in doubt least the whole realme had not bene able to make sufficient resistance.

In deed diuerse were the more afraid, for that they perceived how the barons and great lords agreed not in manie points among themselves, and so being not of one mind, the wisser sort doubted least through their disagreeing in that troublesome time, some danger might grow to the state of the whole realme. Notwithstanding, no small number of others withed nothing more, than that the french king in going forward with his purpose, might haue come ouer, not doubting but that he should haue found such a welcome, as would haue bene little to his ease. About the feast of saint Michael, a parlement was called and holden at London, and withall great numbers of men of armes & archers were appointed to come and lie about London, that they might be readie to march forthwith against the enemies whensoever it chanced them to land. Thus all the townes and villages twentie miles in compasse round about London, were full of men of armes and archers, lieng as it had bene in campe; and wanting both vittels and monie, they were diuen to spoile and to take by violence what they might get. At length, after they had laine thus to small purpose a long season, they were licenced to depart home, with commandement to be readie to returne againe vpon the first summons. Spante of them were constrained through necessitie, to sell their horses, and armour, and some to spoile and to rob as they went homewards, not sparing what they might laie their hands vpon. Although the men of warre were dismissed home, the parlement yet continued, and the lords still remained at London, hearkening still for the french kings coming.

The lord Robert Waler earle of Wrenford, vpon the king in the last parlement had made marquisse of Dublin, was now in this parlement created duke of Ireland: the other lords soze enuieing so high preferment in a man that so little deserved, as they took it. which he bare not onelic to this noble man, but also to the lord Michaell de la Pole, ut om he had latelie created earle of Suffolke, and after aduanced him to the office of lord chancelloz (as before ye haue heard) not onelic the lords, but also the commons soze grudge at such their high preferment, in somuch that in this present parlement, the knights & burgeises in the lower house, exhibited a bill against the lord chancelloz, of diuerse crimes which they laid to his charge, and so used the matter, with the helpe of the lords, that in the end in some respect they had their willes against him, contrarie to the kings mind, as after may appere.

And where the king had demanded a reliefe of monie towards the maintenance of his estate, and charges of the warrres, it was answered, that he needed not any tallage of his subiects, sith he might furnish himselfe with such a summe at the hands of the said earle, that was iustlie indebted unto him therein, as they were able well to proue. But the king was nothing herewith contented, conceiuing no small displeasure, as well against them of the lower house, as against the lords in the vpper, for fauouring them in the lower, in matters that went so soze against his mind. Whereupon (as was said, whether trulie or othertwise, the lord knoweth) by a conspiracie begun betwixt the king & such as were most in fauour with him, it was deuised, that the duke of Glocester (as principall) and such other lords as fauored the knights and burgeises in their sute, against the earle of Suffolke, and were othertwise against the king in his demand of monie, should be willed to a supper in London, there to be murdered.

But the duke comming by some meanes to vnderstand of this wicked practise, had no desire to take part of that supper, where such sharpe sauce was presented, and withall gaue warning to the residue, that they likewise should not come there, but to content themselves with their owne suppers at their lodgings. It was said, that sir Nicholas Brember, who had bene maior the yeare before, had promised his assistance in the execution of this horrible fact: but thorough the commendable constancie of Richard Erton that was maior this yeare, being moued by the king for his furtherance therein, and denieng flatlie to consent to the death of such innocent persons, that hemons practise was omitted. This matter being brought to light, the hatred and malice which men bare to such councillors of the king greatlie increased, and the duke of Glocester and such as withstood the king, daile grew more and more into the peoples fauour.

Wherewith at length, through the earnest sute of some of the great lords, there was granted to the king halfe a tenth and halfe a sixteenth, which should not be spent at the pleasure of the prince, but by the order and appointment of the said lords, & so at length the earle of Arundell was appointed to receiue it, to furnish him with a nanie to the seas. But before this payment might be granted, there was much adoe, & hard hold: for where the said earle of Suffolke then lord chancelloz, at first had demanded of the commons in the kings name, foure sixteens, for with lesse (said he) the king could not mainteine his estate and the warrres which he had in hand) the whole bodie of the parlement made answer thereto, that without the king were present (for he was then at Eltham) they could make therein no answer at all: and herewith they took occasion at length to say further, that except the said earle of Suffolke were remoued from the office of chancellozship, they would meddle no further with any act in this parlement, were it neuer of so small importance.

the commons, that they should send vnto Eltham (where he laie) soztie of the wisest and best learned of the common house, the which in the name of the whole house should be clare vnto him their minds. And then the house was in no small feare, by reason of a brute that was raised, how the king sought meanes to intrap and destroye them that followed not his purpose. Whereupon aswell the lords of the vpper house as the commons of the lower assembled together, and agreed with one consent, that the duke of Glocester, and Thomas Arundell bishop of Elic, should in the name of the whole parlement be sent to the king vnto Eltham: which was done, and the king was well contented that they should come. When they came before his presence, with humble reuerence they declared their message, which consisted in these points: That the lords and commons assembled at that present in parlement, besought him of his lawfull fauour, that they might liue in peace and tranquillitie vnder him.

They further declared, that one old statute and laudable custome was approued, which no man could denie, that the king once in the yeare might lawfullie summon his high court of parlement, and call the lords and commons therevnto, as to the highest court of his realme, in which court all right and equitie ought to shine as the sunne being at the highest, whereof poore and rich may take refreshing: where also reformation ought to be had of all oppressions, wrongs, extortiones, & enormities within the realme; and there the king ought to take counsell with the wise men of his realme, for the maintenance of his estate, and conseruation of the same. And if it might be knowne that any persons within the realme without, intended the contrarie; there must also be deuised how such euill words may be destroyed. There must also be studied and foresene, that if any charge do come vpon the king and realme, how it may be honorable borne and discharged.

Further, they declared that till that present, his subiects (as was thought) had louinglie demeaned themselves towards him, in aiding him with their substance to the best of their powers, & that their desire was to vnderstand how those goods were spent. And further they said, they had one thing to declare vnto him, how that by an old ordinance it was enacted, that if the king should absent himselfe fourtie daies, not being sicke, and refuse to come to the parlement, without regard to the charges of his people, and their great paines, they then may lawfullie retorne home to their houses: and therefore sith he had bene absent a long time, and yet refused to come among them, it was greatlie to their discomfort. To this the king (as we find) made this answer: Well, we do perceiue that our people and commons go about to rise against vs: wherefore we thinke we cannot do better than to aske aid of our couline the French king, and rather submit vs vnto him than to our owne subiects.

The lords answered, that it should not be good for him so to do, but a waie rather to bring him into extreame danger, sith it was plaine enough, that the French king was his ancient enemie and greatest aduersarie, vnto if he might once set foot in the realme of England, he would rather despoile and dispossesse the king of his kingdome, than put his helping hand to relieue him. He might (they said) call to remembrance, how his noble progenitour king Edward his father had trauelled in heat and cold, with great anguish and troubles incessantlie, to make a conquest of France, that rightfullie appertained vnto them, and now to him, in which wars he might his wife remember how manie lords, noble men, and

God commons of both realmes had lost their lives, and what charges both the realmes likewise bare in maintaining those warres: and now (the more pittie) greater burthens were laid upon the necks of the English subjects for the supportation of his charges, by reason whereof, they were so low brought (said they) that they haue not to paie their rents, and so by such meanes was his power decayed: his lordes brought behind hand, and all his people soe impouerished. And as that king cannot be poore that hath rich people, so cannot he be rich that hath poore commons. And as he took hurt by such inconueniences chancing through enill counsellors that were about him, so the lordes and noblemen sustained no lesse hurt each one after his estate and calling. And if remedie were not in time prouided through his helping hand, the realme must needs fall in ruine, and the default should be imputed to him and to those his enill counsellors.

By these and the like persuations the king was induced to come to the parlement, and according to his appointment he came indeed. Some after his coming was John Foxham bishop of Durham discharged of his office of lord treasurer, and in his place was appointed one John Gilbert bishop of Hereford, that was a frere of the order of preachers, a man more eloquent than faithfull, as some reported of him. Also the earle of Suffolke was discharged of his office of lord chancellor, and Thomas Arundell bishop of Ely placed in his roome, by whole consent of parlement. The same earle of Suffolke was charged with manie & verie great enormous crimes, frauds, falshoods, and trefons, which he had practised, to the great prejudice of the king and realme, and thereupon was committed to ward in the castell of Windsor. Notwithstanding they adjudged him not to death (as some wyte) nor disgraced him of the honoz of knight hood, but condemned him to paie a fine of twentie thousand marks, and also to forfeit one thousand pounds of yerelie rents which he had purchased.

But other wyte, that notwithstanding the king was soe offended for the accusations brought against the said earle of Suffolke and others, whome he loved, and was loth to heare anie euill of: yet he was constrained at length, after he had shifted off the matter by sundrie deuises, to appoint certeine persons with full power and authoritie to heare, and in iudgement to determine those matters. The duke of Glocester therfore, and the earle of Arundell were appointed as iudges; which whilst the king as yet was absent, who got him forth of the wate of purpose, because he would not be present at the condemnation of those whome he most entirly loved and fauoured, went earnestly in hand with their busynesse, and so at length (as Walsingham saith) the earle of Suffolke was conuicted, & found gilty of sundrie crimes, trespases, and naughtie parts: for which it was thought that he deserved to lose his life & goods, but yet he was suffered (as the same Walsingham saith) to go abroad under suertie, certeine great men being bound for him in great sums of monie. But what order forer was taken for the punishment of him, sure it is he was displaced from his office of chancellorship, as before ye haue heard.

Furthermore, the lordes, and other estates in this parlement, considering that through couetousnesse of the new depoued officers, the kings treasure had bene imbezeld, lewdly wasted, & prodigallie spent, nothing to his profit: there were in this parlement thirtene lordes chosen, to haue ouersight vnder the king of the whole gouernment of the realme, as by their commission in the statutes of the tenth yeare of this king it doth in the booke of statutes at large ap-peare. Of those thirtene there were thre of the new officers named, as the bishop of Ely lord chancellor, the bishop of Hereford lord treasurer, and Nicholas abbat of Waltham lord keeper of the priue seale: the other ten were these, William archbishop of Cantuarie, Alexander archbishop of Poike, Edmund Langley duke of Poike, Thomas duke of Glocester, William bishop of Winchester, Thomas bishop of Exeter, Richard earle of Arundell, Richard lord Scrope, and John lord Deberene. But this participation of the gouernement fell out to be inconuenient, as by procelle of the storie shall appere, euen to those unto whome it was allotted: so that no small a doo happened among them and their partakers: according to the old proverbe, which saith;

Presbi quando cines veniunt in rodere plures.

Howeuer, at the kings instance and earnest sute it was granted, that Robert de Aier late marquisse of Dublin, and now newlie created duke of Ireland, should haue and receiue to his owne vse thirtie thousand marks, that the Frenchmen were to giue for the heires of the lord Charles de Blois, that remained here in England, which Charles in times past chalenged as his rightfull inheritance the dutie of Britaine, against the earle of Pontfort. This grant was made to the duke of Ireland, with condition, that being furnished with this monie, he should passe over into Ireland, before the next Easter, there to recouer such lands as the king had giuen to him. For aswell the lordes as the commons were so desirous to haue him gone, that they wished the realme rather to spare so much treasure, than to haue his presence about the king, to allure him to folle. The same time the king of Armenia sued for a safe conduct to come againe ouer into this land, to speake with the king as it had been about the mouing of some peace betwixt the two realmes of England and France, but with his meaning was suspected to be to no good end, but to benefit himselfe by receiuing of some great gifts at the kings bountifull hands, his sute was not granted.

In this meane time also, whilst the French king with such a companie of dukes, earls and other lordes, as had not bene heard of, still continued in Flanders, staing as well for a conuenient wind, as for the coming of the duke of Berrie; it chanced that certeine English ships, as they wasted the seas, met with two of the French ships, that were sailing towards Sluis, and fighting with them, took them, and brought them both to Sandwich. There was found aboard the same ships, a maister gunner, that sometime had serued the Englishmen at Calis, when sir Hugh Caluerlie was lieutenant there; also diuerse great guns and engins to beat downe wals were found and taken in the same ships, with a great quantitie of powder that was more worth than all the rest.

About the same time, or rather somewhat before, the Englishmen also took certeine hulks and six caricks of the Genowais, laden with great riches: but because they were merchants, they found such fauour at the kings hands through means of Michaele de la Pole then lord chancellor (whome they had made their friend) that they had their vessels and all their goods restored, and freightwaies they passed with the same unto Sluis, where the enimies laie, to make sale of their wares there. Whereupon much murmuring rose among the kings subjects, taking it in euill part, that they should be suffered so to go their waies to releue the enimies of the realme, with such goods as were once brought into the Englishmens possession, and specially the lord chancellor was verie euill thought of, for shewing so much fauour vnto those strangers.

The French king still remaining in Flanders, ta-rning for the coming of the duke of Berrie, and also for a convenient wind, at length on the even of all saints, the wind came about very favourable for the Frenchmens purpose: whereupon they weighed anchors, and lanchd from the haven of Sluis, but they were not past twentie miles forward on their way, when the wind suddenlie turned contrarie to their course againe, and brought them backe with such violence, that divers of them as they should enter the haven, were broken and bused, and so by this occasion, and the counsell of the duke of Berrie together, the French king brake by his journey for that peace, and returned into France. ¶ We have heard what was done by the states assembled in parlement against the earle of Suffolke, whom the most part of the realme so greatly hated, but yet nevertheless, the king had such an affection towards him, that immediatlie after the parliament was dissolved, he undid all that had bene enacted against him, receivng him into more familiaritie than before, and caused him to continue with the duke of Ireland, and Alexander Beull archbishop of Poike, which two lords travelled most earnestlie to moue the king against the other lords, and to disannull all that had bene done in the last parliament.

Where increased therefore in the king an inward hatred, which he conceived against the lords, these men putting into his eare, that he was like no king but rather resembled the shadow of one; saying, it would come to passe that he should be able to do nothing of himselfe, if the lords might enjoy the autho-ritie which they had taken upon them. The king gave credit to these tales, and therefore had the lords in great gelousie, notwithstanding they were thought to be his most true and faithfull subiects, and the other craftie, deceitfull, and untrustie; but such an affection had the king to them, that no informations, nor accusations, though neuer so manifestlie proved, could bring them out of his favour, in so much as at the feast of Christmase next following, he caused the earle of Suffolke to sit with him at his owne table, in robes accustomed appointed for kings to weare, and not for meaner estates, which was much noted, and no little increased the envie against him.

The earle of Arundell goeth to the sea with 500 men

a thousand archers as Frois-sard noteth.

About the beginning of March in this tenth yere, Richard earle of Arundell, being appointed lord ad-mirall, & Thomas Spowbray earle of Nottingham, the earle of Devonshire, and the bishop of Poewich (as Froissard saith) went to the sea with a warlike powder of men of armes and archers, so well trimmed and appointed as was possible. For the lord admirall understanding that the duke of Gloucester, and manie other noblemen would see the muster of his men, used all diligence, and spared for no costs, to haue the most choicest and pickest fellows that might be gotten, not following the euill example of others in times past, which received tag and rag to fill by their numbers, whom they hired for small wages, and reserved the residue to their purses. And when to the advancement of the realms commoditie they should haue encountered the enemies, they shifted off all occassions thereto, and onclie prolonged time, without achieuing any enterpryse available, to the end they might receive the whole wages, and keepe themselves from danger, which they should hardlie haue avoided, when they had not about them such able men as were like to match the enemies: but the earle of Arundell contrarie got the ablest men he might, not sparing his owne purse, to the end that by their service he might achieve some worthie enterpryse, to redound unto the commoditie of his countrie.

A great abuse

After the duke of Gloucester had beheld so faire and chosen a power of men of warre, they were fireightwales appointed to get them on shipboard, & to bring imbarcked, the whole nauie passed forth to the Thames mouth, where they staid to watch for the fleet of Flanders, that was ready to come from Rochell with wines. At length, upon a Sunday, being the euen of the Annuntiation of our ladie, the Flemish fleet was discovered, and was off, by one that was mounted into one of the tops of a ship of the English fleet. The earle of Arundell greatly rejoicing at those newes, forthwith with his whole fleet made to the sea. When the Flemings approached nere, to our nauie, they made saile, as if they would set upon the same; and our men of purpose made countenance as if they would haue refused, as mistrusting themselves to be able to match these adversaries, who coucting rather a safe passage than battell, passed by: but the Englishmen hauing once got the wind fit for their purpose, suddenlie set upon the Flemish ships, and fought with them right fiercelie: at length, after a sore conflict which endured foure houres, the victorie fell to the Englishmen.

and one that had aforetime done much hurt to the English nation. Diuerse of their ships were bouged, and some escaped from the battell. But the earle of Arundell pursued them so egerlie for the space of two daies together, that at length he took them, and brought them backe to his nauie, so that what in the battell and in the chase, there were taken of great and small, to the number of an hundred vessels, all fraught with wines, so that there was found aboard the same nine thousand tunns, or rather (as other saie) nine score thousand, which together with the vessels were freight sent unto Swell haven, and to other havenes abroad in the realme, beside that which fell to the kings share, as due to him by his prerogaye haue heard) was pursued unto the haven of Sluis

The citizens of Spiddleburgh came to the earle, and requested him that they might buye those wines of him, and paie for the same after the rate of an hundred shillings the tunne, alledging how they were the kings friends, and stood in need of wines: but the earle of Arundell, thinking it more reason that those which had borne the charges of his journey, to wit, the commons of the realme of England should haue the commoditie thereof than any other, he denied their suite. But yet to shew them some pleasure as his friends, he gaue them twentie tunns to make merrie with. As for that which fell to the earles share, he used such bountifullnesse in bestowing it among his friends, that he left not to himselfe so much as one tunne. He wan therefore no small praise, that for bearing his owne commoditie, which he might haue reaped in selling those wines to strangers, he had more regard to the profit of the commons, whereby they might vnderstand, that that which they had laid forth towards the setting forward of his journey, was not altogether lost nor cast awaie. By this meanes (besides the commendation which he drew to himselfe) he also wan the hearts & good will of the people, whose friendship is purchased by gifts and good deeds, sith they make profit the method of amitie, & bound in benevolence with receiued benefits, as the poet saith, for the space of ten daies together, they hoisted up sailes, and returned with all their preie and bories, which being sold, and uttered abroad in the realme, made wine so plentifulle here in England, that it was sold for thirteene shillings foure pence the tun, and twentie shillings the best and choicest. The earle of Arundell not satisfied with this happie atchieved enterprise, but minding to do more service to the benefit of his countrie, gathered his ships together, and hiring new souldiers to supplie the comes of them that were hurt, maimed, or slaine, turned his sailes towards the castell of Brest, which seemed to be a heie to the lesse Britaine, and being (as ye haue heard) in the Englishmens possession, the Frenchmen were about to raise up and build farre greater and stronger bastillions, than those were that the duke of Lancaster had taken and destroied, as he sailed forward on his iournie toward Spaine.

One of these two new bastiles the earle of Arundell toome by force from them that kept it: and because it seemed necessarie to be kept for a defense to the castell, if it were in the Englishmens hands, he committed it to the custodie of certeine Englishmen. The other being not yet finished, but begun in sumptuous wise to be builded, he set on fire and burned. This done, furnishing the garison with sufficient bittels and munition to serue them for one whole yeare, he returned home into England, with great praise and commendation of the commons for his doings. But the duke of Ireland, the earle of Sussex, sir Simon de Burle, and sir Richard Sturrie, that still continued about the king, seemed rather to enuie the earle of Arundels god name, than otherwise to commend him and others to the king, that had bene forth in that iournie, in so much that when the earle of Nottingham, otherwise called earle Marshall, that had bene euer the kings pla-fellow, and of equall age to him, came now to the court, hoping to be right welcome, and to receive great thanks at the kings hands, he had no god countenance shewed vnto him, neither of the king, nor of the duke of Ireland, who disdainng once to talke with him, seemed to enuie the worthie pro-uise in other, which he knew defectiue and wanting in himselfe.

Shortlie after, by the counsell of those lords and knights that remained about the king, the lord Henrie Percie, sonne to the earle of Northumberland, was sent to the seas, to beate backe the attempts of the enemies, but he was slenderlie appointed to at-chieue any great enterprise. This was done of some envious purpose, because he had got a name among the common people, to be a verie hardie and valiant gentleman, as well among Englishmen, as Scots. But he either ignorant, or not much waieing of that which they craftilie had imagined against him, boldlie and valiantlie executed the businesse inioined him, and hauing remained abroad, during the whole time of his appointed service, returned safelie home. About the same time, a frier Carmelite, named Walter Milse, that had bene confessor to the duke of Lancaster, obtained in fauour of the same duke, at pope Urbans hands, certeine faculties, to be distributed to such as would praise & paie for them.
Among other of those faculties, one was, to make all those whome he thought god, the popes chapleines, according to forme of law, and the custome vled in the court of Rome.

Now because such as obtained this fauour, inioied great liberties, manie were glad to bestow largelie, to be so preferred, the frier being redie to admit those that offered most. Among other, one Peter Bateshull, a frier of the Augustines order, was made by him the popes chapleine, a man not vnlearned, and one that fauoured Wickliffes doctrine, and there by on forsaking his priuate profession, gaue himselfe to a publike trade of life, which might seeme to him more holie, commendable, and sure. Whereupon, he tooke vpon him to preach against his owne order, namelie in a sermon which he made in saint Christo-phers church in London. He inuited so earnestlie against the abuses and heinous crimes which the friers, sometimes his brethren, vled to put in practice, that it was an horroz to heare. There were present an hundred at the least of Wickliffes opinion at his sermon. Now in the meane while that he so laid forth what he knew against his late brethren, some persons there were that ran to the Augustine friers, and declared the whole matter; whereupon a dozen of the hardiest and lustiest fellows among them came to the church, where this Bateshull was preaching, and hearing what was said, they began to be fore moued, inso much that one of them more zealous in his religion than the other, stepped forth, and gaue said those things which the preacher proponed.

When the Wickliffes perceived this, they set vpon him that so disquieted the congregation, and lai-eng hands on him, threw him downe, trode him vnder their feet, and lent him manie a god buffet: and chasing all the other friers awaie, they were fullie bent to haue killed them, and set their house on fier, crieng out with loud voices; Let vs destroie these murderers, let vs burne these sodomits, and hang by such traitors of the king and realme. And running thus with such a furious noise and outrage, they purposed verelie to haue set fire on the friers lodgings, but that through the humble prater of frier Thomas Athborne, and one that was his fellow, being reputed for two god men, and doctors of diuinitie, they were staied. The comming also of one of the shirifes of London holpe much to appease them, so that by his perswasion, they returned home to their houses. But Peter Bateshull, being mainteined among them, was counselled, sith he was interrupted in his sermon, to set downe in writing all such matters as he was about to treat of, & what he knew further. He therefore deuised a libell, in which he accused diuerse of his brethren, of murdering sundrie of their fellowes.

And for more proue to be giuen to his sayengs, he told the names of them that were made awaie, and the names also of the murderers, and shewed where those that were murdered were buried. He affirmed further, that the said friers his brethren of late, were sodomits and traitors, both to the king and realme, and manie other things he declared (so to bad) in that his writing or libell which he fastned vpon the church doore of S. Paule in London, that the more confusion might thereby rebound vnto his late brethren, the friers aforesaid. In the beginning of the same libell he protested, that he was got forth of the diuels dungeon, and through the grace of God escaped from amongst wicked and filthie persons; by reason whereof, and for that he was an auoucher of the veritie, he said, he was sure to suffer great aduersities at the friers hands, if they might laie hold on him. But he thanked pope Urbane, for that through his grant he had obtained such libertie, that by help of his frends, he might lawfullie withstaue himselfe from the hands of his enemies.

There were diuerse men of god worship that mainteined this Bateshull, and caused a transcript of this libell to be written forth, affirming all to be true that was therein mentioned. Amongst other that thus fauoured this cause, were diuerse knights, as sir William de Ruill, sir Lewis Clifford, sir John Cranbolue, sir Richard Sturrie, and sir Thomas Latimer, and the chiefe of all was one sir John Pon-teute,

But sith the king allowed of all the duke of Ireland's doings, the duke of Gloucester dissembled such iniuries done to his niece for the time, till opportunitie might serue to revenge the same.

A councell holden at Nottingham.

The duke of Ireland understood all these things, and therefore was the more circumspect for his owne safetie, and studied how by some meanes he might dispatch the duke of Gloucester out of the waie, as the man whom he most feared; least his life should be his destruction, by one means or other. Easter was now past, the time (as ye haue heard) appointed before the which the duke of Ireland should haue transported ouer into Ireland, & yet was he not set forward. But least somewhat might be thought in the matter, and for feare of some stir to be raised by the lordes of the realme, that wished him gone, according to the order prescribed at the last parlement, the king as it were to bring him to the water side, went with him into Wales, where being out of the waie, they might deuise how to dispatch the duke of Gloucester, the earles of Arundell, Warwicke, Derby, and Nottingham, with others of that faction. There were with the king, beside the duke of Ireland, Michaell de la Pole earle of Suffolke, Robert Trissilian lord chiefe iustice, and diuers other, which doubtful of their owne safegards did what they could (as writers report) to moue the king forward to the destruction of those noblemen. After the king had remained in those parties a good while, he returned, and brought the duke of Ireland backe with him againe so that it seemed his voyage into Ireland was now quite forgotten.

About the same time, Robert Trissilian lord chiefe iustice of England came to Couentrie, and indiated there two thousand persons. The king and the quene came to Grobie, and thither came by his commande- ment the iustices of the realme. There were also with him at the same time, Alexander archb. of Yorke, Robert Thre duke of Ireland, Michaell de la Pole earle of Suffolke, Robert Trissilian, & his fellows; of whom it was demanded, if by the lawes of the realme the king might reuoke the ordinances made in the last parlement, to the which he had given his consent in manner by constraint; and they made answer that he might. Then were the iustices commanded to come vnto Nottingham, where the king appointed to meet them, and thither he came according to his appointment, and held a solempne councell in the castell of Nottingham, the morrow after S. Bar- tholomew's day.

In this councell were the aforesaid archbishop of Yorke, the duke of Ireland, the earle of Suffolke, Robert Trissilian iustice, Robert Wramble iustice, and sundrie other, all which iustices were commaunded to set their hands vnto the question vnder writ- ten, that by meanes thereof, those persons that were about the king thought they might haue good occasion to put the duke of Gloucester, and other lordes that were his complices vnto death, which in the last parlement were ordained to haue the gouernance of the realme, and all such as were consenting to the same. Diuers of the iustices refused to subscribe, but yet they were constrained to do as the rest did, among the which was John Belknap, who utterly refused, till the duke of Ireland, and the earle of Suffolke compelled him thereto; for if he had persisted in the refusal, he had not escaped their hands, and yet when he had set to his seale, he burst out into these words; Now (said he) here lacketh nothing but a rope, that I might receiue a reward worthie for my desert, and I know, if I had not done this, I might not haue escaped your hands, so that for your pleasures and the kings I haue done it, and deserued thereby death at the hands of the lordes. Which indeed shortly follo- ed, for in the next parlement he was condemned and executed. All this remained in record.

An act of councell touching this matter, in manner as followeth.

M Emoyandum that on the five and twentieth day of August, in the 11th yere of the reigne of king Richard the second, at the castell of Nottingham aforesaid, Robert Trissilian lord chiefe iustice of England, Robert Belknap lord chiefe iustice of the comon' pleas, John Holt, Roger Fulthorpe, & William Borrough, knights and associates of the said Robert Belknap, and John Lockton one of the kings sergeants at the law, being personallie required in presence of the lordes and other witnessses vnder written by our said soueraigne lord the king, in that faith and allegiance in which to him they were bounden, that they should trulie answer to certeine questions vnder written, and vpon the same by their discretions, to saie the law.

Additional in Polychron.

1 First, it was asked of them, whether the new statute, ordinance, and commission made in the last parlement held at West- minster, be hurtfull to the kings preroga- tive. Wherevnto all of one mind answer- ed, that they were hurtfull, and speciallie because they be against the kings will.

Questions in law demanded of the iustices.

2 Item, it was inquired of them, how they ought to be punished, that procured the said statute, ordinance, and commission to be made. Wherevnto with one assent they answered, that they deserued death, except the king of his grace would pardon them.

3 Item, it was inquired, how they ought to be punished, which moued the king to consent to the making of the said statute, ordinance, and commission. Wherevnto they answered, that vntil the king would giue them his pardon, they ought to lose their liues.

4 Item, it was inquired of them what punishment they deserued, that compelled the king to the making of that statute, or- dinance and commission. Wherevnto they gaue answer, that they ought to suffer as traitors.

5 Item, it was demanded of them how they ought to be punished that interrup- ted the king so, that he might not exercise those things that appertained to his re- galitie and prerogative. Wherevnto an- swer was made, that they ought to be pu- nished nished as traitors.

6 Item, it was inquired of them, whether that after the affaires of the realme, and the cause of the calling together of the states of the parlement, were once by the kings commandement declared and opened, and other articles on the kings behalf limited, upon which the lords and commons of the realme ought to intreat and proceed; if the lords neuertheless would proceed upon other articles, and not meddle with those articles which the king had limited, till time the king had answered the articles proponed by them, notwithstanding the king inioined them to the contrarie: whether in this case the king might rule the parlement, and cause them to proceed upon the articles by him limited, before they proceeded any further: To which question it was answered, that the king should haue in this part the rule, for order of all such articles to be prosecuted, untill the end of the parlement. And if any presumed to go contrarie to this rule, he was to be punished as a traitor.

7 Item, it was asked, whether the king whensoever it pleased him might not dissolve the parlement, and command the lords and commons to depart from thence or not: Whereunto it was answered that he might.

8 Item, it was inquired, that for so much as it was in the king to remove such iustices and officers as offend, and to punish them for their offenses; whether the lords commons might, without the kings will, impeach the same officers and iustices, upon their offenses in parlement or not: To this answer was made, that they might not, and he that attempted contrarie, was to suffer as a traitor.

9 Item, it was inquired, how he is to be punished, that moued in the parlement, that the statute wherein Edward, the sonne of king Edward, great grandfather to the king that now is, was indicted in parlement, might be sent for; by inspection of which statute, the said new statute or ordinance and commission were conceived and deuised in the parlement:

To which question, with one accord, as in all the residue they answered, that as well he that so summoned, as the other, which by force of the same motion, brought the said statute into the parlement house, he as publike offenders and traitors, to be punished.

10 Item, it was inquired of them, whether the iudgement giuen in the parlement against Michaell de la Poole earle of Suffolke, were erroneous and reuocable, or not:

To which question likewise with one assent they said, that if the same iudgement were now to be giuen, the iustices and sergeant aforesaid would not giue the same: because it seemed to them, that the said iudgement is reuocable and erroneous in euerie part,

In witnesse of the premisses, the iustices & sergeant aforesaid to these presents haue set their seals, these being witnesses; Alexander archbishop of Yorke, Robert archbishop of Dubline, John bishop of Durham, Thomas bishop of Chelster, John bishop of Bangor, Robert duke of Ireland, Michaell erle of Suffolke, John Ripon cleрке, and John Blake.

10 Now beside these iustices and sergeant, there were called at that present vnto Nottingham, all other iustices of the realme, and the shiriffes. Also, diuerse of the citie of London, which the king knew would incline to his will, the rather; for that some of them, hauing aforesaid confessed treason against the king by them imagined, and obtaining pardon for the same, were readie at his commandement, to recompense such fauour, in the accomplishment of whatsoeuer they knew might stand with his pleasure. Whereupon, they being impanelled to inquire of certaine treasons that were supposed to be committed by the lords, which in the last parlement had so caused things to passe, contrarie to the kings pleasure, indicted the same lords of manie crimes informed against them, & The Londoners indeed were euill reported of in those daies, by some writers, for their unfaithfulness, one while holding on the kings part, and with such as were these in counsell about him; and another while on the lords side that were of a contrarie faction: according as the streame of their affections draue them, and as they were carried a waie perforce by the flood of their variable willes, whereby they were diuided into differing passions, as they were assaulted by sundrie and vncertaine desires: which is the nature of the people, as the poet noteth, saying:

Scinditur incertum studia in contraria vulgus.

But now, as concerning the cause whie the shiriffes were called hither, it was chieflie to vnderstand what power of men they might assure the king of, to serue him against the lords and barons, whom he toke to be his enemies: and further, that where he meant to call a parlement verie shortlie, they should so vse the matter, that no knight might be chosen, but such as the king and his counsell should name. But answer was made hereunto by the shiriffes, that the lords were so highlie beloued of the commons, that it laie not in their powers to assemble any great forces against the lords; and as for choosing the knights of the shires, they said that the commons would vndoubtedlie vse their ancient liberties, and priuileges, in choosing such as they thought meetest. But yet, after that the indictments were found, according to the desire of the king and his counsellors, and that those which had bene called about this matter, were licenced to depart home; the king and the duke of Ireland sent messengers into euerie part of the realme, to reteine men of warre to assist them in the quarell against the lords, if need were. Danie made answer, that sith they knew the lords to be faithfull and loiall to the king, euen from the bottome of their hearts, and were readie to studie, to deuise, and to do all things that might tend to his honor, and wealth of the realme; they might not by anie meanes beare armour against them. But a great number of other, that toke it that they were reteined for a good and necessarie purpose, promised to be readie, whensoever it should please the king to send for them.

The lords being in this meane while aduertised of these doings, were stricken with great heauinesse, for that not knowing themselves (as they toke it) guiltie of anie offense, the king should thus take their destruction. Herewith the duke of Glocester, meaning to to mitigate the kings displeasure, received a solemn oth before the bishop of London, and divers other lords, protesting by the same oth, that he never imagined, nor went about any thing, to the kings hinderance, but to his power had alwaies done what he might to advance the kings honor, prosperous state and good liking, except onelie that he had given no good countenance to the duke of Ireland, whom the king so much loved. And suertie for that the said duke had dishonored his kinswoman, and the kings also, he was firmelie determined to revenge that injurie upon him; and herewith he becougth the bishop of London to declare what his words were unto the king.

Stout words of the bishop
of London.

The bishop comming to the king, made report of the duke of Gloucesters protestation, confirmed with his oth, in such wise, as the king began somewhat to be persuaded that it was true. But when the earle of Suffolke perceived that, fearing least the reconciliation of the king and the duke his uncle should turne to his hindering, he began to speake against the duke, till the bishop had him hold his peace; and told him, that if nothing became him to speake at all. And when the earle asked why so; Because (said the bishop) thou wast in the last parlement condemned for an euill person, and one not worthy to live, but onelie it pleased the king to shew thee fauour. The king offended with the bishops presumptuous words, com-minded him to depart & get him home to his church, wherewith departed, and declared to the duke of Gloucester what he had heard and sene. Hereupon, the great milking that had bene afore time betwixt the king and the lords, was now more be-mentlie increased, the duke of Ireland, the earle of Suffolke, the archbishop of Yorke, the lord chiefe iustice Robert Trililian, and others, still procuring, stirring, and confirming the kings heauie displeasure against the lords.

The lords

to preuent the perils pretended against them.

The duke of Gloucester considering to what conclusion these things tended, came secretlie to conference with the earles of Arundell, Marwike, and Derbie, who were in like danger, if they provided not more speedilie for their safetie, whereupon he discouered to them the perill wherein they all stood in common, so that when they weied what was the most expedient meane to safe gard their liues, they gathered their power together, determining to talke with the king with their armour upon their backs, for their more suertie, as well concerning his pretense to bring them to their deaths, as for the fauour which he bare to those whom they reputed to be traitors, both to him, and to the whole state of the realme, whereby the same could not auoid speedie ruine, if remedie were not the soner provided. The king on the other part toke aduise, how he might apprehend these lords (whom he toke to be plaine traitors) ech one apart, before they might gather their strenghts about them; and first, he sent the earle of Northumberland and others, unto the castell of Kewgate, to take the earle of Arundell, who laie there at that present. But holowseuer it fortunied, the earle of Northumberland came backe, and failed to accomplish that which he had in commandement.

After this, a great number were sent by night, to haue laid hands on him, and to haue brought him to the kings presence; or in case he resisted, to haue slaine him, if by any meanes they might: but he being warned by a messenger, that came to him from the duke of Gloucester, conueied himselfe awaie, and with such hands as he had got together, rode all that night, so that in the morning hauing passed thirtie miles, not without great travell, and all speed possible, he was in the morning advanced to Haringie parke, where he found the duke of Gloucester, and the earle of Marwike, with a great power of men about them. At the same time the king was about to set forward towards Canturburie, there to performe some bolv of pilgrimage, which he had undertaken to make unto the shrine of Thomas Becket. But a brute was raised, and a slander (belike) contriued, to bring him in further hatred of his subjects, that he meant to steale ouer into France, unto the French king, hauing promised to deliuer vp into his hands the towne of Calis, with the castell of Guines, and all the fortresses which his predecessors had possessed in those parties, either by right from their ancestors, or by warlike conquest.

Whobest this his iournie to Canturburie was suddenlie staied, vpon knowledge had of the gatherring together of the lords in Haringie parke, wherewith the king being sore amazed, called together such as he trusted, to vnderstand what their opinion was of the matter; and vnderstanding that the purposed intention of the lords, for which they were so assembled, was to this end (as they pretended) to bring him unto a better trade of life, and more profitable order of gouernement, he was straight striken with no small feare, demanding of them their aduise, what was best for him to do in such troublefome state of things. Some were of this mind, that it should be best to seeke to appease the lords with faire promises, assuring them, that they should haue their desires. Other thought it better to assemble the kings friends, and joining them with the Londoners, to go forth and trie the hazard of battell with the lords. Among them that were of this mind, the archbishop of Yorke was the chiefe. But other that were thought to vnder-stand more of the world than he did, iudged it not wisdomme so to do, considering that if the king lost the field, then should great harme and dishonour follow; and if the victorie fell to his side, yet could he gaue naught, but lose a great number of his subjects.

This was in Nouember, at what time the king, vpon his returning from Canturburie, meant to haue helden a parlement; but through those firs, neither his iournie to Canturburie, nor the parlement went forward: yet he caused order to be given, that no citizen of London should sell to the duke of Gloucester, the earle of Arundell, or any other of the lords, any armour, bowes, arrowes, or other munition, or matter that might tend to the furniture of warre, vpon a great paine. But notwithstanding, the lords went forward with their businesse; and before they approched the citie of London, they sent to the king the archbishop of Canturburie, the lord John Louell, the lord Cobham, and the lord John Deuereux, requiring to haue deliuered unto them such as were about him, that were traitors and seducers both of him and the realme, that sought nothing else, but to trouble both poore and rich, and to sow discord and variance betwixt the king and his nobles. And further, they declared that their comming was for the honor and wealth both of the king and realme.

gers to the king.

But the king being ruled altogether by the duke of Ireland, the earle of Suffolke, and two or three other, was fullie persuaded that the lords intended to bring him under their gouernement, and therefore he was counselled to make the French king his sure friend in all vrgent necessities. And to be assured of him, it was reported, that those counsellors aduised him to render vp into the French kings hands the towne of Calis, and all that he had else in possession, on the further side of the sea. Whosoeuer this matter went, truly it is, that the king sent for the maiors of London, requiring to know of him how manie able men they thought the citie could make. The maiors answered, that he thought verelie the citizens might

An. Reg. 11.

The Londoners refuse to fight against the lord.

The earle of Northumberland and the lord Balliue words to the king in the hall of the lords.

Council has been how to deal against the lords.

The lords send messengers to the king.

The lords take an oath together, to prosecute their purpose.

The lords take the favour of the Londoners.

Thom. Wall.

It hath been how the king of London.

make in time of need, fiftie thousand men, within an houre respit. Well said the king, then I beseech you go and procure what will be done. But when the maior began to attempt the matter, he was answered generally, that they would neuer fight against the kings friends, and defenders of the realme (as indeed they took the lords to be) but against the enemies of the king and realme they would alwaies be ready to fight, and shew what resistance they were able. This answer the maior reported to the king.

At the same time there was about the king the lord Hafe Bassett, who said thus to the king flatly: "and plainlie: Sir, I haue bene, and cuer will be your true liege man, and my bodie and goods shall euer be at your graces commandement, in all iustice and trueth. But neuertheless, hereof I assure you, that if my hap be to come into the field, I will without faile alwaies follow the true part; and it is not I that will adventure to haue my head broken for the duke of Irelands pleasure. Likewise, the earle of Northumberland, being at that time in the court, spake these words to the king; Sir, there is no doubt but these lords, who now be in the field, alwaies haue bene your true and faithfull subjects, and yet are, not intending to attempt anie thing against your state, wealth, & hono^r. Neuertheless, they fele themselves sore molested and disquieted, by the wicked deuises of certeine persons about you, that seeke to oppresse them. And verelie without faile, all your realme is sore grieved therewith, both great and small, as well lords as commons; and I see not the contrarie, but they mind to adventure their liues with the lords that are thus in armes, speciallie in this case, which they reckon to be yours and your realmes. And sir, now ye be in the chiefe place of your realme, and in the place of your coronation, order your selfe now therefore wiselie and like a king. Send to them to come before your presence in some publike place, where they may declare vnto you the intent and purpose of their comming, accompanied with so great a number of people into these parts, and I beleue it verelie, they will shew such reasons that you will hold them excused.

The archbishop of Canturburie, and the lord chancellor; bishop of Elie, and other of the bishops also there present, affirmed the earles aduise to be good. And the king considering wiselie the case as it stood, began to be appeased, and accorded to follow their aduise, desiring the archbishop of Canturburie, and the bishop of Elie, to aduertise them of his pleasure, which was, that he willed them to come to him to Westminster, on sundaie then next following; and so they repairing to the lords, made report to them of the kings mind and purpose. But the duke of Glocester, and the other lords, were so fullie bent in their opinion, that they swore all whole together, that they would neuer giue ouer their enterprise, so long as they had a penie to spend, in maintenance of their cause: and if it chanced anie of them to depart this life, the ouerlifers should persist therein, vntill the time that they had brought their purpose to some good effect.

And because they doubted least the king might stirre the citie of London against them, they determined first to aduertise the maior and the citie, how their comming was onlie to reforme certeine great enormities, which they set downe in writing, & sent it to the maior and citizens, beseeching them of their fauour and counsell therein. This done, they determined yet to keepe their daie on the sundaie following, to appeare before the kings presence: but this was not got of them, till that the lord chancellor, with diuerse other noblemen of good credit, had undertaken vpon their oaths for the kings behelfe, that no fraud nor deceit, no perill nor euill pretence should be put in practise against the lords, whereby they might come to losse either of life, limme, or goods, or otherwise, though the kings means; but that if he should go about anie such things, the said lord chancellor, and other the mediators should forwarne the lords therof.

When therefore the lords were ready, according to couenant, to come vnto Westminster, they were secretly aduertised, that there was an ambush laid in a place called the Welwes, and so they staid, and came not at the appointed houre. Wherevpon, when the king demanded, how it fortuned that the lords kept not promise, the bishop of Elie lord Chancellor made him this answer; Bicause saith he, there is an ambush of a thousand armed men or more laid in such a place (and named it) contrarie to couenant, and therefore they neither come nor hold you for faithfull of your word. The king hearing this, was astonished, and said with an oath, that he knew of no such thing, & withall sent to the shiriffes of London, commanding them to go to the Welwes, and (vpon search made) if they found anie force of men there assembled, to take and kill all such as they could laie hands vpon. But sir Thomas Arriuet, and sir Nicholas Bamber, knight, that had in deed assembled such a number of men, when they vnderstood what order the king had giuen therein, they sent their men backe to London.

The lords, after this, receiving a safe conduct from the king, and perceiving all to be safe and cleare, came vnto Westminster with a strong power of men about them. The king, when he heard they were come, apparilled himselfe in his kingly robes, and with his scepter in hand came into the great hall at Westminster. The lords as soone as they had sight of him, made to him their humble obeisance, & went forth till they came to the nether steps, going vp to the kings seat of state, where they made their second obeisance; & then the king gaue them countenance to come nerer to him, & they so did, kneeling downe before him, & forthwith he rose from his place, and longing welcomming them, took each of them by the hand, and that done sate him downe againe. Here, with the bishop of Elie lord chancellor, as mouth to the king, declared vnto these lords in effect as foloweth. My lords (said he) our soueraine lord the king, hearing that you were assembled in Haringie park, in other manner than was conuenient, would not forthwith run vpon you with force to destroue you, as he might easilie haue done, if he had not wisshed your safetie; for no man doubteth, but if his pleasure had bene to gather an armie, he might haue had more people than you could haue got to haue taken part with you against him, and so happlie much blood might haue bene spilt, which thing certeinlie our soueraine lord the king utterlie abhorreth: and therefore vsing patience and mildnesse, he hath rather chosen to talke with you in peaceable wise, that he may vnderstand the cause why ye haue assembled so great a number of people together.

The lords for answer herevnto said, that they assembled their forces together, for the profit both of the king and realme, and speciallie to take awaie from him such traitors as remained continually about him; to wit, Robert de Clare duke of Ireland, Alexander Beuill archbishop of Doreke, Michael de la Pole erle of Suffolke, Robert Crislian that false iustice, and sir Nicholas Bamber that disloall knight of London: for so they tearmed them all. And to proue their accusations true, they shew downe their gloues, protesting by their oaths to prosecute it by battell. Saie (saith the king) not so, but in the next parlement, which we do appoint before hand to begin the morow after the purification of our ladie, both they and you appearing, shall receiue (according to law) all that which reason shall appoint. And now to you my

An ambush at Welwes.

The lords come before the kings presence in Westminster hall.

The lord chancellor speaketh for the king to the lords.

The answer of the lords & their graces.

The king reproueth the lords doings.

my lords I speake, by what meane or by what reason durst you so presumptuouslie take vpon you within this my land to rise thus against me? Did you thinke to feare me with such your presumptuous boldnesse?
Hauē I not armed men sufficient to haue beaten you downe, compassed about like a sort of beere in a toile? If I would: trulie in this behalfe I make no more account of you, than of the vilest skulions in my kitchen.

The king taketh both parties into his protection.

Then he had said these wordes, with much more, he lift vp the duke of Glocester that all this while kneeled afore him, and commanded the residue to rise also.
After this, he led them courteously to his chamber, where they sate and dyanke together. And finally it was concluded, that they should all meet together againe at the next parlement, and eche one to receiue according to iustice: and in the meane time the king toke aswell the duke of Glocester, as the duke of Ireland into his protection, so that neither part in the meane time should hurt the other, nor presume to make any gathering of people untill the time prefir-ed: and so this counsell brake vp, and the lords departed. These things yet were done in absente of the fozenamed persons whom the lords accused, for they durst not appeare in presense of the lords; for if they had bene espyed, they had smarted for it, as was thought, without any respect that would haue bene had of the kings presense. And now, for so much as it should be well knowne through all the citie, that these lords had nothing offended him with their comming, the king caused a proclamation to be made, the te-nour whereof was as followeth.

Crafter.

A proclamation clearing the lords of treason.

Richard by the grace of God, &c.
We will that it be knowne to all our liege people throughout our realme of England, that whereas Thomas duke of Glocester, Richard earle of Arundell, & Thomas earle of Marwoike, haue bene defamed of treason by certeine of our counsellors; we as it apperteineth, diligentlie searching the ground & cause of this defamacion, find no such thing in them, nor any suspicion thereof: wherfore we declare the same defamation to be false, and vnttrue, and doe receiue the same duke and earles into our speciall protection. And bicause these accusers shall be notoriousslie knowne, their names are Alexander archbishop of York, sir Robert Clere duke of Ireland, Michaell de la Poole earle of Suffolke, Robert Trisilian lord chiefe iustice, and sir Nicholas Bram-ble of London knight, who in like case shall remaine till the next parlement, and there shall stand to their answers. But in the meane time we likewise take them into our protection, streictlie charging and commanding that no maner of person charge any of the fozenamed, either priuilie or apertlie, in word or deed, to hurt them, or cause any hurt to be done to them, but all quarrels & demands against them to be remitted, untill the next parlement prefired.

Now to haue all things in more perfect readinesse and remembrance when the estates should be assembled, certeine of the lords were appointed to sit in the meane time, to deuise how they might proceed order-lie in redress of such matters, as seemed to require some speedie reformation: neither did they thinke it good to depart in sunder, for feare to be intrapped through the malicious practise of their aduersaries.

Which doubt of theirs seemed afterwards to stand them in stead of great wisdom. For immediatlie after, their said aduersaries came to the king, and declared how they were daily in danger of their liues, by reason of the malice which the lords had conceiued against them onelie for the kings sake, and not for any matter of their owne. And whereas the king had promised that they should appeare at the next parlement, which was at hand, they told him plainlie that they neither durst nor would put their bodies in such manifest danger. The king considering hereof, withdrew himselfe from the companie of the lords that were assigned to sit at London, to deliberate of matters that were to be talked of and ordered in the par-lement; and so that counsell was deferred and laid aside: and the kings counsellors that stood in danger of their liues through the malice of the lords confederated with the duke of Glocester, got them from the court, and withdrew some into this place and some into that.

Among other the earle of Suffolke fled ouer vnto Calis in secret wise, by the helpe of a knight called sir William Ho, who holpe to conueie him thither.
He had changed his apparell, and shauen his beard, and so disguised, counterfeited himselfe to be a poul-ter, and to sell certeine soule which he had gotten, by which means he was not knowne, till at length com-ming to the gates of the castell (whereof his brother sir Edmund de la Poole was captaine) he discovered to him (scarcelie knowing who he was, by reason he was so disguised) the whole occasion of his repairing thither, requiring him to keepe his counsell, and that he might remaine with him in priuie maner for a time, till he might heare more how things went in England, from whence he was thus fled, to auoid the bloudie hands of his enemies, that sought his life.
His brother doubting what might be laid to his charge if he should conceale this matter from the lord William Beauchampe lord deputie of the towne, straightwaies aduertised him thereof, who toke order that the earle should forthwith be sent backe againe into England to the king, who receiued him with small thanks to them that brought him ouer, so that (as some write) his brother being one, was committed to prison for disclosing him. But yet bi-cause it should not seeme that he imprisoned him for that cause, he was shortly after set at libertie, and returned againe to his charge at Calis. The earle was also permitted to go whither he would, although the king had undertaken to present him and others at the next parlement to answer their offenses, as the same might be laid to their charge.

¶ But here it may be doubted by the vncertentie of writers, whether the earle of Suffolke thus fled ouer to Calis, before the iournie at Ratcote bridge, or after. But whether it chanced either after or before, it is certeine that since the time that the lords had forced the king to promise to exhibit him and others at the next parlement to abide their trials, he durst not o-penlie remaine in the court, but taking leaue of the king departed from him. Whereupon the king being out of quiet for the absence of him and other his best beloued counsellors, whom he so much esteemed, and namelie of the duke of Ireland, and the said earle of Suffolke, he appointed one Thomas Wolincour constable of the castell of Chester, a man of high valiancie, and great power in the parties of Cheshire and Lancashire, to raise an armie of men, with the assistance of the shiriffe of Cheshire, to whom his com-million of authoritie in that behalfe, vnder the great scale was directed, to the end that they might conueie the duke of Ireland in all safetie vnto the kings presence.

The lords
saw to stop the passage at the duke of Ireland.

The shiriffe hauing receiued this commission, together with the foresaid Thomas Spolincur raised a power, and such as refused to serue, in respect of such god will as they bare to the lords, he committed to prison, commanding the gaolers to keepe them strict in irons with bread and water till his returne. Spolincur, the king sent to sir Rafe Vernon, & sir Richard Katcliffe, willing them to assist the other. And so thus they set forward with the number of five thousand men. When the lords vnderstood that the duke of Ireland was marching towards London, with such a power of men, meaning to ioine with the Londoners, and so to make as it had bene an invincible armie, they bestirred themselves, and fell in hand to arme their men, and to exhort one another, that now they should not be negligent in their owne defense, but make haile for the dispatching of those that crastillie had gone about to conspire their deaths. And so these lords, to wit, the duke of Gloucester, the earles of Derbie, Arundell, Warwicke, and Nottingham, assembled their powers out of all quarters, to incounter with the duke of Ireland; and when they had got their companies together, they foresailed all the waies by which he was thought to come.

But the duke of Ireland hauing with him Spolincur, Vernon, and Katcliffe, rode forward in statelie and glorious array, with an armie (as ye haue heard) of five thousand men, supposing that none durst come forth to withstand him. Neuer the lesse when he came to Katcote bidge, not past foure miles from Cheping Boxton (which bidge if he could haue passed, he had bene out of the danger of all eniunies) he suddenly espied where the armie of the lords late, not far distant from him, readie in the midst of a ballie to abide his coming. Some of the earle of Derbies companye had broken the bidge, & so stopped his passage. He therefore perceiuing his eniunies intention, skated, and caused the kings banner to be spred, and began to set a good countenance of the matter, and to exhort his people to shew themselves valiant; and herewith caused the trumpets to sound. But when it appeared that as some were readie to fight in his quarrell, so there were other that quite forsake him, and said flatlie they would not fight against so manie noble men, in so brutaill a cause: he being thereof aduertised, began to war faint-hearted, and to prepare himselfe to escape by flight; and declaring no lesse o-penlie vnto them, said: Before we come to ioine, I will seeke to withstand my selfe out of the waie, and saue my selfe if I can; for me they onlie seeke, against you they haue no quarrell, so that I being thiffed awaie, you shall easilie be preserved. Herewith one of the knights said to him; You haue brought vs out of our countrie, you haue procured vs to giue you our promise, you haue caused vs to take this iournie in hand: here therefore are we readie to fight & win the victorie with you, if our hap be such; or if fortune will not so fauour vs, we are readie to spend our lines with you. So said he, ye shall not so do, and forthwith striking his horse with spurs, he fled from them for feare which had set wings on his heles, as one saith:

The duke of Ireland his souldiers re-uolted fro him.

The duke of Ireland fled

Reg. An. 11. g.

—pedibus timor addidit alas.

Hereupon manie that were with him, cursing this his demcanour, prepared to yeld themselves to the lords. But Thomas Spolincur determined to fight it out, with the lords were not yet all come together to that place, but onelie the earle of Derby and certeine others. Neuerthelesse, after he had fought a while, and perceiued it would not auaille him to tarie longer, as one despairing of the victorie, betooke him likewise to flight, as the duke of Ireland had led him the waie: and plunging into the riuer, which was at hand, it chanced that sir Thomas Spolincur being present amongst other at the same place, willed him to come out of the water vnto him; for if he would not, he threatened to shoot him through with arrowes in the riuer where he stood. If I come (said Spolincur) will ye saue my life? I will make thee no such promise (said sir Thomas Spolincur) but notwithstanding, either come vp, or thou shalt presentlie die for it. Well then (said Spolincur) if there be no other remedie, suffer me to come vp, and let me trie with hand-blowes, either with you or some other, and so die like a man. But as he came vp, the knight caught him by the helmet, plucked it off his head, & freightwaies drawing forth his dagger, stroke him into the baines, and so dispatched him. This was the end of sir Thomas Spolincur, which through his bold and rath aduenture, in a most dangerous and desperat case, he pulled vpon himselfe; and might as well haue auoided as incurred, if the same prouident care of safetie had taken him in the head that moued the duke of Ireland to take flight for his indemnitie: wherein he seemed to remember that there is no safe attempting of any perillous enterprise without dread of danger: for he that can tell when a thing is to be feared, can tell in like sort when it is to be vnder-taken; as the wiseman berie sententiouslie saith:

Animum vereri qui scit, sit tunc aggreddi.

In the meane time, the duke of Ireland (as ye haue heard) seeking to escape by flight, came to the riuers side; but finding the bidge broken, he galoped till he found an other bidge, where he found a number of archers readie to stop his passage. When he saw that he was thus inclosed with his eniunies on the one side, and the riuer of Thames on the other, he thought to put all in aduenture; and casting a waie his gantlets, and sword (to be the more nimble) gaue his horse the spurres, and leapt into the riuer; but missing the sword, and not able to land with his horse on the further side, he forsooke him, and swimming ouer so well as he might, got to the bankes, and so escaped.
It was now night, and therefore his eniunies hauing no knowledge of the countrie, followed him not; but his horse, helmet, curasses, gantlets, and sword being found, it was thought berelie that he had bene drowned. The next newes heard of him, was that he had passed the seas, and was got into Holland, where he had no great frendlie welcome, by reason that Albert duke of Bauiere, who was lord of that countrie, bare such good will to his cousins of England, the dukes of Lancaster, Poike, and Gloucester, that he commanded this duke of Ireland to depart forth of his countrie, as immediatlie thereupon he did, from thence resorting to the bishopricke of Utrecht, and after into other countries, till finallie he ended the course of his life, as after in place conuenient shall appeare.

But now to returne to the armies where we left them. After the duke was fled, and Thomas Spolincur slaine (as before ye haue heard) the armie of the lords set vpon the people that were come with the duke of Ireland (as hath bene said) forth of Chesshire, Lancashire, and Wales; and taking them as eniunies, spoiled them of their horse, armor, bowes and arrowes. The knights and esquiers had their armor and horses againe to them restored, and were re-teined with the lords to serue them: but the commons without either armor or weapone were sent home, and had no other harme done vnto them. The duke of Irelands cariage being taken, letters were found in his trunks or males, which the king had written to him, exhorting him with all speed to repaire vnto London, with what power he might make,

make, and there he should find him readie to lue and die with him. Such was the conclusion of this battell, which happened nere vnto Barf. d., fast by Wablake, to the great reioysing of manie through the realme; for that the enemies the reof (as they toke the matter) were thus overthowne. But yet the escayping awaie of the duke of Ireland did somewhat mitigate their ioy, for what was become of him it was vncertaine. After this the duke of Gloucester, and the other lords went to Drford, being sozie that their fortune was not to haue taken the duke of Ireland.

Tho. Walf.

Byate raised that king Richard meant to yeld by Calis into the French kings hands.

At the same time, or rather before, the archbishop of Porke, and the lord chiefe iustice sir Robert Tresilian, fearing the indignation of the lords, withdrew out of the waie, and durst not be seene. But now the lords, who after the iournie at Radcote bidge, were come (as ye haue heard) to Drford; we find that the same time a byate was raised (whether of truth or not, we haue neither to asseine nor denie) how there was a messenger taken being sent from the French king with letters, in which was contained a licence of safe conduct, for the king of England, the duke of Ireland, and others, to come to Bullongne, with a certeine number limited, where they should find the French king come downe thither readie to receiue them, to the end that for a certeine summe of monie, which the French king should giue to the king of England, the towne of Calis, and all the fortresses in those parts, which were in the Englishmens hands, should be deliuered to the Frenchmen; and further that the king of England should do his homage to the French king, for the lands which he held in Gascoigne, and so to haue acknowledged himselfe his liege man. The lords (as was reported) hauing got these letters, and taken counsell together how to proceed in their businesse, to bring the same to good end, remoued from Drford, and on Christmas euen they came to St. Albons, and there staid that daie and the next.

The lords come to London with a great armie.

R. Richard keepeth his Christmas in the Tower of London. The lords send to the Duke and citizens of London to understand their meaning.

The Londoners in great perplexitie which part to take.

The Londoners incline to the lords.

On saint Stephens daie they toke their waie to London with an armie of fortie thousand men, as some write; & coming into the fields besides Clerkenwell, mustered their men, being diuided in three severall battels verie well appointed with armor and weapen, that it was a beautifull sight to behold them. The king kept his Christmas, not at Westminster, but in the Tower; not doubting but there to be defended what chance sooner should happen. The lords mistrusting the Londoners, lodged them with their people in the suburbs. They sent yet two knights, and two esquires, vnto the Duke and Aldermen of the citie, to understand whether they were minded to take part with them, or with the duke of Ireland, and his adherents, traitors (as they tearmed them) both to the king and the realme. The Londoners were now in no small feare and perplexitie, not knowing well what waie was best for them to take, weighing diuers perils; as first the kings displeasure, if they opened their gates vnto the lords; and if they shut them forth, they feared the indignation and wrath of the commons that were come thither with the lords, and were readie to breake downe their wals and gates, if they were neuer so little prouoked. Besides this, they stood most in doubt, least if the wealthiest citizens should not giue their consent to receiue the lords into the citie, the meaner sort, and such as wished rather to see some hurle burle than to continue in peace, would seke by force to set open the gates, and make waie for the lords and their people to enter, that they might make hauocke, and spoile whatsoeuer might be found of value in the rich mens houses.

These doubts with all the circumstances being well weighed and considered, the Duke Nicholas Cruton, and certeine of the chiefe men in the citie, went forth to the lords, and offered them to lodge in the citie at their pleasure, with all things necessarie as they should desire. The Duke canked also wine, ale, bread, and cheese, to be distributed among the armie, so as each one had part, which courtesie turned greatlie afterwarde to the commoditie of the citie. The lords upon search made, perceiuing that there was no guile meant by laing of men in ambushes within the citie to intrap them; or otherwise, but that all was sure enough and cleare without anie such craft meaning, they entred the citie and there abode quietly. Then went the archbishop of Canturburte and others betwixt the king and the lords to make peace betwixt them. But the king at the first seemed little to esseme the matter, saing to the archbishop; Well let them lie here with their great multitudes of people hardlie till they haue spent all they haue, and then I trust they will returne poore enough and needie, and then I doubt not but I shall talke with them; and bide the matter so as iustice maie require.

The lords being informed hereof, were marvellouslie moued, and swore that they would not depart till they had spoken with him face to face, and forthwith they sent part of their companies to watch the Thames, for feare the king should scape their hands, and then laugh them to scorn. When the king then perceiued himselfe to be inclosed on each side, he talked esthones with the archbishop and his allocats that were messengers betwixt him and the lords, willing them to declare to the lords that he would be contented to treat with them in reasonable order; whereupon they required that he should on the morrow next insuing come vnto Westminister, where he should understand their demands. When the king heard that, he refused to come vnto Westminister, but willed that they should come to him there in the Tower. The lords sent him word againe, that the Tower was a place to be suspected, for that they might there be surprisid by some guilefull practise devised to intrap them. The king herevnto made answer, that they might send some two hundred men, or so manie as they should thinke good, to make a thorough search, whether they needed to feare anie such thing; and this accordingly was done: they hauing the keies of the gates and of all the strong chambers, turrets, and places within the Tower sent vnto them.

On the fridaie, the duke of Gloucester, the earls of Derby, and Nottingham, came to the king, where he was set in a pavillion richlie arraied; and after their humble salutations done, and some talke had betwixt them, they went at the kings request with him into his chamber, where they recited vnto him the conspiracie of their aduersaries, through which they had ben indicted. They also shewed forth the letters which he had sent to the duke of Ireland, to leaue an armie vnto their destruction. Likewise the letters, which the French king had written to him, containing a safe conduct for him to come into France, there to confirme things to the diminishing of his honor, to the decaye of his power, & losse of his fame. ¶ During the time of this communication also, the earle of Derby desired the king to behold the people that were assembled in sight before the Tower, for the preservation of him and his realme: which he did, and maruelling to see such a goodlie armie and strength, as he declared to them no lesse, the duke of Gloucester said vnto him; Sir this is not the tenth part of your willing subiects that haue risen to destroye those false traitors, that haue misled you with their wicked and naughtie counsell.

The king being brought to his wits end, aswell with those things which the lords had charged him with, as otherwise with the sight of that great multitude itude of people, seemed greatlie amazed. Whereby-on the lords, under condition that the next daie he should come to Westminster to heare moze of their minds, and to conclude further for the behoofe of the common-wealth of the realme, began to take leaue of him, meaning so to depart: but the king desired them to tarrie all night with him and the queene. The duke thinking to make all sure, made excuse that he durst not be absent from all those folks, which they had brought with them, for feare that some disorder might arise, either in the armie, or in the citie: yet at the kings instance, the earles of Nottingham and Derbie tarried there all night. The king before his going to bed, was quite turned concerning his determination and promise made to go the next daie to Westminster, through such whispering tales as was put into his eares, by some that were about him, telling him that it stood neither with his safetie, nor honour, so lightlie to agree to depart from the towre, unto such place as the lords had thus appointed him, to serue moze for their purpose than for suertie of his person.

When the lords therefore understood that he would not keepe promise with them, they were greatlie offended, inso much as they sent him flat word, that if he would not come (according to promise) they would suertie chose another king, that would and ought to obey the faithfull counsell of his lords. The king with this message being touched to the quicke, to satisfie their minds, and to avoid further perill, removed the next morning unto Westminster, where the lords comming before his presence, after a little other talke, they declared unto him, that aswell in respect of his owne honour, as the commoditie & wealth of his kingdom, it was behouefull, that such traitors, and most wicked & slanderous persons, as were nothing profitable, but hurtfull to him, and his louing subiects, should be removed out of his court; and that other that both could and would serue him moze honorable and faithfullie were placed in their comes.
The king, although soze against his mind, when he saw how the lords were bent, and that he wanted power to withstand their pleasures, condescended to do what they would haue him.

So when he had granted thereto, they iudged that Alexander Beuill archbishop of Poike, John Four-ham bishop of Durham lord treasurer, Thomas Rushoke a frier of the order of the preachers, bishop of Chichester, and confessor to the king, were worthy to be auoided the court. But the archbishop of Poike, and the bishop of Chichester would abide no recho-nings, but got them out of the waie, and fled, it was not knowne whither. The lords did expell out of the court the lord Zouch of Haringworth, the lord Burnell, the lord Beaumont, Albyen de Tier, Baldwin de Beresford, Richard Aderburie, John Mowth, Thomas Clifford, and John Louell knights. These were dismissed out of the court, and removed from the king, but not discharged, for they were constrained to put in suerties to appeare at the next parlement.
There were also certeine ladies expelled the court, as those that were thought to do much harme about the king, to wit, the ladie Poimings, wife to John Mowth of Powen, and the ladie Moulunge, with others, which also found suerties to answer at the next par-lement, to all such things as might be objected against them. Moreover there were arrested and committed to severall prisons, Sir Simon Barlie, William Cunham, John Beauchampe of Holt steward of the kings house, Sir John Saltsburie, Sir Thomas Trivet, Sir James Barneis, Sir Nicholas Wagworth, and Sir Nicholas Barmby knights. Also Richard Clifford, John Lincolne, Richard Pittford the kings chappellains, and Nicholas de Blake draper of the kings chappell, whose word might too much in the court. There was also apprehended John Blake an apprentice of the law: all which persons were kept in strict ward till the next parlement, in which they were appointed to stand vnto their triall and answers.

Shortly after, to wit, the morrow after the Purfication of our ladie, the parlement began, the which was named the parlement that brought wonders.
The king would gladlie haue prologed the time of this parlement, if by any means he might. The lords came to the same parlement, with a sufficient armie for their owne safeties. On the first day of this parlement, were arrested as they sat in their places, all the iustices (except Sir William Skipworth) as Sir Roger Fulthorp, Sir Robert Belknap, Sir John Carie, Sir John Holt, Sir William Bzoke, and John Aloton the kings sergent at law, all which were sent to the towre, and there kept in severall places.
The cause whie they were thus apprehended, was for that, where in the last parlement, diuerse lords were made gouernours of the realme, both by the assent of the same parlement, and also by the aduise and counsell of all the iustices then being, and indentures tripartite thereof made, of the which one part reman-ned with the king, an other with the lords so chosen to gouerne the realme, and the third part with the iusti-ces: and yet notwithstanding, the said iustices at a counsell holden at Nottingham (as yee haue heard before) did go contrarie to that agreement. Whereby-on it was now determined, that they should make answer to their doings.

Moreover, in the beginning of this parlement, were openlie called Robert Tier duke of Ireland, Alexander Beuill archbishop of Poike, Michael de la Pole earle of Suffolke, Sir Robert Trissilian lord chefe iustice of England, to answer Thomas of Woodstoke duke of Gloucester, Richard earle of Ar-rundell, Henrie earle of Derby, and Thomas earle of Nottingham, vpon certeine articles of high treason, which these lords did charge them with. And forsomuch as none of these appeared, it was ordeined by the whole assent of the parlement, that they should be banished for euer, and their lands and goods mouea-ble and immoueaible to be forfeit and seized into the kings hands, their lands intailed onelie excepted.
Shortly after was the lord chiefe iustice, Robert Trissilian found in an apothecaries house at Westminster, lurking there, to understand by spies dailie what was done in the parlement: he was descried by one of his owne men, and so taken and brought to the duke of Gloucester, who caused him forthwith the same daie to be had to the towre, and from thence by water to Tiberne, and there hanged.

On the morrow after, Sir Nicholas Barmby, that sometime had bene maior of London, was brought forth to iudgement and condemned, although he had manie friends that made sute to saue his life. This man had done manie oppressions within the citie of London (as was reported.) In his maiortie, he caused great & monstrous stocks to be made to imprison men therein, and also a common are to strike off the heads of them which should resist his will and pleasure, for he was so highlie in the kings fauour, that he might do what he would. And the report went, that he had caused eight thousand or moze to be indicted, which before had taken part with the lords, intending to haue put them all to death, if God had not shortened his daies. Manie other euill fauoured reports went abroad of him, as that he meant to haue changed the name of London, and to haue named it little Troie, of which citie baptised with that new name, he purposed to be intituled duke. But these were forged rumors deuised and spread abroad in these daies, as many other were, partly by the vaine imagination of the people, and partly of purpose, to bring those whom the king favoured further out of the peoples liking. But now touching sir Nicholas Hambray: in the end being thus called to answer his transgressions, he was found guilty, and had judgement, neither to be hanged, nor drawne, but to be beheaded with his owne axe which before he had deuised: serving him herein as Phalaris the tyrant sometime serued Perillus, the inuentor of that exquisite torment of the brasen bull, wherein the offender being put (and the counterfet beast by force of fier made glowing hot) hauing his tong first cut out, through extremitie of paine made a bellowing alwaies as he cried, as if it had bene the verie noise of a naturall bull. Of which strange torment Perillus himselfe first tasted, suffering death by an engine of his owne deuising, which he thought should haue purchased him a good liuing, whereof the poet saith:

After this, sir John Salisburie, & sir James Ber-keis, both knights and lustie yong men, were by judgement of parlement drawne and hanged. Then solowed John Beauchampe of the Holt, lord steward of the kings house, that had serued king Edward the third, and his sonne Lionel duke of Clarence: who likewise by decree of this parlement was drawne and hanged. Also John Blake, squier, who in an infortunate houre stood against the lords in the court-cell at Nottingham, was now drawne and hanged, and so was one Thomas Wike. Last of all (as some hold, first of all) was sir Simon Burle beheaded, although the earle of Derby did what he could to saue his life, by reason whereof, great dissention rose betwixt the said earle, and the duke of Gloucester: for the duke being a sore and a right seuerer man, might not by any meanes be removed from his opinion and purpose, if he once resolved upon any matter.
Some spite he bare (as was thought) towards the said sir Simon Burle, both as well for the faithfull friendship, which was growne betwixt the duke of Ireland, and the said sir Simon, as also for that he looked to haue had such offices and romes which sir Simon inuied, by the kings gracions fauour and grants thereof to him made, as the Wardenship of the cinque ports, and constableness of the castell of Doner, and the office of high chamberleine.

Sir Simon
Burle.

But now, because of all these which were condemned and executed at this parlement, in our common chronicles there is least written; and in Froissard, and diuerse priuate pamphlets I haue read most of this sir Simon, I haue thought good to set downe some part of his life, so large as this volume may well beare; although a great deale more bycise than where I found it. This sir Simon was the son of sir John Burle knight of the garter, and brought vp in his youth vnder his kinsman doctor Walter Burle, who (as in the latter end of king Edward the third you haue heard) was one of the chiefe that had charge in the bringing vp of the Blacke prince, eldest sonne to the said king Edward. By this occasion he grew into such fauour with the prince, that afterwards the said prince committed vnto him the gouernance of his sonne Richard of Burdeaur, who as he was of a gentle and courteous nature, began then to conceiue so great loue and liking towards him, that when he came to the crowne and was king, he aduanced him highly to great honours and promotions, in somuch that at onetime & other he was made knight of the garter, constable of Doner, lord Warden of the cinque ports, lord chamberleine, earle of Huntington, and also one of the priue counsell to the king.

* Abr. Fl. out of Henric Knight-
ton, fol. 191.

Neither was there any thing done concerning the affaires appertaining vnto the state without his counsell, appointment, and direction, wherein he so much favoured and leaned to the partie of the duke of Ireland, that he was sore enuied, and greatlie hated of diuerse of the rest of the nobilitie, speciallie of the kings vnckle the duke of Gloucester, who vpon malice that he bare to the man, not so much for his owne demeanour, as for his allies, and peraduenture for desire of his romes, more than of his life, caused him to be accused of diuerse offenses against the crowne, realme, and church; namelie, for that he had (as they surmized against him) spoiled and waisted the kings treasure, and withholden the paie of the souldiers and men of warre, whereupon he was arrested, called to account, & hauing no clerke allowed him to make vp the same, was found in arrears ages 230000 franks.

And although for one part thereof he demanded allowance of monie, which he had defraied and laid out in Almaine, and in Boheme, about the kings marriage, and for the residue desired daies of payment, yet he could obtaine neither. Further, he was accused that the duke of Ireland and he had gathered great summes of monie, conueied the same to Doner, and from thence sent it in the night by sea into Ger-manie.

Lastlie, the archbishop (forsooth) and the monks of Canturburie charged him that he sought the means to remoue the shiue of the archbishop Thomas, otherwise called Thomas Becket, from Canturburie vnto Doner, vnder a colour of feare, least the French men being assembled in Flanders to inuade England, should land in Kent and take Canturburie, and spoil it, where indeed (as they surmized against him) he meant to send it ouer the seas vnto the king of Boheme. Whereupon he was first committed to the tower, and before the king or his other friends could procure his deliuerance, he was without law or iustice, before any of the residue (as some hold) brought forth and beheaded on the tower hill, by commandement of the duke of Gloucester, and other of his fac-on, quite contrarie to the kings will or knowledge, in somuch that when he vnderstood it, he spake manie sore words against the duke, affirming that he was a wicked man, and worthe to be kept shorter, sith vnder a colour of doing iustice, he went about to de-stroye curie god and honest man. The king was also offended with the duke of Yorke, for his brothers presumptuous doings, though the said duke of Yorke being verelie a man of a gentle nature, wished that the state of the common-wealth might haue bene re-dressed without losse of any mans life, or other cruell dealing: but the duke of Gloucester, and diuerse other of the nobilitie, the lesse that they passed for the kings threatening speech, so much more were they readie to punish all those whom they toke to be their enemies. In deed the said sir Simon Burle was thought to beare himselfe more losse, by reason of the kings fauour, than was requisite, which procured him enuie of them, that could not abide others to be in any condition their equals in authoritie.

It should appeare by Froissard, that he was first of all, in the beginning of these stris betwixt the king and the lords, committed to the tower, and notwithstanding all the spite that either the king, or the duke of Ireland, or any other of his friends could make for him, by the duke of Gloucesters commandement he was cruelly beheaded, so greatlie to the offense of the king, and those that were his true counsellors, that thereupon the king caused the duke of Ireland the soner to assemble an armie against the said duke and his complices, thereby to restrain their presumptuous proceedings. But whether he was thus at the first or last executed, to please the king the better, now at this parlement, amongst others that were condemned

demned in the same: his lands were given to the king, a great part whereof he afterwards disposed to diverse men as he thought expedient. But yet in the parliament holden in the one and twentieth yeare of this kings reigne, the act of attainder of the said sir Simon was repealed: and at an other parliament holden in the second yeare of king Henrie the fourth, all his lands which then remained vngrented and vnsold, were restored to sir John Burle knight, sonne and heire of sir Roger Burle, brother to the said Simon, of whom lineallie is descended Thomas Cins elquier, now secretaire to the quenes maiesties counsell in the north parts. And thus far touching sir Simon Burle, of whom manie reports went of his disloyall dealings towards the state, as partlie ye haue heard, but how trulie the lord knoweth. Among other slanderous tales that were spied abroad of him, one was that he consented to the deliuering of Dover castell by the kings appointment to the Frenchmen for monie. But as this was a thing not like to be true, so (no doubt) manie things that the persons aforesaid, which were executed, had bene charged with, at the least by common report among the people, were nothing true at all; although happilie the substance of those things, for which they died, might be true in some respect.

Sir William Elmham that was charged also for withrawing of the soldiers wages, discharged himselfe thereof, and of all other things that might be laid to his charge. As touching the iustices, they were all condemned to death by the parlement, but such meanes was made for them vnto the quene, that she obtained pardon for their liues. But they forfeited their lands and goods, and were appointed to remaine in perpetuall exile, with a certeine portion of monie to them assigned for their daillie sustentation: the names of which iustices so condemned to exile were these, Robert Welknap, John Holt, John Craie, Roger Fulthorpe, William Burgh, and John Lokton. Finally, in this parlement was an oth required and obtained of the king, that he should stand vnto and abide such rule and order as the lords should take: and this oth was not required onelie of the king, but also of all the inhabitants of the realme. ¶ In these troubles was the realme of England in these daies, and the king brought into that case, that he ruled not, but was ruled by his vncles, and other to them associat.

In the latter end of this eleuenth yeare was the earle of Arundell sent to the sea with a great manie of ships and men of warre. There went with him in this iourne, of noble men, the earles of Potingham & Devonshire, sir Thomas Percie, the lord Clifford, the lord Camois, sir William Elmham, sir Thomas Porter, sir John Daubreticourt, sir William Shel lie, sir John Warwicke or Berthwicke, sir Stephan de Liberie, sir Robert Sere, sir Peter Montberie, sir Lewes Clanbow, sir Thomas Coque or Coke, sir William Paulie or Paulet, & diuerse others. There were a thousand men of armes, and three thousand archers. The purpose for which they were sent, was to haue asked the duke of Britaine (if he would haue re ceined them) being then efflonces run into the French kings displeasure, for the imprisoning of the lord Clifton constable of France.

But after that (contrarie to expectation) the duke of Britaine was come to an agreement with the French king, the earle of Arundell drew with his manie alongst the coasts of Poitou, and Saintonge, till at length he arrived in the haven that goeth vp to Rochell, and landed with his men at Sparrant, foure leagues from Rochell, and began to pilfer, spoile, and seth booties abroad in the countrie. The Frenchmen within Rochell issued forth to skirmish with the Englishmen, but they were easilie put to flight, and solow

ed euen to the barriers of the gates of Rochell. ¶ Perrot le Bernois a capteine of Gascoigne, that made warre for the king of England in Limosin, and lay in the fortreffe of Calusset, came forth the same time, and made a roade into Berrie with foure hundred spears. The earle of Arundell, after he had laine at Sparrant fiftene daies, returned to his ships, and finally came backe into England, and Perrot le Bernois likewise returned to his fortreffe. ¶ About the same time was a truce taken betwixt the parties English and French on the marches of Aquitaine, to begin the first daie of August, and to indure till the first of Aprill next ensuing.

¶ In this yeare 1388, in Lent, the Scots entred into the westerne borders, & what with killing as also with burning they did much mischief. Whereouer they thewed extreme crueltie against young children and sucklings, against women bigge with child and in trauell, against weake and wearie men and crooked with age, in the countrie of Gilsland, within the lordship of the lord Dacres, gathering them together into houses, and shutting them vp, and locking the doores, they burned without mercie or pitie to the number (as it was said) of two hundred and aboue.

This yeare in August, the Scots innaded the countrie of Northumberland, and at Otterburne ouerthrew a power of Englishmen, which the earle of Northumberland and his sonnes had leauied against them. In this battell the earle Douglas chiefe of that armie of Scots was laine, and the lord Henrie Percie, and his brother sir Ralfe, sonnes to the said earle of Northumberland, were taken prisoners, as in the Scottish chronicles ye may read more at large. After the feast of the nativitie of our ladie, a parlement was holden at Cambridge, in the which diuerse statutes were ordeined; as for the limiting of seruants wages; for punishment of vagaband persons; for the inhibiting of certeine persons to weare weapons; for the debarring of vnlawfull games; for maintenance of shooting in the long bow; for remouing of the skayle of woles from Middleburgh vnto Calis; for labourers not to be receiued, but where they are inhabiting, except with licence vnder seale of the hundred where they dwell. There was also an act made, that none should go forth of the realme, to purchase antic benefice with cure or without cure, except by licence obtained of the king; and if they did contrarie herevnto, they were to be excluded out of the kings protection. There was granted to the king in this parlement, a tenth to be leuied of the clergie, and a fiftenth of the laitie. Whereouer, during the time of this parlement, as sir Thomas Triuet was riding towards Warnewell with the king, where the king lodged, by forcing his horse too much with the spurs, the horse fell with him so rudelie to the ground, that his entrails within him were so burst and perished, that he died the next daie after. Manie reioised at this mans death, as well for that men iudged him to be exceeding haughty and proud; as also for that he was suspected not to haue dealt iustlie with the bishop of Exeter, in the iourne which the bishop had made into Flanders: but speciallie men had an ill opinion of him, for that he stood with the king against the lords, counselling him in the yeare last past to dispatch them out of the way.

¶ Sir John Holland, the kings brother on the mothers side, that was latelie returned out of Spaine, where he had bene with the duke of Lancaster, was now made earle of Huntingdon. ¶ In Julie, whiles the king was at Shene, there swarmed together in his court great multitudes of flies and gnats, insomuch that in maner of skirmishing they incountered each other; and making great slaughters on both sides, were in the end swept a waie.

waie from the place where they lay dead, with byrthes and brecons by heaps. This was deemed an unluckie prognosticat of some mischief like to fall vpon the necke of the land.

Also in this twelfth peare, were commissioners appointed to met at Balingham, betwixt Calis and Bullongne, to treat a truce to be had betwixt the realmes of England, France and Scotland. Walter Skirlow bishop of Durham, that had bene latelie before remoued from Bath vnto Durham, from whence John Foxdham had bene translated vnto Ely, was sent as head commissioner for the king of England, and with him were ioined sir John Clan-bow, and sir Nicholas Dagworth, knights, and Richard Kothale clerke, a doctor of law. By Frois-sard it appeareth that the earle of Salisburie was one, and sir Thomas Beauchampe lord deputie of Calis appointed likewise as an assistant with them. The bishop of Bature, the lord Valeran earle of S. Poule, sir Guillam de Melin, sir Nicholas Bzacque, and sir John le Mercier came thither for the French king.
And for the king of Scots there appeared the bishop of Aberdeine, sir James and sir David Lindsey, and sir Walter Sankler, knights. After long treatie, and much a do, at length a truce was concluded to begin at Midsummer next, and to last thre years after.

In this peare of Grace 1389, in the Lent time, there spang a pitifull strife in Oxford, the variance in the peare before being not fullie allaid, but both sides alwaies prouoking ech other. For the Welsh scholars being euermore quarelous, and hauing the southerlie scholars taking their parts, rose against the scholars of the north, so that to and fro manie a deablie mischief happened betwene them. In the end, this strife did so increase, that there was a daie of skirmish appointed and agreed vpon by both sides to be tried in the field. But by the meanes of Thomas of Woodstocke duke of Gloucester all this sturre was appeased, and manie of the Welsh scholars bannished from the vniuersitie. On the thursdaie before Easter (being mawndae thursdaie) the lord Beaumont gardian of Carleill in the west marches entred Scotland for tie leagues, and spoiling Folwike, made wast at his pleasure, and brought a waie with him manie Scots prisoners and captiues. About this time a truce of thre years was taken betwene king Richard, the kings of France, Scotland, Spaine, Portingale, and of Nauarre. This truce began on the first daie of August in the nether parts of the realme both by sea and land; and on the fiftenth of August in the further parts, because knowledge could not be giuen thereof without some long time.

Whilest the commissioners were occupied in the marches betwixt Calis and Bullongne about this truce, the Scots entring into Northumberland, did much mischief, leading a waie manie prisoners, men and women, besides other great booties and pries which they got abroad in the countie. The lord Thomas Holobraie earle of Nottingham was sent with five hundred spears to reuenge those attempts of the enemies: but for that his power was small in comparison to theirs, he preuailed little or nothing against them. Sir John Clanbow, and sir Richard Kothale clerke, took the French kings oth; and the earle of Saint Paule that had married the ladie Maud Courtneie with other noblemen, came into England, and received the kings oth here for the confirming of this last mentioned truce. The Scots might not without much adoe be persuaded to accept this truce, being readie the same time with an armie to enter into England, but yet through the diligence of such Frenchmen as went thither for that purpose, at length they agreed.

This peare the king by counsell of some that were about him, called the nobles and great men of the realme together, and as they were set in the councill chamber staing till he came: at length he entring into the same chamber, and taking his place to sit among them, demanded of them, of what age he was now? Wherefo answer was made, that he was full twentie years old. Then (said he) I am of years sufficient to gouerne mine owne house and familie, and also my kingdome: for it seemeth against reason that the state of the meanest person within my kingdome should be better than mine. Euerie heire that is once come to the age of twentie years, is permitted, if his father be not liuing, to order his businesse himselfe: then that thing which is permitted to enerie other person of meane degree by law, why is the same denied vnto me? These words vttered he with the courage of a prince, not without the indignation and setting on of such as were about him, whose drift was by discountenancing others to procure preferment to themselves, abusing the kings tender years and greene wit, with ill counsell for their advantage: where as it had bene more mete to haue giuen him those precepts which Claudianus hath in his tract of the institution of a prince; and among others this:

Non tibi quid liceat, sed quid fecisse decebit Occurrat, mentemq; domet respectus honesti.

Claudian.

When the barons had hard the words of the king, being therewith asloned, they made answer, that there should be no right abridged from him, but that he might take vpon him the gouernment as of reason was due. Well said he, yee know that I haue bene a long time ruled by tutors, so as it hath not bene lawfull to me to doe arie thing, were it of neuer so small importance, without their consents.
Now therefore I will, that they meddle no further with matters pertaining to my gouernment, after the maner of an heire come to lawfull age, I will call to my councill such as pleasest me, and I will deale in mine owne businesse my selfe. And therefore I will first that the chancelor resigne to me his seale.
When the archbishop of Yorke (who in the peare last past had bene remoued from Ely vnto Yorke, and Alexander Nevill displaced) had deliuered vnto him the seale, the king receiuing it of him, put it in his bosome, and suddenlie rising, departed forth of the chamber, and after a little while returning, sat do-wne againe, and deliuered the seale to the bishop of Winchester, William Wickham, and so made him chancelor, although soe against the same bishops will.
He made also manie other new officers, removing the old, and vsed in all things his owne discretion and authoritie. The duke of Gloucester, the earle of Marwike, and other honorable and worthie men, were discharged and put from the councill, and others placed in their romes, such as pleased the king to appoint.
At the same time he made five new iustices.

Of this assuming the regiment to himselfe, as di-uerse diuerse report: so Henric Knighton a man liuing in those daies, and committing to writing the occurents of that tumultuous time, saith as followeth. In the moneth of Maie, the king held a councill at Westminster, and in the feast of the Inuention of the crosse, comming personallie to the councill house he remoued all the great officers (contrarie to expectation and thinking) from their offices, and at his pleasure placed in their romes thome he list. He remoued the archbishop of Yorke lord chancelor, and put in his place the bishop of Winchester; he remoued the bishop of Hereford lord treasurer, and put another in his place: he remoued the clerke of the privie seale, and all other: so likewise did he the iustices of either bench. But least the affaires of the realme should in the meane while be hindered, he commanded the iustices of law to follow and procute things requisite as they were wont, till such time as he was better advised touching the prouiding of other iustices. The erle of Arundell likewise, vnto whome the government of the parlement was committed, and the admiraltie of the sea, was removed; and the earle of Huntington put in his come. In like sort dealt the king with the residue of his officers, saying that he ought not to be inferior in degree of lesse account than an other ordinarie heire whatsoever within the realme of England; sith the law and custome of the realme of England auereth, that euerie heire being in the gardianship of anie lord, when he is growne to be one and twentie yeares of age, ought presentlie to intoy the inheritance left him by his father, and is lawfullie to possesse his patrimonie, and frelie to dispose and order his owne goods and chattels to his liking. But now it is come to passe, that I thus manie yeares haue liued vnder your counsell and gouernement; and now first to God, secondlie to you, I giue manifold thanks, that you haue gouerned and supported me, mine inheritance, and my realme of England, as well within as without, specially against our enemies round about vs, all renoume of honour and praise to vs and our kingdome alwaies safelie reserved. But now God hath so dealt for vs, that we are of full age, so that we are two and twentie yeares old at this present: and we require that we may frelie and at libertie from this time forward rule and gouerne both our felnes and our inheritance; and we will haue our kingdome in our owne hands, and officers and scrutours of our owne appointing at our pleasure; secondlie, as shall seme to vs more auailable, by Gods grace, to elect, chose, and preferre vnto officers such as we doo well like of, and at our pleasure to remoue such as be presentlie resiant, and in their romes to substitute and set others wherefoener and whomfoener we list. The king hauing thus spoken, there was not one that went about to breake him of his will, but they all glorified God, who had prouided them such a king, as was likelie to proue discreet and wise.

In this season, the followers of Wickliffes doctrine maruellouslie increased, specially in the diocesse of Sarum, where they had manie that toke vpon them as ministers, both to preach the word, and to dispense the sacraments. This they did in secret: but they were discouered by one that had bene of their fellowship, who declared to the bishop of Salisbury at his manor of Sonning, all the whole circumstances thereof, as he knew. There were of them that preached in those daies earnestlie against pilgimages, calling such images as the people had in most veneration, as that at Walsingham, and the rood of the north dore at Paules in London, rotten stocks, and boorne eaten blocks, through which the unskillfull people being mocked and deceived, were compelled most manifestlie to commit idolatrie. The bishops (saith Thomas Walsingham) hearing, beholding, and knowing these things with much more, to be true, did little or nothing to redresse the same, save onlie the bishop of Norwich who stirred coles, swearing and stating, that if anie of that sect presumed to preach anie peruerse doctrine within his diocesse, he would cause them either to hop headlesse, or to fire a sagot for it: he was therefore not a little praised and extolled by the monks and other religious men (as should appeare) for that his zeale.

In November, the duke of Lancaster came forth of Calcoigne into England, after he had remained first in Spaine, and after in Calcoigne, thre yeares together. Of this successe in Spaine is spoken before, a likewise of the agreement betwixt the king of Castile, & the said duke, which was not in all points confirmed, till a little befoze his returne now into England. About the same time the king had called a council of his nobilitie at Reading, to the which the duke of Lancaster made the more hast to come, because he knew that the king would shew no good countenance to some of the noblemen; and therefore he doubted least malicious offenses might arise betwixt them, which to appease he meant the best he could, and his trauell came to good effect: for he did so much, that as well the king as the lords departed from the council as frends, the lords taking their leaues of him in louing manner, and he courteouslie bidding them farewell: and so each of them resorted vnto their homes well pleased for that present. The king held his Christmalle this yere at Woodstoke, and the duke of Lancaster laie at his castell of Hertford.

At the same time the lord John de Hastings earle of Penbroke, as he was practising to learne to iust, though mishap was stricken about the priue parts, by a knight called sir John S. John, that ran against him, so as his inner parts being perished, death presentlie followed. The losse of this earle was greatlie bemoaned by men of all degrees, for he was liberall, gentle, humble, and courteous to each one, aboue all the other yong lords in the land of his time. Of this earles ancelfors this is reported for a thing strange and maruelous, that from the daies of Aimer de Valence earle of Penbroke, that was one amongst other that sat in iudgement of Thomas earle of Lancaster, there was not anie earle of Penbroke succeeding the same Aimer de Valence, vnto the daies of this yong earle by misfortune thus slaine, that euer saw his father, nor yet anie of their fathers might reioise in the sight of anie of their somes, being still called hence, befoze the time came for them to do.

Now here, because this John Hastings, being the last of that surname and armes of the whole blood, which of that line intioed anie title of honor, I thinke it not unfit for this place (since other occasion will not be giuen therefore) to talke of the Hastings somewhat higher than this man: though not from the shell to perpetuate the memorie of them, the which I haue now done, least otherwile by ingrate obliuion it might neuer hereafter come to light. In which I will not begin from the first honourable Hastings, whose blood by manie descents continued, is thought by most ancient monuments, which I haue seene and read, to haue bene a baron befoze the conquest in this land, and to haue borne the same coe in the field, which this now slaine earle of Penbroke did: whereof hereafter in my descriptions and lines of the earles of Penbroke I will make more ample discourse in a new booke (if God giue good successe therein) onelie at this time making some small repetition from that Henrie Hastings, from whome the Hastings (in respect of the mariage of Alda daughter to Danie earle of Huntington, brother to William king of Scots) did descend: who (amongst others) in the reigne of Edward the first, made title to the kingdom of Scotland. The originall of which name in this treatise I will neither flatteringlie defend, nor obstinatlie reiect, to haue growne from Hastings the Dane, who in the reigne of Alured (long befoze the conquest, about the yere of our redemption 890) came with Hollo into England, and for a certaine space infested this nation, departing aside to France. And now to the purpose,

Henrie lord Hastings (who bare for his armes gold a manche gules) married Alda (or Ada) the fourth daughter of Dauid earle of Huntington, she being one of the heires to John Scot earle of Chester, & of Huntington (which died without issue) son of the said Dauid, and brother to the said Ada. To this Henrie and and Ada did Henrie the third king of England, in the two & twentieth of his reigne (in place of the portion of hir brothers lands, which should haue descended to hir as parcell of the earledome of Chester, for that the king would not haue the said earledome diuided amongst distaues) giue in exchange certeine lands mentioned in this deed following.

The grant of Henrie the third, to Henrie Hastings and Ada his wife, for the exchange of lands for hir part of the earledome.

Strattondale.

The which manours the said Henrie and Ada did hold during the life of the said Ada, in peaceable and quiet possession. After hir death the said Henrie goeth into Gascoigne, where he remained stewart untill the coming of Henrie the third, at what time the said Henrie surrendered his office, but the king importunate with him still to retaine the same, he flatly denied it, and would no longer remaine there, suddenly returning into England without licence or knowledge of the king, for which contempt the king grievously incensed, in reuenge and for satisfaction of the same, made the same lands to be extended by Thomas Passew and others, who by the kings proccesse extended part thereof to a treble value, after which extent returned into the chancerie, the king seized the manour of Bemesgraue, Bolsoure, Strattondale in Poxton, & left in his hands the manours of Lerton, Owardbecke, Cundoner, Mountfeld, and Wiggutton, whereof the said Henrie died seized. Two yeares before which grant of the lands before said to this Henrie, to wit, in the twentieth yeare of Henrie the third, the said Henrie Hastings made his petition to serue in the pantrie (as he was bound by tenure) at the coronation of euerie prince, the record whereof in the ancient written booke of the earls of Huntingdon, is in these words following.

The record by which Henrie Hastings executed the office of the pantrier.

Vicesimo Henr. tertij quo coronata fuit regina Elionara filia Hugonis comitis Provinciae a-pu'd Westm. facta sunt contentiones magna de seruitijs ministrabilibus, & de iuribus pertinentibus ad eorum ministeria, sed respectuatur, iuribus singulis saluis, ut tumultus requiesceret usque ad quinquena Pascha sequentis, &c. Et Henricus de Hastings, cuius officium seruendi de mappis a veteri vendicauit officium illud, & habuit. Nam quamuis Thurstanus vendicauit officium illud, asserens suum esse debere a veteri, tamen rex repulsat, & admisit Henricum de Hastings, ea die assignans eisdem diem de contentione finienda ad praedictum terminum. Extractas vero post prandium mapas tanquam suas ad officium pertinentes recepit.

This Henrie had by Ada his wife, his sonne & heire Henrie Hastings, from whence Buchanan doth saie that Henrie Hastings now earle of Penbrooke is descended, whereof I will not now here dispute.

20 Henrie Hastings knight, sonne of Henrie, after the death of his father, finding himselfe grieved that the inheritance, which should haue descended vnto him from his mother, was so withhelden from him for the offense of his father, contrarie to law and iustice, and without iudgement, but by the kings power, pursued a bill against the king, thereby to haue remedie and restitution, for the supposed false returne of the extent which was made against his father; and vpon the same bill, this Henrie Hastings obtained a new writ to make a fresh extent directed to master Thomas of Wilmundham, Robert de la Laie, Robert de Solham, Hugh Pache, & Thomas de Wyate, to vnderstand if the remnant of the lands to him descended, beside that by the king extended, would counteruaile the value of such lands as he should haue by descent from and of the earle and earledome of Chester, which matter neuer being ended in his time, was afterward prosecuted of the Hastings from parliament to parliament, vntill the thirte fourth yeare of Edward the first, as moze plainelie shall after appeare. Of this Henrie, Hollingshed intreateth much in the reigne of Henrie the third: this man (being he that in the time of Edward the first, made title to the crowne of Scotland) married Ione one of the daughters of William Cantulpe lord of Aburganie, in the right of Cua, one of the daughters and heires of William Bewsa or Bretwala, for I find both written, of which Ione this Henrie had issue John Hastings his sonne and heire, Edmund which married Isabel, & had great possessions in Wales: Ada first married to Robert de Champane: Aza married to sir Thomas the sonne of sir John de Latimer, and Ione which was a nun at Rotingham.

John Hastings knight, sonne of the last Henrie, was borne at Allege, in the yere of our Lord 1262, and in the six & fortieth yeare of the reigne of Henrie the third. This man after his fathers death did (in the yeare of our Lord 1274, and the second yeare of the reigne of Edward the first, being the kings 60 ward) demand the execution of his office of the pantrie, at the coronation of queene Elia, wife to Edward the first, but could not execute the same by reason of his nonage, and also for that he was in ward to the said king. After, when he was growne to full yeares, there arose in the yeare of our Lord 1305, and in the thirte third yeare of the reigne of Edward the first, great contention betwene Antonie Beake bishop of Durham, this John Hastings, John Balfoll, and Robert Wyse, for the manors of Penrith, Castlesoure, Salghill regis, Lange Worthbie, Carlaton, and of Werthine Tinehale, whereof Henrie king of Scots (kinsman of the said Robert Wyse, John Balfoll, and John Hastings, whose heire they were) died seized in his demelne of fee. In which which sutes after manie belaites made, and manie summons against the said bishop, the plea went without daie, because the bishop must go to Rome. But after his returne the sute being retained and continued, it went once more without daie, because the king seized the same into his hands, and held it all the time of his reigne. These things thus done, and Edward the first departed, this John Hastings as yet not hastie to renew his sute of the land, but rather to execute his right of the pantrie, did in the first yeare of Edward the second, demand the executing of that office, at the coronation of the said Edward the second, and Isabell his wife at Westminster, which he obtained, and laid the clothes and napkins in the great hall by him and other his knights, one the tables whereat the king, the quene, and other great states should dine, which (according as I have seene noted) was in this sort.

The order and number of clothes laied at the kings table, and how John Hastings had them for his fee.

Et dum fuerunt ad comestum, mappas per se & suos custodiebat, & post comestum illas trahebat, & deferre faciebat seruientes ad seruendum, & istas cum suis loquelis habebat sine voluntate vel cum voluntate, & eas detinebat per totum festum coronationis, licet petitione erant deliberatione, primo a senescallo regis, postea ab ipso rege, per quod idem rex precepit domino Willielmo Martini, & alijs senescallis suis, quod plenam & celerem iusticiam ei facerent, & deliberationem de mappis predictis si fuerit faciendum. Touching which it is thus further found in the same place. Henrie de Hastings tient en Alshley du roy per seruante de la panetre, fo. 57. Which petitions and all other petitions for his part of the land in the kings hands, by the reference made in the time of Henrie the 3, the said John Hastings lord of Aburgaunnie did pursue from parlement to parlement, untill the parlement holden at Pothe after Michaelmas, where supplication was made to the king, by him and others, that he might remaine with the king in Gascoigne, as his steward or marshal: which if he would performe, all his foresaid petitions and all other petitions which were reasonable, should be granted unto him. By occasion whereof he granted unto the kings and the nobles request: so that the king would find him pledges due therfore, and that he might obtaine iustice in his inheritances, and those his latefull sutes, which had bene hitherto denied unto him, which thing the king faithfullie promised in euerie respect to be performed towards him: whereupon he sailed into Gascoigne, in the yeare of Christ 1302, being the 31 of Edward the first, the Wednesday after the feast of S. Lucie. But for this faire shew, it seemeth he sped neuer the better: for which cause not being restored in the 34 yeare of Edward the first, he pursued his sute afresh, and had from the king at Pothe this definitive sentence, delivered by the mouth of Walter Langhton, then the kings treasurer (as I find by such notes as I have seene) that he should seeke the records of the chancrie, and bring them to the next parlement, which the said John did. At what time he brought forth the former grant of Henrie the third, of the said lands given in recompense of his part of the earldome of Chester. After which yet it was agreed by the king and his counsell for diuers considerations (and most like (as I suppose) because he had refused to serue in Gascoigne, and onelie went as it were enforced) notwithstanding all that the said John could alledge, that he should take nothing for his petition, but further to be in the kings mercie for his false claime: the whole processe whereof I have seene in an ancient written monument of French. All which (as I gather) was done in the life of Edward the first (notwithstanding that I have a little vnderlie before treated of the executing of his office of the pantrie at the coronation of Edward the second, sonne to Edward the first) as may be confirmed by Piers Langtoft in these verses:

Et pour peril escheuer toutz apres promist Re Leu de Hastings cheualier e li Emere de la brei barone ne pas petit Alant in Gascoigne touz sans contredit Pour la termie attendue del trevis auant dit.

This John married two wiues both called Isabell, whereof the first was Isabell de Valence, one of the daughters and heirs of William Valence earle of Pembroke & lord of Aburgaunnie, but how the said Wil. Valence came to the honor of Aburgaunnie, since William Cantelupe before named was once lord thereof, and much about that time, I can not yet certainlie learne. But yet I following god authority haue set downe this Valence to be lord of Aburgaunnie, & that he gaue the same to one John Hastings, which must needs be this man, marieng his daughter. The other wife of this John Hastings, was Isabell the daughter of Hugh Spenser earle of Winchester. By his first wife he had six children, to wit, John Hastings his heire, William Hastings that married Elianor the daughter of sir William Martin, which died without heires; Henrie Hastings that was a clerk, and Elizabeth Hastings married to Roger Grete lord of Ruthem tonne of sir John Grete, of whom is descended Henrie earle of Kent now living. Ione married to Edmund Mortimer, by whom she had no issue, being after married to William de Huntingfield, by whom she had Roger de Huntingfield: and Margaret Hastings married to William the sonne of William Martin lord of Remmes. By Isabell Spenser his second wife he had three children, to wit, Hugh Hastings lord of Foliot, Registrum comitum de Huntington.

Folliot, of whom shall be more intreated, when we come to the last John Hastings erle of Penbroke slaine at tilt, as before. Thomas Hastings, and Helagia de Huntington. His first wife Isabell Malence died 1305, being the 31 of Edward the first, and was buried at the frier minours in Couentrie. His second wife cuerliuing hir husband, was after married to sir Rafe Bonthermer, for which mariage the said Rafe was fined by Edward the second at a thousand marks, as appeareth in the rols of the chancery of 13 of Edward the second: she died the 9 of Edward the third, & was buried in the frier minours of Salisburie. This John Hastings departed this life 1313, the first yeare of the reigne of Edward the second.

John Hastings lord Hastings and Aburgauennie, was bozne in the fiftenth yeare of Edward the first, in the yeare of Christ 1287. For at the death of his father, which happened (as before) in the first yeare of Edward the second, he was found to be of the age of six & twentie years, which if it be added to the yeare of our Lord 1287, make by the full number of 1313, in which his father died. This man in the eight yeare of Edward the second at the parlement holden at London in the Carmelite friers, bring about the yeare from the birth of Christ 1314, renewing the sute to the king (after the death of Antonie Beke bishop of Durham, which happened in the yeare of our Lord 1310) for the lands, whereof his father had the said bishop in lute, and which were after seized into the kings hands, as before appeareth, in the life of his father. It was then found upon search, that sir John Ballioll (who was partie to the said sute before) had the realme of Scotland by award: by reason of certaine lands that he gaue to sir Antonie de Beke the bishop of Durham: for which cause it seemed king Edward the first seized the same lands into his hands as forfeit to him, in that they were after the maner of a byrbe giuen to the said bishop, to support the sute of the said John Ballioll for the obtaining of the crowne of Scotland. And for that cause this John Hastings was counselled by such as willed him well, that he should surceasse his sute, and so he did. This John Hastings married Julian the daughter of Thomas lord Leiburne the sonne of William lord Leiburne, and had by hir Laurence de Hastings: after which this John Hastings died in the eighteenth yeare of Edward the second, and in the yeare of our Lord 1325. His wife Julian lined manie yeeres after, and surrendered hir life in the fortie one yeare of Edward the third, and in the yeare of our Lord 1366.

Laurence Hastings lord Hastings and Aburgauennie, was also afterward earle of Penbroke, he was bozne about the thirteenth yeare of Edward the second, being also about the yeare of our redemption 1320: which is proued by this, that the said Laurence was five yeeres old at the death of his father, which (as before is said) happened in the yeare 1325, and in the eighteenth of Edward the second, at what time he was seized as the kings ward, and committed to the gouernement of tutors, appointed him by the said Edward the second. This Laurence Hastings for the nobilitie of his race, the actiuitie of him selfe, the largenesse of his possessions, and his familiaritie with the king, was created earle of Penbroke, about the one and thirtieth yeare of the reigne of king Edward the third. He married Anne or Agnes the third daughter of sir Roger Mortimer the first earle of March, by whom he had issue John Hastings.

John Hastings earle of Penbroke lord Hastings Aburgauennie and Weifford in Ireland, the sonne of Laurence Hastings the first earle of Penbroke of that name, did in the fortie one yeare of Edward the third, being about the yeare of our Lord 1369, insoffice diuerse persons of the manor of Lodgate in Suffolke, of which towne was John Lodgate the monke of Berie and famous poet of England named. After which in the fortie six yeare of Edward the third, and in the yeare of our Lord 1371, when the Frenchmen besieged Rochell, he was sent with an armie of men to the rescue of the same. But being set vpon by the Spanissh nanie in the haue of Rochell, they slue and toke manie of the English, burnt their nauie, and caried the earle with sundrie other prisoners into Spaine; where this earle a long time remained prisoner. Which misfortune was iustlie supposed to haue fallen vpon him, because he was a man of euill life, giuen greatlie to lecherie, an infringer of the liberties of the church, and a persuader of the king that he should (for his warres) more grieuouslie exact manie subsidies and contributions vpon the clergie than vpon the laitie. After that he had bene long prisoner in Spaine (by the space almost of thre yeares) he was ransomed for a great summe of monie, by Bertram Clethine, and died (as I conceiue by some sufficient proofe) betwene Paris and Calis, as he came into England, in the fortie ninth yeare of Edward the third, in the yeare of our Lord 1374: so that he neuer fullie paid his ransome. He had two wiues, Margaret the daughter of Edward the third, & Anne the daughter of sir Walter Manny and of Margaret Segraue made dutchesse of Northfolke in the time of Richard the second: but when he married these wiues, I can not certainlie find. And in the earle of Kents booke (which treateth of the contention of the Hastings and the Greies, for bearing of the armes of Hastings) there is no mention made (as farre as my memorie serueth) of the said Margaret; the reason whereof I suppose to be, for that this John Hastings had no issue by hir: and that booke onelic serued to conuieie a lineall descent from the Hastings to intitle the Greies. This John Hastings had by his second wife (Anne) a sonne called John Hastings, which after succeeded his father in all his inheritances.

But before I saie ante more of the Hastings, I thinke it not amisse to giue some warning of an error in Polydor of Vrbin, writing that Anne the countesse of Penbroke (wife to this man, for none of the earles of Penbrokes had ante wife so named with in the compasse of yeares therein Polydor appointeth this time) descended of a noble house of S. Paule in France, a woman of great vertue, and a louer of learning and of learned men, founded a house in Cambridge, to this date called Penbroke hall: which in truth was not builded by hir, but by Marie the wife of Adomare or Aimer de Malence earle of Penbroke, who was slaine at tilt in the one & twentie yeare of Edward the third, in the yeare of our Lord 1374: which was thirtie seauen yeares before the death of this John Hastings earle of Penbroke: which Marie was in berie deede the daughter of Guse earle of S. Paule, the kinswoman of Edward the third, and a French woman. This woman being in one date (that the date of hir mariage) a maid, a wife, & a widow (hir husband being that day slaine at tilt) did in hir widowhood (in the one & twentieth yeare of Edward the 3, in the yeare of our Lord 1374) erect that house in Cambridge vpon hir owne ground, and appointed the same to be called the hall of Marie Malence, or Penbroke hall: by meanes whereof it was long after called Aula Valentia Maria.

Now to returne (where I left) to the last wife of this John Hastings called Anne, she (after the death of hir husband) did at the coronation of Richard the second, in the yeare of Christ 1382, being about the fift yeare of the reigne of the said Richard, sue by petition to execute by hir deputie the office of the pantiier, panter by reason of the manor of Ashley, which the had for his iointure, wherunto he was admitted, & by his deputie sir Thomas Blunt knight did performe the same: as this record doth testifie, in which is set both his petitions, and the iudgement thereof in this forme.

Thus this much touching this John Hastings earle of Penbroke and dame Anne Hannie his wife, John Hastings (the sonne of John Hastings last recited) was earle of Penbroke lord Hastings Aburgauenne & Wilsford, who being verie yong at the time of his fathers death, was ward first to Edward the third, and then to Richard the second, but neuer saw his full age of one and twentie yeares, nor euer possessed the lands wherunto he was bozne: for not long after that he had married Philip the second daughter of Edmund Mortimer (earle of March Wilster and lord of Wigmore) he was [about the nineteenth yeare of his age, the fiftieth yeare of king Richard the second, and the yeare of our redemption 1391, being a youthfull and lustie yong gentleman (but tender and slender) in the Christmaste time, when the is held that feast at Woodstoke in Middelshire] willing to learne to iust, wherupon in the parke then incounting with a knight called John saint John (a valiant and stout person) he was slaine when they ran togither, as the said knight did cast his speare from him, and so the said earle receiuing this manner of death, no man knew whether it happened by mishap: or purpose. To which John Hastings now slaine, Margaret Segrave duchesse of Northfolke his graundmother (by his mother the daughter of sir Walter Hannie) was executrix and disposer of all his substance. After his death, his widow the ladie Philip was married to Richard earle of Arundell, & after that to John lord saint John, being the same man (as I suppose) which lue his first husband this John Hastings. But here before the death of this John I must not forget, that though he were within age at the coronation of Richard the second, as not being past nine or ten yeares old; he sued to execute at the said coronation, the offices which his ancestors had afore performed. But because his mother had the manor of Ashley in dower (as is before expressed) he did not sue to serue in the pantrie, but leauing that, demandeth the carieng of the second sword and the golden spurs before the king. The records of both which I haue here set downe.

The petition for the second sword 10 which the earle of Arundell also claimed to beare, was in this sort.

Iohannes de Hastings nuper comes Pen-

In this John Hastings ended all the honorable titles of the Hastings, because this man dieng without issue, his inheritances were disperced to diuerse persons; for the honour of Penbroke came to Francis at court by the kings gift, the baronies of Hastings and Weilsford came to Reinold Greie of Ruthine, the baronie of Aburgauennie was granted to William Beauchampe of Bedford: for all which lands, and for the bearing of the armes of this same John Hastings without difference, great contention grew betwene sir Edward Hastings knight (descended of Isabell Spenser) and Reinold Greie lord Greie of Ruthine, sonne of Reinold Greie, sonne of Roger Greie, that married Elizabeth daughter of Isabell Walence, for both the said lord Greie and sir Edward Hastings were descended by two venters (as partlie before and partlie hereafter shalbe shewed) from one man John Hastings, husband to both said Isabels. For the explanation whereof, and line-all descent to conueie the said sir Edward Hastings from the said John Hastings, first lord of Aburgauennie of that surname; I must here repeat a litle of that which I haue alreadye written: which is, that the said John Hastings first lord of Aburgauennie, hauing two wiues, both Isabels, by his first wife Isabell Walence had Elizabeth married to Roger Greie, and by his second wife Isabell Spenser, he had issue sir Hugh Hastings knight, from whome we are to deduce the said sir Edward Hastings in this sort. Hugh Hastings knight lord of Ffoliot (in the right of his wife) being sonne of the second wombe of Isabell Spenser, and John Hastings sonne of Henrie Hastings married Margerie the daughter and heire of sir Richard Ffoliot, by whom he came to be lord of Ffoliot, and alwaies bare the armes of Hastings with a difference of a second brother of a second venter. This marriage was procured and made by Isabell his mother, who purchased the said ward for him. This Hugh died in the yeare of Christ 1347, in the one and twentieth yeare of Edward the third, and was buried in the church of Elsing, in Elsing in Norfolk which he builded; his wife Margerie died in the yeare 1349, being the thre and twentieth yeare of Edward the third, and was buried in the chappell of Ffoliwell. This Hugh had issue by his wife Hugh Hastings his heire, and a daughter married to sir Robert de la Pare.

Hugh Hastings knight, the sonne of Hugh and Margerie Ffoliot did marrie the daughter of Adam de Cueringham, by whom he had Hugh Hastings his sonne and heire, and two daughters, the one married to Winkfield, and the other to a knight called Elmham. This Hugh died at Calkewellhell of Gloues, and was buried in the friers of Doncaster, in the yeare of our Lord 1369, about the foure & fortith yeare of Edward the third. This man for him and his heires in difference from the other Hastings, earles of Penbroke his kinsmen by the halfe blood, did beare the Hastings armes with the labell, quartered with the armes of Ffoliot. Hugh Hastings knight the sonne of Hugh and Margeret Cueringham married Anne the daughter of Edward Spenser earle of Glocester, by whom he had issue Hugh Hastings and Edward Hastings, which contended with Reinold Greie lord of Ruthine. This Hugh toke his pilgrimage to Jerusalem & died in Spaine, after whose death dame Anne Spenser his wife was married to Thomas lord Poole. Hugh Hastings eldest son of Hugh Hastings and dame Anne Spenser, married the daughter of sir Will. Blunt knight; this Hugh died at Calis at the mariage of Richard the second, to Isabell the daughter of the king of France, about the 19 yeare of the reigne of the said Richard, being the yeare of our redemption 1395, who dieng without issue, all his right and title came to his brother Edward.

Edward Hastings knight brother of the last Hugh began the contention with Reinold Greie lord of Ruthine, for the right of the lands, honours, and armes without difference of the last John Hastings earle of Penbroke. This sute began about the eight yeare of Henrie the fourth, and continued at least untill the fift yeare of Henrie the fift, if not longer; but in the end (notwithstanding manie false pedegrees counterfeited by this Hastings, and his uncle Henrie bishop of Exeter, one of the house of the Spencers) yet it was adiudged against the said sir Edward Hastings in the marshals court, that the lands, honours, and armes without difference, as the last John Hastings earle of Penbroke did beare them, with the armes of William Walence earle of Penbroke, should be onelie borne by the said lord Greie of Ruthine and his heires, as being of the whole blood, and next heire to the said last John Hastings earle of Penbroke: and that the said Edward Hastings should vtterlie be barred to beare the armes of Hastings, but quartered with the armes of Ffoliot, as onelie descending of the halfe blood to the said last earle of Penbroke of that name. And that all other pedegrees that so euer (except this) are false, and of purpose contriued, as appeareth by a notable booke and monument thereof remaining in the hands of Henrie Greie now earle of Kent (descended of the said Reinold Greie of Ruthine) containing all the processe, examinations, witnesses, pedegrees & iudgements thereof, more plainelie mate appeare. In which contention there was shewed a matter by the deposition of sir William the knight not vnto this to be remembred (though it touch not the Hastings) concerning armorie and bearing of differences in armes, which was, that the said sir William said on his oath in the tenth yeare of Henrie the fourth, that before the times of Edward the third, the labell of three points was the different appropiat and appurtenant for the cognizance of the next heire; but the same king made his sons to beare the entire armes with labells of three points, with certeine differences in the said labells, to be knowen the one from the other, except his sonne the duke of Glocester, who bare a border about the armes of France and England. And thus, this much Francis Thin touching the name of Hastings.

In this yeare Thomas earle of Lancaster, for the opinion which had bene conceiued of him, by reason of miracles and other respects, was canonized for a saint. The mondate next after the feast of saint Iulie, a parlement was begun at Westminster, in which there was a bill exhibited by the commons, that the lords and great men of the realme should not giue to their men badges to weare as their cognizances; by reason that through the abuse thereof, manie great oppressions, imbalances, vnlawfull maintenances, and wrongs were practised, to the hinderance of all good orders, lawes, and iustice. The lords would not consent altogether to laie downe their badges; but yet they agreed that none should weare any such cognizance except their seruants of household, and such as were in ordinarie wages by the yeare. In the same parlement, certeine persons that had gone about some new rebellion in Kent, being apprehended, were condemned, and so were drawne and hanged. There was also an act made against such as should passe the seas, to purchase provisions (as they termed them) in any church or churches. And if any from thenceforth attempted so to do, he should be reputed and taken as a rebell. Also there was an act prouided against those that committed any wilfull murder, that none should presume to sue for their pardon. A duke or an archbishop that so such should forfeit to the king an hundred pounds. Likewise an earle or a bishop, an hundred marks, &c. Moreover, in this parlement it was granted, that the king should have of everie sacke of wolle fortie shillings, of the which ten shillings should be applied presentlie to the kings uses, and thirtie shillings reserved of the fourtie shillings should remaine in the hands of the treasurers, towards the bearing forth of the charges of wars when any chanced. ¶ Also there was a subsidie granted of six pence in the pound, four pence to the use last mentioned, and two pence to be employed at the kings pleasure. In the same parlement, John duke of Lancaster was created duke of Aquitaine, receituing at the kings hand the rod and cap, as inuestures of that dignitie. Also the duke of York his sonne and heire was created earle of Rutland. In the fift of March a soze and terrible wind rose, with the violence whereof, much hurt was done, houses overthrowne, cattell destroyed, and trees overturned. After this insued great mortalitie by pestilence, so that much youth died everie where, in cities and townes, in passing great numbers. Hereunto followed a great dearth of coyne, so that a bushell of wheat in some places was sold at a great price. ¶ About the feast of S. Peter ad Vincula, John duke of Lancaster caused a great meeting of the nobles and peeres of the realme to hunt at Leicester in the forest and all the parkes there to him appertaining. On the saturday the king and quene were present, the archbishop of York, the duke of York, Thomas Woodstoke duke of Gloucester, the earle of Arundell John of Holland, the earle of Huntington, with other bishops, lords and ladies a great manie, and on thursdaie next following the king departing from thence towards Spotingham sojourned with the lord of Beaumont besides Loughborough.

firm that the said earle made a journe in deed the same time against the miscreants, not into Barbarie, but into Prutzenland, where he shewed good proofe of his noble and valiant courage: for joining with the masters and knights of the Dutch order there, the armie of the Lithuanians that came against the said order was vanquished, and foure chiefe leaders of the Lithuanians were taken prisoners, three other being slaine, with three hundred of their chiefeest and best appoyued soldiers. Through the policie also and worthy manhood of the earle of Derby, there was a certeine citie taken, where the said earle and his men first entring upon the walles, did set by his banner: other being Southwell, or at the least unskillfull how to deale in such exploits. There were taken and slaine foure thousand of the common people, and amongst them that were found dead, the king of Polognies brother was one. The castell of the same citie was besieged five weekes space: but by reason of sicknesse and such infirmities as chanced in the armie, the masters of Prutzen, and Liffeland would not tarte any longer, but brake by their siege and returned. The master of Liffeland led with him into his countrie three thousand prisoners.

In the meane time, whilst the christians were thus occupied, as well against the infidels in Barbarie, as in the east parts towards Attawie, a roiall iusts and martiall turnament was proclaimed to be holden within Smithfield in London, to begin on saturdaye next after the feast of saint Michaell. And because this triumphant pastime was published, not onelie in England, but also in Scotland, in Almaine, in Flanders, in Brabant, in Heimaule, & in France, manie strangers came hither forth of diverse countries, namelie Waleran erle of saint Paule, that had married king Richards sister the ladie Maule de Courtne, and William the young erle of Mortuain, sonne to Albert de Bailliere earle of Holland and Heimaule. At the daie appointed, when all things were prepared, there issued forth of the tower about six of the clocke in the after none sixtie couriers apparelled for the iusts, and upon everie one an equer of honoz, riding a soft pace. Then came forth foure and twentie ladies of honoz (three score sixtie Froissard) mounted on palfries, riding on the one side richlie apparelled, and everie ladie led a knight with a chaine of gold. Whole knights being on the kings part, had their armor and apparell garnished with white hearts and crownes of gold about their necks, and so they came riding through the streets of London unto Smithfield, with a great number of trumpets and other instruments before them.

The king and the quene, with manie other great states were readie placed in chambers richlie adorned to see the iusts: and when the ladies that led the knights, were come to the place, they were taken downe from their palfries, and went by into chambers readie prepared for them. When alighted the esquires of honoz from their couriers, & the knights in good order mounted upon them. And when their helmets were set on their heads, and that they were redie in all points, after proclamations made by the heraults, the iusts began, and manie commendable courses were run, to the great pleasure, comfort, and recreation of the king, the quene, and all other the beholders. The prize that daie on the answers part was given to the earle of saint Paule, and on the challengers side, to the earle of Huntington. On the mondaie, the king himselfe, with dukes, earls, lords, and knights, came to the iusts, he being chiefe of the inner part. That daie the prize was given to the erle of Mortuain, for the best doer of the utter part: and of the inner part, to a knight of England called sir Hugh Spenser. On the tuesday, all manner of esquires squiers tuffed, and likewise on the lordnesday all maner of knights and esquires that would, on which daie was a foie and rude tuffe, enduring till night.

And so manie a noble course and other martiall feats were atchieved in those foure daies, to the great contentation and pleasure of manie a yong batche-ler desirous to win fame, & also highlie to the kings honour, who by all that season held his court in the bishops palace by Daules church, keeping open houshold for all honest persons that thither resorted, especiallie euerie night after the tuffs were ended, a right sumptuous and princelie supper was prepared for the strangers and other, and after supper, the time was spent in dancsing and reuelling after the most courtlike manner. On the thurdaie, the king made a supper to all the lords, knights, and gentlemen strangers, and the quene to all the ladies and gentlewomen. On the fridaie the duke of Lancaster feasted at dinner all the said lords, knights, and gentlemen strangers, in most sumptuous and plentifull maner.
On the saturday, the king and all the whole compa-nie departed from London vnto Windsor, where new feasting began, and speciallie the king did all the honour that might be deuised vnto the earls of saint Daule and Osteruant. The earle of Osteruant, at the earnest request of the king, receiued of him the order of the Garter, for the which he was euill thought of afterwards by his friends, namelie the French king and others. Finally, after the king had thus feasted the strangers and others at Windsor, each man tooke leaue of the king, the quene, and the kings vnles, and other lords and ladies, and so departed, the strangers into their owne countries, and other home to their houses, or whither they thought best.

nesse and want of exercise, degenerating and growing out of kind from their wonted warlike valiantnesse, should giue the ruselues to filthie lecherie, riot, slope, loitering pastimes, and slothfulnesse, all which doe greatlie impairre prowesse. Whereupon (saith he)

Spaning thus described the place, where the iusts should be kept, with the rewards, and other circumstances; he toucheth the countries from whence the forren nobilitie came, that should undertake triall of chualrie with these foure, and thentie challengers: who at the daie appointed (saith he) came prauling out of the Towre vpon their great bordered horses through the broad streets, and their ladies of honor with them gorgeously decked, with hairelets, opeches, cheines, iewels, spangles, and verie sumptuous attire: a goodlie sight for the people to behold. At last, when they were come to Smithfield, and althings readie, the trumpets sounded to the exercise; and both parties, as well the English as the outlandish cheuliers ran together, and tried their strengths till they did sweat and were tired, their horses panting and brazing with the violence of their bodilie motion; their staues being crast in funder, flue vp into the aire, and the broken stocke or stampe hitting the aduerlarie ouerthrew him to the ground: the beholers with top of heart gaue a shout thereat, as great-lie delighted with the sight. Then came the night and broke off the first daies toynement. On the next daie when they should renew and fall asrestly vnto it againe, they shewed themselves in courage equall to their ancestors, and handled their matters so well, that they got them great renowne. The third daie came, and the multitude of people still gathered together wondered at the right valiant doos of the valorous horsemen, how they did tosse, hoise vp, and wind their speares, and with what force they used their armes, what courage appeared in their statelie horses, and how the verie heauens rang with the ratling of their armor, and the strokes giuen to and fro. Euerie daie brought with it his portion of pleasure, both to the contenders, and to the beholders.

When the time was expired of this tried chualrie, necessarie occasion moued the king of England to set his mind on other matters, so that commending the prowesse of the outlandish lords, he bestowed vpon them manie cheines of gold, & loding them with other gifts of great valure, dismissed them into their countries. But the English challengers required nothing but renowne for their reward, being allured onelie with the loue of praise; and thus when these pastimes of chualrie were quite ended, euerie man got him home to his owne house. Thus saith Christopher Okland, touching the description of this Hippomachia ludicra inter concertatores Anglos & ex- ternos. Ambassadors were sent from the French king, vnto the king of England, to make an ouerture of peace to be had, and to indure for ever betwixt the two realmes of England and France, sith that by warre it was aparant inough, that neither realme, could greatlie benefit it selfe, but rather soze inda-mage either other, as afore time it had come appa-rantlie to passe. Wherefore the matter being well considered, both parts seemed well affected towards some good conclusion by treatie to be had of a full and perfect peace. About the same time, by the king with the aduise of his counsell, proclamation was made and published at London, that all beneficed men abiding in the court of Rome, being Englishmen borne, should retorne home into England before the feast of S. Nicholas, vnder paine to forfeit all their benefices; and such as were not beneficed, vnder a paine likewise limited. The Englishmen hearing such a thunder clap a farre off, fearing the blow, left the popes court, and returned into their native soile.

The pope troubled with such a rumbling noise, sent in all hast, an abbat as his nuncio vnto the king of England, as well to vnderstand the causes of this proclamation, as of statutes deuised and made lately in parlement against those that provided themselves of benefices in the court of Rome by the popes buls, which seemed not a little preiudiciall to the church of Rome: in consideration whereof the said nuncio required that the same statutes might be repealed and abolished, so farre as they tended to the prerogation of the church liberties: but if the same statutes were not abolished, the pope might not (saith his nuncio) with a safe conscience other wise do, than proceed against them that made those statutes, in such order as the canons did appoint. Whereouer the said nuncio declared to the king certeine dangerous practises betwixt the antipape and the French king, as to make the duke of Touraine the French kings brother king of Sicilie and Lombardie, and to establish the duke of Anjou in the kingdome of Sicilie.

Whereouer, he gaue the king to vnderstand, that if the French king might compasse by the antipapes meanes to be chosen emperor, he would seeke to besurpe vpon ech mans right, and therefore it stood the king of England chiefe in hand to prouide against such practises in time. And as for the treatie of peace which the Frenchmen seemed so much to fauour, it was to none other end, but that vpon agreement once had, they might more conuenientlie compasse their purpose in the premisses. Furthermore the nuncio earnestlie besought the king of aid in the popes behalf against the French king, if (as he threatned to do) he should inuade him in Italie with open force. The king seemed to giue fauourable eare vnto the nuncio, and after aduise taken, appointed to state till after Michaelmasse, at what time a parlement was appointed to be assembled, wherein such things as he had proponed should be weied and considered, and some conclusion taken therein.

About this time or in the yeare 1391, according to Henric Knightons account, there was a prophane statute made against the church & churchmen; name-lie, that no ecclesiasticall person or persons should possesse manors, glebeland, houses, possessions, lands, reuerenues or rents whatsoeuer, at the hands of the feoffee, without the kings licence & the chiefe lordes.
And this statute extended it selfe, as well to parish churches, chappels, chanteries, as abbeies, priories, & other monasteries whatsoeuer: likewise to citizens of cities, to farmers, & burgessees, hauing such rents or possessions for the common profit. For men in those daies, that would bestow land or liuelod vpon church, fraternitie, or conuent, and were not able for cost and charges to procure a moztmaine, vnder the kings licence and chiefe lordes; were wont to feoffe some speciall men, in whom they had confidence and trust, vnder whose name and title, churchmen, or anie other fraternitie or conuent might inioy the profit of the gift, and might haue the commoditie thereof in possession. And it was prouided by that statute, that all and euerie as well persons ecclesiasticall as parishioners, both citizens, burgessees, and farmers, or anie other whatsoeuer, hauing such rents, possessions, manors, or anie reuerenues whatsoeuer, in the hands of such feoffers, without the licence of the king and chiefe lordes; that either they should obtaine and get a licence of the king and the chiefe lordes to make it a moztmaine; or else set such things to sale, & raise profit of them, on this side or before the feast of Michael-masse next ensuing: or the said feast being past and expired, that then the king and the chiefe lordes, in things not ordered and disposed accordinglie, may enter and seize vpon the same, and them haue and hold at his and their pleasure.

About the same time, the duke of Glocester went into Prutze land, to the great grieue of the people, that made account of his departure, as if the sunne had bene taken from the earth, doubting some milhap to follow to the common wealth by his absence, whose presence they thought sufficient to stay all detiments that might chance, for in him the hope of the commons onelic rested. In his returne home, he was sore tormented with rough weather and tempestuous seas. At length he arriued in Northumberland, and came to the castell of Tinnmouth, as to a sanctuarie knownen to him of old, where after he had refreshed him certeine daies, he took his iournie homewards to Plascie in Essex, byinging no small ioy for his safe returne to all the kingdome. ¶ On the ninth of Julie the sunne seemed darkened with cer-teine grosse and euill fauored clouds comming betwixt it and the earth, so as it appeared ruddie, but gaue no light from none till the setting thereof. And afterwards continuallie for the space of six weeks, about the middelt of the daie, clouds custonmable rose, and sometimes they continued both daie and night, not vanishing atwaie at all. ¶ At the same time, such a moztalitie and death of people increased in Northfolke, and in manie other countries of England, that it seemed not unlike the season of the great pestilence. In the cite of Yorke there died eleuen thousand within a short space. ¶ Henrie Berlie earle of Northumberland lieutenant of Calis, was called home from that charge, and created warden of the marches against Scotland, and Robert Hotspoure was sent to Calis to be the kings lieutenant there.

On Friday next after All soules day, the parlement began at London, in which the knights would in no wise agree, that the statute made against spirituall men, for the prouiding themselves of benefices in the court of Rome should be repealed: but yet they agreed thus much, that it should be tolerated, so as with the kings licence such spirituall men might purchase to themselves such benefices till the next parlement. ¶ In this parlement asofaid, there was granted vnto our lord the king one tenth of the clergie, and one fiftenth of the people towards the expenses of John duke of Lancaster, who in Lent next following went ouer into France to the cite of A-miers for a finall peace betwene the kingdoms of England and France: where the king of France met him with a shew of great pompe and honor, sending before him first of all to welcome him thither the citizens of the same cite on horsebacke in a ve-rie great number. Then afterwards, he sent earles and barons a great manie to the same end, then his two vncler, last of all went the king himselfe to meet him, and saluting him called him by the name of The most worthie warriour of all christendome, the inuincible worthinesse of the king onelic excepted.
And the duke had seauentene daies (by covenant) to compasse this treatie of peace: at last he returned, hauing attendaunt vpon him in his traine the bishop of Durham, and the sonne of the duke of Yorke the earle of Rutland, with a thousand horsemen, set forth in a wonderfull sumptuous sort with gobleie furniture. ¶ Also conditionallie a whole tenth and a whole fiftenth were granted to him, if it chanced that he made anie iourne that yeare against the Scots.
¶ In this yeare, the duke of Gelderland sent to the king of England letters of commendation & praise, wherein also were prouocations and stirrings vp to warre and warlike actiuitie, and to the exercise of kinglie noblesse, the tenor whereof follooweth:

Most mightie prince, your roiall prowesse and the counsels of the sage, should altogether (as we thinke) moue you in dutie, by the most profound & deepe foresight of your discretion in time to mainteine and defend all and singular your rights & inheritance vnharmed, which by birth doo magnifie and make great your roiall maiestie, and if anie violence whatsoeuer gainstand & assault the same, your kingle diligence should indeuor with the shield of a warrior valiantlie to defend your title and right. And bicause we are neere you, & doo as it were touch your roiall person in aliance, vnlesse God himselfe doo forbid and hinder vs, we will alwaies be readie in all your rights to assist and aid you with two thousand pikes, when and how often soeuer you shall be disposed to rush out to battell. Your right ought not to be lost for words and promises, howsoeuer the craftinesse of the French labor to this purpose. Trulie most excellent prince, your renoume doth flie into the world, neither is it doubted but for your wooll sake, and other your singular commodities being innumerable (without the which the east and the south can not liue) all realmes with their coines doo greet you. In comparifon therefore of other kings God himselfe hath bestowd vpon you riches a hundred fold. Your warlike prowesse also, & the roughnesse of your bowes, being peerelesse, haue hitherto so extolled the couragious nation of the west, that no small feare dooth inuade your aduersaries; and to this day the sterne people of England haue (none like them) victoriously encountered with the French. Therefore o most puissant prince, let not the hart of a lion sleepe in cowardlinesse against nature: but what force and valiantnesse nature hath giuen you, the same vouchsafe to put in practise with feats of armes in defense of your common wealth, the maintenance of your right by inheritance, the increase of your desert, and the peerelesse prowesse of so great a kings courageous hart right worthie to be chronicled.

The price of coine that had continued at an high rate, almost for the space of two yeares, began to fall immediatlie after haruest was got in, to the great reliefe of the poore, which before through immoderate eating of nuts and apples, fell into the disease called the stir, whereof manie died, and surerlie (as was thought) the death and dearth had bene greater, if the commendable diligence of the lord maior of London had not bene, in relieuing the commons by such provision as he made for coine to be brought to London, from the parties of beyond the seas, where otherwise neither had the countrie bene able in anie thing to haue sufficed the citie, nor the citie the countrie. H. Knighton referreth this scarcitie to the yeare 1390, and maketh a large discourse both of the miseries which it brought with it, as also of the cause whereby it was procured, and of the notable means whereby the same in most places was remedied.

In this yeare (saith he) was a great dearth in all parts of England, and this dearth or scarcitie of coine began vnder the sickle, and lasted till the feast of saint Peter ad vincula, to wit, till the time of new coine. This scarcitie did greatlie oppress the people, and chieflie the commoners of the poore sort. For a man might see infants and children in streets and houses, through hunger, howling, crying, and craving bread: whose mothers had it not (God wot) to breake vnto them. But yet there was such plentie and abundance of manie yeares before, that it was thought and spoken of manie housekeepers and husbandmen, that if the seed were not sown in the ground, which was hoarded by and stored in barnes, lofts, and garners, there would be inough to find and suffice all the people by the space of five yeares following. But the cause of this penurie, was thought to be the want of monie in a great manie. For monie in these daies was verie scant, and the principall cause hereof was, for that the wooll of the land lay a sleepe and long heauie in some mens hands by the space of two yeares; and in others thre yeares, with out a chapman. For it was enacted in a certeine parlement, that the merchants of England should not passe out of the land with wooll and other merchandize, but should bring the same vnto twelue places within the realme appointed for the same purpose, that the merchants strangers might haue recourse thither with their commodities and so by exchange should transport our merchandize for theirs. By means whereof the merchants of England did forbear to buy wooll and other wares vntill the next parlement ensuing, wherein it was granted them to traffike whither they would with their commodities. In these daies wooll was dogchape: for one stone of good wooll of the chosen and piked sort, was sold for thre shillings, and in Leicestershire and Kent at some times for two shillings or two and twentie pence. This scarcitie of victuals was of greatest force in Leicestershire, & in the middle parts of the realme. And although it was a great want, yet was not the price of coine out of reason. For a quarter of wheat, when it was at the highest, was sold at Leicestershire for 16 shillings 8 pence at one time, and at other times for a marke or fourtene shillings: at London and other places of the land a quarter of wheat was sold for ten shillings, or for litle more or lesse. For there arrived eleven ships laden with great plentie of victuals at diuerse places of the land, for the reliefe of the people. Besides this, the citizens of London laid out two thousand marks to buy food out of the common chest of orphans: and the foure and twentie aldermen, euerie of them put in his twentie pound a peece piece for necessarie prouision, for feare of famine, likeli to fall vpon the citie. And they laid vpon their store in sundrie of the fittest and most conuenient places they could chuse, that the needie, and such as were wong with want, might come & buy at a certeine pite so much as might suffice them and their familie: and they which had not readie monie to paie downe presentlie in hand, their woyd and credit was taken for a yeaers space next following, and their turne serued. Thus was prouision made that people should be relieved, and that none might perish for hunger.

On Christmasse day, a dolphin that came forth of the sea vpon the Thames vnto London-bridge, was espied of the citizens as he plaid in the water, and being followed & pursued, with much adoe was taken. He was ten fot long, and a monstrous growne fish, so as the sight of him was strange to manie that beheld him. He was thought by his comming so farre into the landward, to foreshew such stormes and tempests as within a weeke after did raginglie follow. We haue heard how the matter for a treatie of peace had bene first broched by the French king, by sending ambassadors to the king of England, to moue the same. Which motion being throughlie considered of the estates assembled in this last parliament, it was decreed, that it should go forward (as before ye haue heard) and so about Candelmasse, the lord Thomas Berke, sir Lewis Clifford, and sir Robert Biquet, with diuerse other in their companie, were sent ouer to the French king, and comming to Paris, found him lodgd in his house of Loure, where they declared to him the good affection of the king their maister toward peace. And the better to bring it to passe, they shewed that king Richards desire was to haue some place and time appointed for commissioners to meet, with authoritie to treat and conclude vpon articles, as should be thought expedient. The French king greatlly honored these ambassadors, in feasting and banketting them for the space of six daies together, and for answer, concluded with them, that he himselfe, with his vnckles and other of his counsell, would be at Amiens by the middell of March next ensuing, there to abide the king of Englands comming, and his vnckles, if it should please them thither to come.

The English ambassadors said there was no doubt, but that either the king himselfe, or his vnckles should be there at the day assigned, with full authoritie to conclude anie agreement that should seeme reasonable, and so those ambassadors returned with great gifts presented on the kings behalfe to each of them, sir Robert Biquet excepted, vnto whome it seemed the French king bare no great good will, for that being a Frenchman borne, he had euer serued the Spaniards or Englishmen, and was now one of king Richards priue chamber. The king of England (as some write) was once minded to haue passed the seas himselfe, to haue met the French king at Amiens, at the time appointed, but finally the duke of Lancaster, the bishop of Durham, and others, were sent thither with a traine nere hand of a thousand horses. At their comming into France, they were roiallie receiued: for the French king had made no lesse preparation for the duke of Lancasters comming, than if he had bene emperor. The duke of Lancaster berelie was esteemed to be a verie mightie prince, and one of the wisest and sagest princes in all christendome, in those daies; so that it seemed the French king reioiced greatlly, that he might come to haue conference with him. There were with the French king here at Amiens, his brother the duke of Anoureigne; his vnckles, the dukes of Berry, Bourbon, and Burgognie, & a great number of earles, lords, and other nobles of the realme of France. Before the Englishmens comming, for avoiding of strife and debate that might arise betwixt the English and French, a proclamation was set forth containing certeine articles, for the demeanour which the French men should obserue towards the Englishmen.

Whilste they there remained, all the Englishmens charges were borne by the French king, from their setting forth from Calis, till they came backe thither againe. As touching their treatie, manie things were proponed, diuerse demands made, and some offers, though to small purpose, for they toke not effect, insomuch as they departed without concluding anie thing, further than that the truce which was to end at Midsummer next, was prolonged to continue one yere more, that in the meane time, the lords and estates of the realme of England might assemble, and with good aduise deliberate, whether it were more expedient to agree vnto a determinate peace, or to pursue the doubtfull chanches of warre. And such was the end of that roiall ambassage, to the furnishing forth whereof, the king demanded an aid as well of the abbats and priors, as of the cities and good towne through the whole realme.

Anon after the returne of the duke of Lancaster, and other the ambassadors that had bene at Amiens, a counsell of the lords and chiefe states of the realme was called at Stamford, the which (as if it had bene vnto a parliament) there came forth of euerie good towne certeine persons appointed to deliberate and take aduise in so weightie a matter, as either to conclude vpon peace, or else vpon warre. But in the end they brought little or nothing to passe, sauing that they agreed to haue the truce to indure for twelue moneths longer: both kings sware to obserue the same, afore such as were appointed to see their othes receiued. About the same time came the duke of Gelderland into this realme, being the kings coufine, a right valiant and hardie gentleman: he was honorablie receiued and welcomed of the king, and of his vnckles, the dukes of Lancaster and Gloucester. This duke of Gelderland counselled the king not to conclude peace, either with the Frenchmen or Scots, except vpon such conditions as might be knowne to be both profitable and honorablie to him and his realme, promising that if he had occasion to make warre against either of those two nations, he would be ready to serue him with a conuenient power of men at armes of his countrie. After he had bene here a time, and highlie feasted and banketted, as well by the king as other great estates of the realme, he returned home, not without diuerse rich gifts.

The king about this season sent to the Londoners, requesting to borrow of them the summe of one thousand pounds, which they incourteouslie refused to lend: and mozeouer they fell vpon an Italian or Lombard (as they termed him) whom they beat and nere hand slue: because he offered to lend the king that monie. Whereof when the king was aduertised, he was sore moued against them, and calling together the most part of the pæres and noble men of his realme, declared vnto them the froward dealings of the Londoners, complaining soze of such their presumption. The lords and great men, seeming not greatlie to fauour the Londoners, gaue counsell that the insolent pride of those presumptuous persons might with speed be repelled. The citizens of London in those daies (as should appeare) vsing their authoritie to the bittermost, had deuised and set forth diuerse orders and constitutions to abridge the libertie of forreiners that came to the citie to vitter their commodities. Religious men that wrote the doings of that age, seemed also to find fault with them, for that they fauored Wickliffes opinions, & therefore did

kindled about a little sparke.

Some there be that write, how the king plied the first quarrell against the maiors and shiriffes, for a riot committed by the unruly citizens, against the servants of the bishop of Salisbury: for that there one of the same bishops servants had taken a horse-lofe fro a bakers man, as he passed by in Fleetstreet with his basket to serue his masters customers, and would not deliuer it againe, but bzaie the bakers mans head, when he was earnest to haue recovered the lofe, the inhabitants of the street rose, and would haue had the bishops man to prison for breaking the kings peace: but he was rescued by his fellows, and escaped into Salisbury house, that stood there within the alle, and as then belonged to his master the bishop of Salisbury, being at that time high treasurer of England. The people being set in a rage for the rescue so made, gathered together in great multitudes about the bishops palace gate, and would haue fetched out the offender by force.

A riot by the

burys men.

To conclude, such a hurling was in the street, that the maior, with the shiriffes, & diuers aldermen came thither with all speed, to take order in the matter, and to see the peace kept; but after the coming thither of the maior, the commons of the citie resorted to the place in far greater numbers than before; and the more they were, the worse they were to rule, and would not be persuaded to quiet themselves, except the bishops servant, whose name was Walter Romane, might be had out of the house, and committed to prison: but at length, after manie assaults, lifts, & other indeuours made to haue broken up the gates of the house, the maior & aldermen, with other discret commoners appeased the people so, as they brought them to quiet, and sent euery man to his house.

The bishop was then at Windsor, where the court lay, who being informed of this matter, by a gracious report, and hapilie in worse manner than the thing had happened indeed, took such indignation therewith, that taking with him Thomas Arundell archbishop of Yorke, then lord chancellor of England, he went to the king and made an heinous complaint against the citizens for their misdemeanors, so that his displeasure was the more kindled against the citizens, in so much that, whether in respect of this last remembred complaint, or rather for their uncourteous deniall to lend him the thousand pounds, and misusing the Lombard that offered to lend the same, I cannot saie; but sure it is, that the maior and shiriffe, and a great sort more of the citizens, were sent for to come to the court, where diuers misdemeanors were objected and laid to their charge: and notwithstanding, what excuse they pretended, the maior and shiriffes with diuers other of the most substantiall citizens, were arrested. The maior was committed to the castell of Windsor, and the other, vnto other castels and holds, to be safely kept, till the king, by the aduise of his counsell, should determine further what should be done with them.

Anno Reg. 16.
Sir Edward

lord warden
of London.

The liberties of the citie were seized into the kings hands, and the authoritie of the maior utterly ceased, the king appointing a warden to gouerne the citie, named sir Edward Darlingrug knight, that should both rule the citie, and see that euery man had iustice ministered, as the case required. This sir Edward Darlingrug began to gouerne the citie of London by the name of lord warden, the one and twentieth of June, on which day the king entered into the 16 years of his reigne: by reason it was thought that the said sir Edward Darlingrug was over-favourable to the citizens, he continued in his office but till the first of Iulie, and being then discharged, one sir Baldwine Radington, a right circumspect and discret knight, was put in that rowe, who knew how both to content the kings mind, and to comfort the citizens, and put them in hope of the kings fauour in time to be obtained, to the reliefe of their sorow and heauinesse.

London.

At length, the king, through sute and instant labour made by certeine noble men, speciallie the duke of Glocester, began somewhat to relent and pacifie himselfe, as touching his rigorous displeasure against the Londoners, calling to mind the great honour he had diuerse waies receiued at their hands, with the great gifts which they had likewise bestowed vpon him, whereupon he purposed to deale the more mildlie with them; and so sent for diuers of the chiefe citizens to come vnto Windsor, where he then kept his court, there to shew forth the priuileges, liberties, and lawes of their citie, as well the new as old, that with the aduise of his counsell, he might determine which should remaine in force, and which should be abolished. Hereupon, when the said priuileges, and liberties were laid forth, to the view of such persons as had to consider of them, some were ratified, some permitted by tolleracion, and some utterly condemned and abrogated.

Neither might they recouer at that present, either the person or dignitie of their maior, nor obtaine the kings entire fauour, till they had satisfied the king of the damages and injuries by them done, either to him or his people. And where he had bene at great charges, in preparing forces to chastise them, as he was determined, if they had not submitted themselves vnto him, they were sure that their purses must answer all that he had laid forth about that matter. They therfore with humble submission, in recompense & satisfaction of their trespasses, offered to giue him ten thousand pounds, but they were for this time sent home, and appointed to returne againe at a certeine day, not understanding what they must pay, till the king with the aduise of his counsell had taken further order for them. At length, through such baile sute as was made for the quieting of the kings hot displeasure towards the Londoners, he was contented to pardon all offenses past. But first, the citizens were told, that the king meant to come from his manor of Shene, to the citie of London, and then vndoubtedly, vpon knowledge had of their good meanings, hereafter to beare themselves like lo-uing subjects, they should obtaine his fauour.

The citizens aduertised hereof, did not onelie prepare themselves to meet him, and to present him with gifts in most liberall manner; but also to adorne, decke, and trim their citie with sumptuous pageants, rich hangings, and other gorgeous furniture, in all points like as is vsed at ante coronacion. At the day appointed, there met him (beside other) foure hundred of the citizens on horsebacke, clad in one luerie, presenting themselves in that order, vpon the head on this side Shene, and in most humble wise, craving pardon for their offenses past, besought him to take his waie to his palace of Westminster, thorough the citie of London. This sute made by the recorder, in name of all the citizens, he graciously granted, and so held on his iournie, till he came to London bridge, where vnto him was presented a passing faire steed, white, saddled, bziueled, and trapped in rich cloth of gold, parted with red and white. And likewise to the queene was giuen a milke white palfrey, saddled, bziueled, and trapped in the same sort, as the other was. These presents were thankfullie accepted, and so both the king and the queene passing forward, entered the citie, prepared and hanged with rich clothes (as before you haue heard) the citizens standing on each side the streets in their liveries, cring: King Richard, king Richard.

At the standard in Cheape, was a right sumptuous stage ordeined, on which were set diuerse personages, and an angell that put a rich crowne of gold, garnished with stone and pearle vpon the kings head, as he passed by, and likewise an other on the queenes head. This done, the king rode to Paules, and there offered, and so took his horse againe, and rode to Westminster, where the maior and his companie taking their leaue, returned to London. On the morrow, the maior and his brethren went againe to Westminster, and there presented the king with two basens gilt, & in them two thousand nobles of gold, beseeching him to be good and gracious lord to the ci-tie; he receiued their present in courteous manner, and gaue them manie comfort table words. The third daie after, they receiued a new confirmation of all their old liberties (at the least such as might be an aid to the citie, and no detriment to forreiners) wherefore, by counsell of their frends, they ordeined a table for an altar of silver and gilt, ingrauen with image, and inamed in most curious wise, containing the stoie of saint Edward, it was valued to be worth a thousand marks. This was presented to the king, the which he shortly after offered to the shrine of saint Edward within the abbey. The Londoners beleeued, that by these gifts they had bene quite rid of all danger; but yet they were compelled to giue the king after this, ten thousand pounds, which was collected of the commons in the citie, not without great offense and grudging in their minds.

You haue heard hitherto, what means was made by the maior, aldermen, and whole bodie of the com-monaltie of London to procure the kings maiesties (in whose disfauour they were deeply drownded) gratious reconciliation. Wherein though there hath bene large matter deliuered; yet to set forth the dignitie thereof the fuller, take here by the waie the report of Henrie Knighton. In the yeare (saith he) 1392, the king called a great counsell on the morrow after Trinitie sundae at Stamford, about certeine af-fares concerning the Frenchmen, in which counsell he assembled together all the old soldiers of his reime, that by the aduise of the elder sort he might see what were best for him to do in the premises. The king also held a great counsell at Nottingham, on the feast of St. John the Baptist, whereat he caused the maior of London with the foure and twentie aldermen, the two shiriffes, and foure and twentie of the best commoners of the citie in the second degre to be con-uened before him. Here he charged them that they had forfeited a certeine bond of 9000 pounds to the king, besides the losse of their liberties and priuileges. Which obligation or bond they had made in former time to the king, their deserts requiring the same. Now the king, after rehearsall made of their new offenses & faults, discharged the maior, the two shiriffes, and the rest of his officers of their offices, and sent the maior and the two shiriffes to certeine places of custodie as his prisoners, defeating the ci-tie of London of the honour of all their priuileges; in so much that a citizen or freeman should haue no more prerogative than a forreiner or stranger. He appointed also the lord Edward Balering to be gouernor thereof, to keepe and see kept the kings lawes and his liege people within London in due order, untill such time as the king had otherwise provided for them. And he set them a day to answer the king and his counsell to certeine interrogatoies on the feast of St. Marie Magdalen then next ensuing, at Windsor. In the meane while, at the mediation of certeine frends and wellwillers, the kings indignation was somewhat mitigated and allwaged towards them; in so much that at length he released the maior and the shiriffes, and sent them home to their houses; setting ouer them notwithstanding a new keeper or go-uernour of the citie, and reseruing in his hand all the priuileges of the citie. In the meane time, on the sun-daie next after the feast of the Assumption of the ble-sed virgin Marie; all the wealthiest and worthiest commoners of the citie came to the king, and submitted themselves and all their goods to his grace, and then did he first receiue and take them into his fauour. On the wednesdaie ensuing, the king was purposed to come into London, and the citizens in multitudes innumerable met him on horsebacke; & they that had no horses went out on foot to welcome him thither; women also and infants shewed themselves vnto him; likewise the bishop of London, with all the clergie, no order, degre, condition, estate, or sex of ecclesiasticall dignitie being excused, went out in procession to meet the king and the queene with great reioicing. It was reported how in that procession there were aboute fure hundred boies in surplices.

Whereouer, the citizens of London trimmed the outsides of their houses and chambers in euerie street through which the king and the queene were to passe, from St. Georges to Westminster. As for the houses of the welthier sort, they were brauely garnished with clooth of gold, silver, tissue, velvet, & other sumptuous stuffe whatsoeuer by any possible means could be gotten. In Cheapside there was a conduit, out of the which two spouts ran with read wine & white, and vpon the conduit stood a little boie apparelled in white like an angell, hauing a golden cup in his hand, who presented wine to the king and queene to drinke as they passed by. In the meane time they offered to the king a golden crowne of great value, and another golden crowne to the queene; and a while after passing forwards, they presented to the king a golden tablet of the Trinitie, to the value of eight hundred pounds; and to the queene another golden tablet of St. Anne, whome she had in speciall deuotion and re-uerence, because hir owne name was Anne. Such, and so great, and so wonderfull honours did they to the king, as the like in former times was neuer done to ante king of this realme: and so going forward, they brought the king and the queene to Westminster hall. The king sitting in his seat roiall, & all the people standing before him; one in the kings behalfe as his speaker, gaue the people thanks for the great honour and princelie presents which they had bestowed vpon the king; and being bidden to call euerie man to his businesse and affaires, it was told them that in the next parlement they should haue their finall answer.

At the same time, the duke of Glocestre, hauing re-ceiued monie to leaue an armie, which he should haue conueied ouer into Ireland, of which countrie, a good while before that present, the king had made him duke, was now readie to set forward, when suddenlie through the malice of some priuie detractours about the king, he was contermanded, and so his iourne was staied, to the great hinderance and preiudice of both the countries of England and Ireland: for euen vpon the same that was bytued of his comming into Ireland, in manner all the Irish lords determined to submit themselves vnto him, so greatlie was his name both loued, reuerenced, and feared, euen among those wild and sauage people. This yeare Robert Clare, late earle of Wrenford, and duke of Ireland, departed this life at Louaine in Babant, in great anguish of mind, & miserable necessitie: which young gentleman (doubtlesse) was apt to all commendable exercises and parts fit for a noble man, if in his youth he had bene well trained and brought vp in necessarie discipline.

This yeare after Christmasse, a parliament was called at Winchester, in which onelie a grant was made by the cleargie, of halfe a tenth, for the expens of the duke of Lancaster & Glocester, that were appointed to go ouer into France, to treat of peace, betwixt the two kingdomes. The courts of the kings bench and chancerie, which had bene removed from Westminster to Pothe, either in dissaour onelie of the Londoners, or in fauour of the citizens of Pothe, for that the archbishop of that citie, being lord chancellor, wished to aduance (so farre as in him laie) the commoditie and wealth thereof, were neuertheless about this season brought backe againe to Westminster, after they had remained a small time at Pothe, to the displeasure of manie. ¶ This yeare, the lord Auberie de Ware, uncle to the late duke of Ireland, and twentieth of Februarie, John Eures, constable of Douer castell, & lord steward of the kings house departed this life, in whose roome the lord Thomas Persie that before was vicechamberlaine was created lord steward; and the lord Thomas Beaumont was made constable of Douer, and lord warden of the cinque ports; and the lord William Scrope was made vicechamberlaine, who about the same time, bought of the lord William Montacute the Ile of Man, with the regalitie thereof, for it is a kingdome; as Thomas Walsingham affirmeth.

The dukes of Lancaster and Glocester went ouer into Calis, and downe to Bullongne came the dukes of Berrie and Burgognie. These noblemen were sufficientlie furnished with authoritie, to conclude a perfect peace, both by sea and land, betwene the two realmes of France and England, and all their alies. The place appointed for them to treat in, was at Balingham, where tents and pavilions were pight vp, for the ease of both parties. They met there twice or thise a weeke, in a faire tent prepared for the purpose, about nine of the clocke in the forenone. This was about the beginning of Maie. When they entered first into communication, and had seene each others authoritie, one of the first demands that the Frenchmen made, was to haue Calis rased, in such wise, as there should neuer be anie habitation there after that time. The dukes of Lancaster and Glocester answered hereunto, how they had no authoritie to conclude so farre, but that England should hold Calis still, as in demesne, and true inheritance; and therefore, if they purposed to enter any further in the treatie of peace, they should cease from that demand and speake no moze thereof. When the dukes of Berrie and Burgognie heard their two cousins of England answer so roundlie, they spake no moze of that matter.

When the dukes of Lancaster and Glocester demanded to haue restitution of all such lands as had bene deliuered, either to king Richard, or to king Edward the third, or to anie their deputies or commissioners, and also to haue fullie paid the summe of florens that was left vnpaid, at the time when the warre reuiued betwixt England and France: and this the English lawiers proued to stand with equitie and reason. But neuertheless, the lords and chancellors of France argued to the contrarie, and so agree they could not, inso much as the Frenchmen required, that if the Englishmen meant to haue anie conclusion of peace, they should draw to some next points. At length, the four dukes took order, that all their demands on either side should be set downe in writing, and deliuered to either partie interchangeably, that they might be regarded at length, and such as should be found unreasonable, to be rased or reformed. After they had communed together diuerse times, and remained there sixtene daies, they appointed to aduertise the two kings of their whole dealings, and after nine daies space to meet againe. The French dukes rode to Abbeville, where the French king then laie: and the English dukes returning to Calis, wrote to the king of England, of all the whole matter. The duke of Glocester was harder to deale with in each behalfe, concerning the conclusion of peace, than was the duke of Lancaster, for he rather desired to haue had warre than any peace, except such a one as should be greatlie to the advantage and honour of the realme of England: and therefore the commons of England vnderstanding his dispositi- on, agreed that he should be sent, rather than anie other. For where in times past the Englishmen had greatlie gained by the warres of France, as well the commons, as the knights and esquires, who had by the same maintained their estate, they could not giue their willing consents, to haue anie peace at all with the Frenchmen, in hope by reason of the wars, to profit themselves, as in times past they had done. The French king & nobles of France were greatlie inclined to peace, and so likewise was the king of England, & the duke of Lancaster. But the Frenchmen were so subtil, and vsed so manie darke and coloured words, that the Englishmen had much ado to vnderstand them: which offended much the duke of Glocester. But neuertheless, at the daie prefixed, these four dukes met againe at Balingham, and with the French lords came the king of Armentie, newlie returned into France south of Grecia, for into his owne countrie he durst not come, the Turkes hauing conquered it, the strong towne of Conich, which the Genouaues held, excepted.

The king of Armentie would gladlie that peace might haue bene established betwixt France and England, in hope to procure the sooner some aid of the kings to recouer his kingdome. But to conclude after that the dukes, and other with them associat as assistants, had diligentlie perused and examined the articles of their treatie, they would not passe nor seale to anie, till all darke and obscure words were clærelie declared, opened, and made perfect, so that no generall peace might be concluded. Notwith- standing, as Froissard saith, a truce for foure peares space, vpon certeine articles was agreed to be kept as well by sea as by land. It was thought, that when they were at point to haue growne to agreement concerning manie articles, if the French king had not newlie fallen into his former disease of frensie, there had better effect followed of this treatie; but by occasion of his sicknesse, each man departed, before that anie principall articles could be fullie ordered and made perfect. The same time, sir Thomas Persie the younger was made lord warden of Burde- aur and Aquitaine.

In Seperember, much hurt was done, thorough exceeding great thunder, lightening, and tempests, which chanced in manie parts of England, but spect- allie in Cambridgeshire, where manie houses were burned, with no small quantitie of coine. Great in- undations and floods of water followed shortly af- ter in October, which did much hurt at Burie, and Newmarket in Suffolke, where it ouerthrew walls of houses, and put men and women in great danger of drowning. In Essex also in September, great mortallitie fell by pestilence amongst the people, whereof manie died. ¶ The towne of Chierburg was restored againe to the king of Nauarre, who had in- gaged it to the king of England, for two thousand markes. ¶ A parliament was holden at Westmin- ster, which began in the octaues of saint Hilarie. ¶ The king purposing to go ouer into Ireland, requir- ed a subsidie, the cleargie granted to him a whole tenth, toward the furnishing forth of that iourne, if he

he went himselfe; if he went not, yet they agreed to give to him the moiety of a tenth. In time of this par-lement, there appeared great euill will to remaine betwixt the duke of Lancaster and the earle of Ar-rundell, for the duke imposed to the earle, that about the Crystallation of the crosse, he late with a companie of armed men in the castell of Holt by Chester, the same time that the countie there rose against the duke, with their capitaine Nicholas Clifton, and his complices, whome he ment (as the duke alledged) to haue aided against him: but this the earle flatlie denied, and with probable reasons so excused himselfe, as the quarrell at length was taken up, and the parties for the time well quieted.

This yeare on Whitsundae being the seauenty of June, quene Anne departed this life, to the great griefe of hir husband king Richard, who loued hir intirelie. She decessed at Sperne, and was buried at Westminster, vpon the south side of saint Edwards shrine. The king took such a conceit with the house of Sperne, where she departed this life, that he caused the buildings to be throwne downe and defaced, whereas the former kings of this land, being wearie of the citie, used custumable thither to resort, as to a place of pleasure, and seruing hightie to their recreation.
Thus the king, the duke of Lancaster, and his sonne the earle of Derby, were twid owers, all in one season: for the ladie Constance duchesse of Lancaster daughter to Peter king of Spaine, decessed the last yeare, whilste hir husband the duke of Lancaster was at the treatie in France: at the same time also decessed the countesse of Derby, wife to the lord Henric earle of Derby. Moreover, in this yeare 1394, Isabell duchesse of Porke departed this life, that was halfe sister to the duchesse of Lancaster, being borne of one mother. She was buried at Lang-leie.

This yeare in August, was a proclamation set forth, that all Irishmen should auoid this land, and returne home into their owne countie, before the feast of the Patinitie of our ladie, on paine of death.
The occasion of which proclamation was, for that such multitudes of Irishmen were come ouer into this region, in hope of gaine, that the countie in Ireland, subiect to England, were in manner left void of people, so that the enemies spoiled and wasted those countie at their pleasure, finding few or none to withstand them. And where king Edward the third had placed in Ireland his bench and iudges, with his exchequer, for the good administration of iustice and politike gouernement to be used there, he received from thence pearelie in reuenues and profits, comming to his owne cofers, the summe of thirtie thousand pounds: the king now laid forth no lesse a summe to repell the enemies, which by absence of those that were come ouer hither, could not otherwise be resisted, with the power of the rebels was so increased, and the force of the countie subiect, thorough lacke of the former inhabitants, so diminished. About the feast of the Patinitie of our ladie, the king set forward to passe into Ireland, hauing made such preparation for that iourne, as the like for Ireland had not bene heard of at ante time before. There went out with him the duke of Glocester, the earles of March, Nottingham, and Rutland, the lord Thom as Berse lord steward, and diuerse other of the English nobilitie.

The duke of Lancaster, that in the thirteenth yeare of king Richards reigne had bene created by autho-ritie of parlement, duke of Aquitaine, was about this present time sent thither, with fine hundred men of armes, & a thousand archers, to take possession of that duchie, according to the kings grant, by his letters patents thereof had, made, and confirmed with his seale, in presence of the most part of all the nobles and great lords of England, to hold all that countie to the said duke and his heires for euer in as large manner and forme, as his father king Edward the third, or anie other kings of England, or dukes of Aquitaine before time had holden, and as king Richard at that season had & held the same, the homage alwaies yet reserued to the kings of England for euer. But all this notwithstanding, at his comming thither, so farre were the Galcoignes, and other people of those marches from receiuing him with ioy and triumph, that they plainelie told him, they would not atturue to him, nor be vnder his iurisdiction at ante hand, although he had brought ouer with him commissioners sufficientlie authorised, both to discharge them of their former alligiance to the king, and to inuest him in possession of that duchie, in maner and forme as before is said.

But now to returne to king Richard, ye shall vn-derstand, that when all his prouision and roial armie was readie, about Michaelmas, he toke the sea, and landed at Waterford the second of October, and so remained in Ireland all that winter: his people were lodged abroad in the countie, and lay so warilie as they might. For although the Irishmen durst not attempt anie exploit openlie against the Englishmen, after the kings arrivall with so puissant an armie, yet they would feale sometimes vpon them, where they espied anie aduantage, and disquiet them in their lodgings. But when the English still preuailed, diuerse of the greatest princes among them came in, and submitted themselves. Amongst other, four kings are mentioned, as the great Dnell king of Meth, Bine of Thomond king of Thomond, Arthur Macmur king of Lineister, and Conhur king of Cheueno and Darpe: these kings were courteoulie interteined and much made of by king Richard, who kept his Christmas this yeare at Dubline. And after that feast was ended, he held a parlement there, to the which all his subiects of Ireland, vnto whom it appertained, resorted, as well those that had continued vnder the English gouernement afozetime, as those that were latelie yelded.

Also at the same time, after the octaues of the E-piphanie, the duke of Porke, lord warden of England, now in the kings absence, caused a parlement to be called at Westminster, to the which was sent forth of Ireland the duke of Glocester, that he might declare to the commons the kings necessitie, to haue some grant of monie to supplie his want, hauing spent no small quantitie of treasure in that iourne made into Ireland. The dukes words were so well heard and beleued, that a whole tenth was granted by the clergie, and a fifteenth by the laitie; but not without protestation, that those paiements were granted of a mere good will, for the loue they bare to the king, and to haue his businesse go forward, which because it required great expences, both for that his owne rofall person was abiding in Ireland about the subduing of the rebels, as also because his retinue and power could not be maintained without excessive charges; they seemed to be no lesse desirous to haue the same ended, than they which were daile agents in the same, not without feare of misfortune likelie to befall them, hauing to deale with a people of such barbarous and rebellious behauior.

At the same time, those that followed Wickliffes opinions, set vp publikelie on the church doze of Paulus in London, and the church dozes of Westminster, certaine writings, containing accusations of the clergie, and conclusions, such as had not com-monlie bene heard, against ecclesiasticall persons, and the vse of the sacraments, as the church then maintained. They were incouraged thus to do, as it abbey.

was said, by some noble men, and knights of great worship, as sir Richard Sturrie, sir Lewes Cliford, sir Thomas Latimer, sir John Pontacute, & others, who comforted & picked forward those kind of men, then called heretikes & Lollards, to the confounding of monks, friers, and other religious persons, by all waies they might. Whereupon, the archbishop of Porke, the bishop of London, and certeine other as messengers from the whole state of the clergie, passed ouer into Ireland, where, to the king they made a grievous complaint, as well against those that had framed and set forth such writings, as against them that maintained them in their doings, and therefore besought him with speed to returne home into England, there to take such order, for the restraining of those misordered persons, as unto the reliefe of the church might be thought expedient, being then in great danger of sustaining irreconerable losse and damage, if good reformation were not the sooner had. King Richard hearing these things, upon good deliberation had in the matter, determined to returne home, but first on the day of the Annuntiation of our ladie, he made the foure aboue remembred kings, to wit, Ouell, Bine of Thomond, Arthur of Spachmur, and Conhur, knights, in the cathedrall church of Dublin, and one likewise sir Thomas Wyden, sir Joasas Wado, and his cosine sir John Wado.

This done, and now after that they were set in quiet in that countrie (the rebels not being so hardie as to stirre, whilest such a mightie armie was there ready at hand to assaile them) the king about Easter came backe into England without anie more adow, so that the gaine was thought nothing to counteruaile the charges, which were verie great: for the king had ouer with him in that iourne, foure thousand men of armes, and thirtie thousand archers, as Froissard saith he was informed by an English esquier that had bene in that iourne. The king at his comming ouer, did not forget what complaint the archbishop of Porke, and the bishop of London had exhibited to him, against those that were called Lollards, and heretiks, whereupon immediatlie, he called before him certeine of the noble men, that were thought and knowne to fauour such kind of men, threatening terrible, if from thence forth they should in anie wise comfort and relieue them. He caused sir Richard Sturrie to receiue an oth, that he should not mainteine from that day forward anie such erroneous opinions, menacing him, and as it were, couenanting with him by an interchangeable oth, that if euer he might vnderstand, that he did violate and breake that oth, he should die for it a most shamefull death.

By the report of H. Knighton it should seme, that this sea (as he calleth them) mightilie increased, to the no small offense of the lords tempozall and spirituall, whereupon after sundrie complaints, and serious solicitations for the supplanting of them, commissions were granted, and the tenure of them (as it should seme) though not absolutelie, yet in part executed. Now therefore listen what mine author saith, whose addition, though by his owne supputation of peares it require to be placed elsewhere; yet for the consonancie of the matter, and because writers varie greatlie in their accounts of time, I haue here inserted the same, as in a verie conuenient place of the historie. The noblemen and the commons (saith Henrie Knighton) seeing the ship of the church, with these & other innumerable errors, & verie lewd opinions as it were on all sides from day to day with ceaselesse violence and force to be shaken; besought the king in the parlement, that redresse might be had hereof, lest the arke of the faith of all the church by such violences and inforcements giuen in those daies, should through want of gouernement be battered without remedie, and the glorious realme of England by corrupting of faith should by little and little be drawne into a distresse of grace and losse of hono. Wherefore the king vRING the sound counsell of the whole parlement, commanded the archbishop of Canturburie, & the rest of the bishops of the realme, to execute their charge and office, all and euerie of them in his and their diocesse, according to the canon lawes, more seuerelie and resolute; to correct the offenders, to examine their English books more fullie and substantiallie, to root out errors with all their induozs, to bring the people into an vnitie of the right faith, to weed by out of the church all netles, thistles, and hambles wherewith the is disgraced; and to beautifie hir with lillies and roses; and should cause an establisment of his roiall power more boldlie and frontlie. And the king forthwith commanded, without delate, that his letters patents should be sent abroad into all and euerie shire of his kingdome; and appointed in euerie shire certeine searchers for such books and their fauourers; charging them to applie a speedie remedie vnto these disorders, and to lay by the rebels in the berie next gaoles, till the king sent vnto them. But verie slow execution or none at all folloved, because the houre of correction was not yet come. [Whobest, to prepare and make an entrance to the purposed reformation and correction of those enormities, he gaue out a commission against the Wicklenists, a copie whereof foloweth both in Latine and English. Whereby the world may see how the springing church of Christ was hated and abhorred of the antichristian rout.]

A copie of the kings commision against the Lollards or Wickleuists and their followers: Englished by A.F.

Richard by the grace of God king of England and France, and lord of Ireland, to his beloued, maister Thomas Brightwell doctor in diuinitie, deane of the college of the new worke of Leicester, and to William Cheselden prebendarie of the prebend of the same college, and to our beloued and trustie subiects, Richard of Barow Chinall, and Robert Langham, greeting. For so much as we are certeinlie informed by credible report, that by the vnfound doctrine of maister Iohn Wickliffe, whiles he liued, of Nicholas Herford, Iohn Liffon, and their followers, many bookes, libels, scheduls, & pamphlets expressed, euidentlie, and notoriouly, warning with manifest heresies and errors, to the hurt of the catholike faith, & the abolishment of sound doctrine, are commonlie compiled, published, and written, as well in English as in Latine, and therevpon wicked opinions contrarie to sound doctrine, doo spring, grow, and are mainteined and preached to the weakening of the right

faith, the ouerthrow of holie church, and consequentlie (which God forbid) the misbeleefe of a great many, & the manifest danger of their soules. We being moued with zeale to the catholike faith, whereof we are, and will be defenders in all things, as we are bound, vnwilling that such heresies or errors within the limits of our iurisdiction, so far as we are able, should grow, or by any meanes spring vp: doo asigne you iointlie and seuerallie, all and singular the bookes, libels, scheduls, & pamphlets containing such doctrine of the said Iohn, Nicholas, Iohn, and their fellow-followers, or any of their corrupt opinions, wheresoeuer, & in whose hands, possession, or keeping soeuer they shalbe found within the liberties or without, them to search, take, arrest, and cause to be brought before our counsell with all possible speed, that then and there we may take order for the same accordingly, as by the aduise of our foresaid counsell we shall see requisite to be doone. And also to proclaime, and on our behalfe firmelie to forbid all and euerie one, of whatsoeuer state, degree, or condition he be, vnder paine of imprisonment and forfeitures, which to vs he shall forfeit, any of these wicked and lewd opinions to mainteine, teach, obstinatlie to defend, priuile or openlie, or any of these bookes, libels, scheduls & pamphlets to keepe, write, or cause to be written, but all and euerie such booke and bookes, libels, scheduls, and pamphlets with them had & found, at our commandement vnto you to deliuer, or cause to be deliuered without delaie. And all them, whome after proclamation and inhibition you shall find dooing contrarie to the premisses, and such lewd opinions mainteining, to call forth before you the said Thomas the deane, & William, and them to examine: & when they shalbe lawfullie conuincid therein, to commit them to the next officers & prisons, there to be kept, till they haue recanted their errors, heresies, and wicked opinions; or till we for their deliuerance shall otherwise thinke order to be taken. And therefore we command, that you intend the said premisses, with all diligence and effect, and the same doo and execute in forme aforesaid. We doo also give in streict commandement and charge, to all and euerie as well churchman & churchmen, as shiriffes, maiors, bailiffes, officers, and other our trustie subiects, as well within the liberties as without, by the tenor of these presents, to assist, counsell, and helpe you and euerie of you in doing the premisses, as it is convenient. In witness whereof, we haue caused these our letters patents to be made. Witnesse our selues at Westminster the twentieth third day of Maie, and the eleuenth yeare of our reigne.

About this time, as Henrie Knighton saith in the yeare 1382, maister William Courtenie archbishop of Canturburie, brother to the earle of Derby, visited the diocese of Lincoln, and on the feast of Saint Juno the virgin he visited maister John Bokingham bishop of Lincoln in the cathedrall church of Lincoln, with the chapter and an hundred of the canons, and he came to Leicester abbete in visitation, the Sunday before the feast of All Saints, where he abode all the Tuesday, and on the next also of All saints being mondate, calling together all the canons of the said monastrie, with the chaplains of his owne chappell, euerie of them having in their hands burning candels. The same archbishop confirmed sentence of excommunication against the Lollards or Wicklensis, with their fauourers, which either now mainteined or caused to be mainteined, or hereafter did mainteine or should mainteine the errors and opinions of master John Wickliffe, in the diocese of Lincolne. On the morrow next after All saints, the same bishop flathed out his sentence of excommunication like lightning in open sight, with a crosse set vp right, with candels burning bright, and with bels rone aloud, and namelie against those of Leicester towne that had too much defiled and infected the said towne and countrie. The archbishop departing from thence, went to saint Peters church, to a certeine anchoresse named Spaldis there kept as in a closet, whom he reprocuing about the foresaid errors and opinions of the Lollards, and finding hir answers scarce aduiseple made, cited hir that she should appeare before him, on the sundaie next ensuing, in saint James his abbey at Northampton, to answer vnto the foresaid erroneous and prophane points. Now she appeared at the day appointed, and renouncing hir errors, and hauing penance intolmed hir, she went awaie reformed. But till the second day before the feast of saint Lucie, she kept hir selfe out of hir closet, and then entred into the same againe. Other Lollards also were cited, and appeared at Wyford, and in other places, as the archbishop had commanded them: who renouncing their superstitious errors, and forswearing their prophane opinions, did open penance. Also one William Smith was made to go about the market place at Leicester, clothed in linnen [or in a white sheet] holding in his right arme the image of the Crucifix, and in his left the image of saint Katharine, because the said Smith had sometimes cut in peces and burned an image of saint Katharine, whereof he made a fire to boile him hearbes in his hunger.

A ridiculous penance.

In those daies there was a certeine matrone in London, which had one onelie daughter, whome marie daies she instructed and trained by to celebrat the masse, and she set by an altar in hir priue or secret chamber with all the ornaments thereunto belonging, and so she made hir daughter manie daies to attire hir selfe like a priest, and to come to the altar, and after hir maner to celebrat the masse. Now when she came to the words of the sacrament, she cast hir selfe flat on hir face before the altar, & made not the sacrament; but rising vp, dispatched the rest of the masse euen to the verie end, hir mother helping hir therein, and doing hir deuotion. This error a long time lasted, till at last by a certeine neighbour that was secretlie called to such a masse, it was told abroad, and came to the bishops eares, who causing them to appeare before him, talked with them about that error, and compelled the yong woman openlie to shew the priestlie shawing of hir haire, whose head was found to be all bare and bald. The bishop sighing and sorrieng that such an error should happen in the church in his time, made manie lamentations, and hauing intolmed them penance, dispatched and sent them away. Thus far Henrie Knighton. [It is not to be doubted, but that in these daies manie of the female sex be meddling in matters impertinent to their degre, and inconuenient for their knowledge; debating & scanning in their priuat conuenticles of such things as wherabout if they kept silence, it were for their greater commendation; presuming, though not to celebrat a masse, or to make a sacrament; yet to vnder take some publike pece of seruice incident to the ministrie: whose over-sauoeie rashnesse bring bolstered and borne by with abbettoys not a few, wher it be by ecclesiasticall discipline corrected. I wot not; but of the vnuformed presbiterie I am sure it is lamented.]

A certeine thing appeared in the likenesse of fier in manie parts of the realme of England, now of one fashion, now of another, as it were euerie night, but yet in diuerse places all Nouember and December. This fierie apparition, oftentimes when any bodie went alone, it would go with him, and would stand still when he stood still. To some it appeared in the likenesse of a turning whele burning; to other some round in the likenesse of a barrell, flathing out flames of fier at the head; to other some in the likenesse of a long burning lance; and so to diuerse folke at diuerse times and seasons it shewed it selfe in diuerse formes and fashions a great part of winter, specialie in Leicestershire and Northamptonshire: and when manie went together, it approached not nere them, but appeared to them as it were a far off. In a parlement time there was a certeine head of war made by the art of necromancie (as it was reported) which head at an houre appointed to speake, uttered these words following at thre times, and then ceased to speake any more. These be the words; first, The head shall be cut off; secondlie, The head shall be lift vp aloft; thirdlie, The feet shall be lift vp aloft above the head. This happened in the time of that parlement which was called the merclesse parlement, not long before the parlement that was named the parlement which wrought wonders. In Aprill there was sene a fierie dragon in manie places of England; which dreaddfull sight as it made manie a one amazed, so it ministred occasion of mistrust to the minds of the maruelloys, that some great mischance was imminent, whereof that burning apparition was a prognostication. In this kings daies (as faith Thomas Walsingham) whose report, because I am here dealing with certeine prodigious accidents importing some strange euent, I am the more bold to interlace about the troublesome time when discord sprang betwene the king and his youtlie companions with the duke of Lancaster, in the moneth of Maie, there happened a conjunction of the two greatest planets, namelie Jupiter and Saturne, after the which did follow a verie great commotion of kingdoms, as in the procelle of this historie may appeare.

The French king about this time summoned a conuocation of the French cleargie, to decide and search out the power of the two popes, which of them had fuller right and authoritie in saint Peters chaire, for the schisme and diuision betwene the two popes was not yet ended. The French cleargie wrote in the behalfe of Clement their pope, & confirmed their script or writing with the vniuersitie seale of Paris. Which writing Charles the French king sent over to Richard king of England, that touching these doubts and difficulties he with the councill of his cleargie might deliberat. Wherefore king Richard summoned a conuocation at Wyford of the learned diuines as well regents as not regents of the whole realme; who wrote for and in the behalfe of Urbane their pope of Rome, and confirmed their writing with the vniuersitie seale of Wyford, & sent it ouer sea to Paris vnto the French king. But nothing was done further in the premises, both popes, vnder the shadow or shelter of schisme preuailing betwene them, increasing their title & interest. [This is the last record found in Henrie Knighton, who for that which he hath done touching chronographie, hath written the blindnesse of the time wherein he liued, and his order considered) though not so well as the best, yet not so ill as the worst; and whose collections, if they were laid together, this yeare, 1395.]

This yere, the Danes that late rowing on the seas did much hurt to the English merchants, taking and robbing manie English ships, and when the haue tollnes along the coasts of Northfolke, made forth a number of ships, and ventured to fight with those pirats, they were vanquished by the Danes, so that manie were saue, and manie taken prisoners, which were constrained to paie great ransoms. The en-mies also found in ransacking the English ships, twenty thousand pounds, which the English merchants had aboard with them to buy wares with, in place whither they were bound to go. In the same yeare, William Courtenie archbishop of Canturburie, hauing more regard to his diuine priuat commoditie, than to the discommoditie of others, purchased a bull of the pope, whereby he was authorized to leane through his whole prouince foure pence of the pound of ecclesiasticall promotions, as well in places exempt, as not exempt, no true nor lawfull cause being shewed or pretended, why he ought so to doe; and to see the execution of this bull put in practice, the archbishop of Bozke, and the bishop of London, were named and appointed.

Manie that feared the censures of such high erectioners, chose rather to paie the monie forthwith, than to go to the law, and be compelled happlie, manger their good willes. Some there were that appealed to the see of Rome, meaning to defend their cause and to procure that so vnlawfull an exaction might be reuoked. Speciallie, the prebendaries of Lincoln stood most stiffelie against those bishops, but the death of the archbishop that chanced shortlie after, made an end of those so passing great troubles. This yeare, John Waltham bishop of Salisburie, and lord treasurer of England departed this life, and by king Richard his appointment had the honor to haue his bodie interred at Westminster amongst the kings. After this decease, Roger Walden that before was se-cretarie to the king, and treasurer of Calis, was now made lord treasurer.

Anno Reg. 19.
We haue heard, that in the yeare 1392, Robert Aber duke of Ireland departed this life in Louaine in Wabant. King Richard therefore this yeare in November, caused his corps being embalmed, to be conueied into England, and so to the priore of Colmie in Essex, appointing him to be laid in a coffin of pyperle, and to be adorned with princelie garments, hauing a chaine of gold about his necke, and rich rings on his fingers. And to shew what loue and affection he bare vnto him in his life time, the king caused the coffin to be opened, that he might behold his face bared, and touch him with his hands: he honored his funerall erequies with his presence, accompained with the countesse of Drenford, mother to the said duke, the archbishop of Canturburie, and manie other bishops, abbats, and priors: but of noble men there were verie few, for they had not yet digested the ennie and hatred which they had conceiued against him.

The Calcoignes sent vnto the Rich. signifying vnto him, that they ought not to be di-uiced from the crowne.

In this meane while, the duke of Lancaster was in Calcoigne, treating with the lords of the coun-trie, and the inhabitants of the good townes, which utterlie refused to receiue him otherwise than as a lieutenant of the king of England, and in the end addressed messengers into England, to signifie to the king, that they had bene accustomed to be gouerned by kings, and meant not now to become subiects to anie other, contrarie to all reason, sith the king could not (sauiug his oth) alien them from the crowne. The duke of Lancaster vied all waies he might deuise, how to win their good willes, and had sent also certeine of his trustie counsellors ouer hither into England, as sir William Perreer, sir Peter Clifton, and two clerkes learned in the lawe, the one called maister John Huech, and the other maister John Richards a canon of Leicester, to plead and sollicit his cause.

But to be breefe, such reasons were shewed, and such matter unfolded by the Calcoignes, whie they ought not be separated from the crowne of England, that finally (notwithstanding the duke of Glocester, and certeine other were against them) it was decreed, that the countrie and duchie of Aquitaine should remaine still in demesne of the crowne of England, least that by this transporting thereof, it might fortune in time, that the heritage thereof should fall into the hands of some stranger, and enemie to the English nation, so that then the homage and souereigntie might perhaps be lost for euer. Indeed, the duke of Gloucester, being a prince of an high mind, & loth to haue the duke of Lancaster at home, being so highlie in the kings fauor, could haue bene well pleased, that he should haue enioied his gift, for that he thought thereby to haue bothe all the rule about the king, for the duke of Bozke was a man rather coueting to liue in pleasure, than to deale with much businesse, and the weightie affaires of the realme.

About the same time, or somewhat before, the king sent an ambassage to the French king, the archbishop of Dublin, the earle of Rutland, the earle Har-shall, the lord Beaumont, the lord Spenser, the lord Clifford named Lewes, and twenty knights with fortie esquiers. The cause of their going ouer, was to intreat of a marriage to be had betwixt him, and the ladie Isabell, daughter to the French king, the being as then not past eight yeares of age, which before had bene promised vnto the duke of Britaines sonne: but in consideration of the great benefit that was likelie to insue by this communication and aliance with England, there was a meane found to vndoe that knot, though not presentlie. These English lords, at their comming to Paris, were tofullie receiued, and so courteously intertained, banquetted, feasted, and cherished, and that in most honorable sort, as nothing could be more: all their charges and erpenes were borne by the French king, and when they should depart, they receiued for answer of their message, verie comfortable words, and so with hope to haue their matter sped, they returned.

But now when the duke of Lancaster had, by law-eng forth an inestimable masse of treasure purchased in a manner the good willes of them of Aquitaine, and compassed his whole desire, he was suddenlie countermanded home by the king, and so to satisfie the kings pleasure, he returned into England, and comming to the king at Langley, where he held his Christmasse, was receiued with more honor than loue, as was thought; whereupon he rode in all hast that might be to Lincoln, where Katharine Swinford as then late, whom shortlie after the Epiphanie, he toke to wife. This woman was borne in Belnault, daughter to a knight of that countrie, called sir Paou de Ruet: she was brought vp in hir youth, in the duke of Lancasters house, and attended on his first wife the duchesse Blanch of Lancaster, and in the daies of his second wife the duchesse Constance, he kept the foresaid Katharine as his concu-bine, who afterwards was married to a knight of England, named Swinford, that was now deceased. Before she was married, the duke had by hir three children, two sonnes and a daughter; one of the sons was named Thomas de Beaumont, & the other Henrie, who was brought vp at Aken in Almaine,

The duke of

ried a ladie of a meane estate, whose he had kept as his concubine

procured a good lawyer, and was after bishop of Exeter.

For the love that the duke had to these his children, he married their mother the said Katharine Swinford, being now a widow, whereof men marvelled much, considering his meane estate was farre vnmet to match with his highnesse, and nothing comparable in honoz to his other two former wiues. And indeed, the great ladies of England, as the duchesses of Glocester, the countesses of Derby, Arundell and others, descended of the blood roiall, greatlie disdeined, that she should be matched with the duke of Lancaster, and by that means be accounted second person in the realme, and preferred in some before them, and therefore they said, that they would not come in anie place where she should be present, for it should be a shame to them that a woman of so base birth, and concubine to the duke in his other wiues daies, should go and haue place before them. The duke of Glocester also, being a man of an high mind and stout stomach, misliked his brothers matching so meanelie, but the duke of Yorke bare it well inough, and berelie, the ladie his selfe was a woman of such bringing vp, and honorable demicanz, that enie could not in the end but giue place to well deseruing. About this season, the doctrine of of John Wickliffe still nightlie spread abroad here in England. The schisme also still continued in the church, betwixt the two factions of cardinals French and Romane, for one of their popes could no soner be dead, but that they ordined an other in his place.

In this eighteenth yeare also was a wonderfull tempest of wind in the months of Iulie and August, and also most speciallie in September, by violence whereof, in sundrie places of this realme, great and wonderfull hurt was done, both in churches and houses. The ambassadoz that had bene latelie in France, about the treatie of the marriage (as before we haue heard) went thither againe, and so after that the two kings by sending to and fro were growne to certeine points and covenants of agreement, the earle marshall, by letters of procuration, married the ladie Isabel, in name of king Richard, so that from thenceforth she was called queene of England. Amongst other covenants and articles of this marriage, there was a truce accorded, to indure betwixt the two realms of England and France, for tearme of thirtie yeares. The pope wrote to king Richard, beseeching him to assist the prelates against the Lollards (as they tearmed them) whom he pronounced to be traitors, both to the church and kingdome, and therefore he besought him to take order for the punishment of them, whom the prelates should denounce to be heretikes.

At the same time, he sent a bull reuocatorie concerning religious men, that had either at his hands or at the hands of his legats or nuncios purchased to be his chapleins, and accompting themselves there, by exempt from their order; so that now they were by this reuocatorie bull, appointed to returne to their order, and to obserue all rules thereto belonging. This liked the friers well, namelie the minors, that sought by all means they might deuise, how to bring their brethren home againe, which by such exemptions in being the popes chapleins, were segregated & diuided from the residue of their fraternitie or brotherhood. The king in this twentieth yeare of his teigne, went ouer to Calis with his vnckles the dukes of Yorke and Glocester, and a great manie of other lords and ladies of honour, and thither came to him the duke of Burgonie, and so they communed of the peace. There was no entinie to the conclusion thereof but the duke of Glocester, who shewed well by his words that he wished rather war than peace, in somuch as the king stood in doubt of him, least he would procure some rebellion against him by his subiects, whom he knew not to fauour greatly this new alliance with France.

The king after the duke of Burgonie had talked with him thoughtlie of all things, and was departed from him, returned into England (leaving the ladies still at Calis) to open the covenants of the marriage and peace vnto his subiects, and after he had finished with that businesse, and vnderstood their minds, he went againe to Calis, and with him his two vnckles, of Lancaster and Glocester, and diuerse prelates and lordes of the realme; and shortly after came the French king to the bankside of Arde, accompanied with the dukes of Burgonie, Berry, Britaine and Bourbon. There was set vp for the king of England a right faire and rich pavilion a little beyond Guines within the English pale; and another the like pavilion was pight vp also for the French king on this side Arde, within the French dominion; so that betwixt the said pavilions was the distance of thre score & ten paces, and in the midwaie betwixt them both, was ordeined the third pavilion, at the which both kings comming from either of their tents sundrie times should meet and haue communication together.

The distance betwixt the two tents was beset on either side in time of the intervieu with knights armed with their swords in their hands; that is to say, on the one side stood foure hundred French knights in armor with swords in their hands, and on the other side foure hundred English knights armed with swords in their hands, making as it were a lane betwixt them through the which the two kings came and met, with such noble men as were appointed to attend them. And a certeine distance from the two first pavilions, were appointed to stand such companies of men as either of them by appointment had conuanted to bring with them. The two kings before their meeting, receiued a solemne oth for assurance of their faithfull and true meaning, to obserue the sacred lawes of amitie one toward an other in that their intervieu, so as no damage, violence, molestation, arrest, disturbance, or other inconuenience should be practised by them, or their friends and subiects; and that if anie disorder rose through anie mishap, arrogancie, or strife moued by anie person, the same should be reformed, promising in the words of princes to assist one an other in suppressing the malice of such as should presume to do or attempt anie thing that might sound to the breach of friendlie amitie, during the time of that assemble eight daies before, and seven daies after.

On the fir and twentieth of October, the king of England remoued from Calis toward the castell of Guines, and with him the duke of Berry, who was sent to take his oth. The morow after, being the euen of Simon and Jude, the kings met, and the lordes of France, to wit, the duke of Berry, Burgonie, Orleans, and Bourbon, the earle of Sanoie, the vicount of Speaur, and others conueied the king of England; and from him were sent to conduct the French king diuerse of the English lordes, as the two dukes of Lancaster and Glocester, foure earles; to wit, of Derby, Rutland, Nottingham, and Northumberland. After the two kings were come together into the tent for that purpose prepared, it was first accorded betwixt them, that in the same place where they thus met, should be builded of both their costs a chapell for a perpetuall memorie, which should be called The chapell of our ladie of peace. On saturdaye being the feast daie of the apostles Simon and Jude, the kings talked together of certeine articles touching ding the treatie of peace, and hauing concluded by on the same, they receiued either of them an oth vpon the holie Euangelists, to obserue and keepe all the covenants accorded vpon.

On the mondaie the French king came to the king of England his pavillion, and the same time was brought thither the yong queene Isabell daughter to the French king; who there deliuered hir vnto king Richard, who taking hir by the hand kissed hir, & gave to hir father great thanks for that so honorable and gracions a gift, openlie protesting, that vpon the conditions concluded betwixt them, he did receiue hir, that by such assent both the realmes might continue in quietnesse, and come to a good end and perfect conclusion of a perpetuall peace. The queene was committed to the duchesses of Lancaster & Glocester, to the countesses of Huntingdon and Stafford, to the marchionesse of Dublin daughter to the lord Con-ric, to the ladies of Hamure, Woinings, and others; which with a noble traine of men and horses, conueied hir to Calis: for there were twelve charrets full of ladies & gentlewomen. This done, the kings came together into the king of Englands pavillion to dinner. The French king sate on the right side of the hall, and was roiallie serued after the manner of his countrie, that is to saie, of all maner of meats appointed to be serued at the first course in one mightie large dish or platter, and likewise after the same sort at the second course. But the king of England was serued after the English manner. When the tables were taken vp, and that they had made an end of dinner, the kings kissed ech other, and toke their horses. The R. of England brought the French king on his waie, and at length they toke leaue either of other, in shaking hands and embracing on horsebacke. The French king rode to Arde, and the king of England returned to Calis.

¶ We haue omitted (as things superfluous to speake of) all the honorable demerit and courteous interreinment used and shewed betwixt these princes and noble men on both parts, their sundrie fea-stings and banquetings, what rich apparell, plate, and other furniture of cupboards and tables, the princelie gifts and rich iewels which were presented from one to another, struing (as it might seme) who should shew himselfe most bounteous and liberall: beside the gifts which the king of England gaue vnto the French king, and to the nobles of his realme (which amounted aboue the summe of ten thousand marks) the R. of England spending at this time (as the same went) aboue three hundred thousand marks. After the kings returne to Calis on wednesday next in-suing, being All hallows daie, in solemne wise he married the said ladie Isabell in the church of saint Nicholas, the archbishop of Canturburie doing the office of the minister.

The thursdaie after, the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon came to Calis to see the king & the queene: and on the fridaie they toke their leaue and departed, and rode to saint Omers to the French king.
On the same daie in the morning the king and the queene toke their ship, and had faire passage: for within three houres they arrived at Dover, from whence they sped them towards London, whereof the citizens being warned, made out certaine horsemen well appointed in one luerie of colour, with a deuile imbrodered on their sleeves, that euerie compantie might be knowne from other, the which with the mayor and his brethren, clothed in skarlet, met the king and queene on Blackheath, and there doing their duties with humble reverence attended vpon their maiesties till they came to Westminster: where the king comanded the mayor with his compantie to returne, for that he was appointed to lodge that night at Westminster.

Shortlie after, to wit, the thirteenth of Nouember, the yong queene was conueied from thence with great pompe vnto the Tower, at which time there was such pteale on London bridge, that by reason thereof, certeine persons were thrust to death: among the which the prior of Ciptrie, a place in C-ter was one, and a worshipfull matrone in Coznehill an other. The morow after she was conueied to Westminster with all the honoz that might be deu-sed, and finally she crowned queene vpon sun-daie being then the seauenth of Januarie. On the two and twentieth of Januarie was a parlement begun at Westminster, in which the duke of Lancaster caused to be legitimated the issue which he had begot of Katharine Swinfort, before she was his wife. At the same time Thomas Beaufort came to the said duke, by the said Katharine, was created earle of Sommerfet. ¶ There was an ordinance made in the saime parlement, that iustices should not haue arie to sit with them as assistants. ¶ Aftercouer, there was a tenth granted by the clergie to be paid to the kings ble at two severall termes in that present peare. In this peare the king contrarie to his oth reuoked the iustices forth of Ireland, whom by constraint (as before ye haue heard) he was enforced to banish, thereby to satisfie the noble men that would haue it so.

In this twentieth peare of his reigne king Richard receiuing the summones of monie (for the which the strong towne of West was ingaged to him) by writ counsell (as manie thought) deliuered it vnto the duke of Britaine, by reason whereof no small sparke of displeasure arose betwixt the king and the duke of Glocester, which kindled by such a flame (as it was easie to do) finding matter enough to feed vpon in both their bress, that finally it could no longer be kept downe, nor by anie meanes quenched. In the moneth of Februarie, the king holding a sumptuous feast at Westminster, many of the soldiors that were newlie come from West pleased into the hall, and kept a roome together. Whom as the duke of Glocester beheld, and vnderstood what they were, to remember how that towne was giuen by contrarie to his mind and pleasure, it grieved him not a little: and therefore as the king was entred into his chamber, and few about him, he could not forbear, but brake forth, and said to the king: Sir, saw ye not those felowes that sate in such number this daie in the hall, at such a table? The king answered that he saw them, and asked the duke what they were? To whom the duke made this answer: Sir, these be the soldiors that came from West, and haue nothing now to take for, nor yet know how to thift for their linings, and the worse, for that (as I am informed) they haue bene euill paid. When said the king; What is against my will, for I would that they should haue their due wages; and if anie haue cause to complaine, let them shew the matter to the tresuroz, and they shall be reasonable answered: and herewith he commanded that they should be appointed to foure certeine villages about London, there to remaine, and to haue meate, drinke, and lodging vpon his charges till they were paid.

Thus as they fell into reasoning of this matter, the duke said to the king: Sir, your grace ought to put your bodie in paine to win a strong hold or towne by seats of war, yer you take vpon you to sell or deliuer anie towne or strong hold gotten with great adventure by the manhod and pollice of your noble progenitours. To this the king with changed countenance answered and said: Uncle, how say you that? And the duke boldlie without feare recited the same againe, not changing one word in anie better sort.
¶ Wherevpon the king being more chafed, replied; Sir, cc thinke you that I am a merchant, as a berie sole, to sell my lund: By saint John Baptiste no; but truth it is, that our cosine the duke of Britayne hath satisfied us in all such summes of monie as our progenitors lent unto him, and to his ancestors, upon gage of the said towne of Brest, for the which reason and conscience will no lesse but that the towne should thereupon be to him restored. Upon this multiplieng of wordes in such presumptuous manner by the duke against the king, there kindled such displeasure he thort them, that it never ceased to increase into flames, till the duke was brought to his end.

The earle of saint Paule his counsell to
R. Richard.

The earle of saint Paule at his last coming into England to receiue king Richards oth for observing the truce, had conference with the king of diuerse matters. The king by wate of complaint, thewed unto him how little the duke of Gloucester was in hindering all such matters as he would haue go forward, not onlie seeking to haue the peace broken betwixt the realmes of England & France, but also promoting trouble at home, by stirring the people to rebellion. The earle of saint Paule hearing of this stout demeanor of the duke, told the king that it should be best to provide in time against such mischeifs as might insue thereof, and that it was not to be suffered, that a subiea should behave himselfe in such sort toward his prince. The king marking his wordes, thought that he gaue him good and faithfull counsell, and thereupon determined to suppress both the duke and other of his complices, and toke more diligent regard to the salengs & doings of the duke than before he had done. And as it cometh to passe that those which suspect anie euill, do euer deeme the worst, so he toke euerie thing in euill part, insomuch that he complained of the duke unto his brethren the dukes of Lancaster and Yorke, in that he should stand against him in all things and seeke his destruction, the death of his counsellors, and ouerthrow of his realme.

The dukes of Lancaster & Yorke extol
the duke of Gloucester to the king.

The two dukes of Lancaster and Yorke to deliuer the kings mind of suspicion, made answer, that they were not ignorant, how their brother of Gloucester, as a man sometime rash in wordes, would speake oftentimes more than he could or would bring to effect, and the same proceeded of a faithfull hart, which he bare towards the king, for that it grieved him to vnderstand, that the confines of the English dominions should in anie wise be diminished: therefore his grace ought not to regard his wordes, sith he should take no hurt thereby. These persuations quieted the king for a time, till he was informed of the practise which the duke of Gloucester had continued (as the same went amongst diuerse persons) to imprison the king. For then the duke of Lancaster and Yorke, first repprouing the duke of Gloucester for his too liberall talking, uttering vnadvisedlie wordes that became not his person, and which to haue concealed had tended more to the opinion of vertue, than to lash out whatsoever his vnfaied mind afforded, which is a great fault (as in effect the poet noteth: 60

Eximia est virtus prestare silentia rebus,

At contra gravis est culpa tacenda loqui) and perceuing that he set nothing by their wordes, were in doubt least if they should remaine in the court still, he would upon a presumptuous mind, in trust to be borne out by them, attempt some outrageous enterpryse. Wherefore they thought best to depart for a time into their countries, that by their absence he might the sooner learne to staie himselfe for doubt of further displeasure. But it came to passe, that their departing from the court was the casting awaie of the duke of Gloucester. For after that they were gone, there ceased not such as bare him euill will, to procure the R. to dispatch him out of the way.

The duke in deed sore stomached the matter, that his counsell might not be followed in all things, and speciallie for that he saw (as he toke it) that the king was misled by some persons that were about him, otherwise than stood with his honor: for refection thereof, he conferred with the abbat of saint Albons, and the prior of Westminster. The abbat was both his cosine and godfather: and having on a date both the duke and the prior at his house in saint Albons, after dinner he fell in talke with the duke and prior, and amongst other communication requested of the prior to tell truth, whether he had anie vision the night before or not. The prior seemed loth to make a direct answer, but at length being earnestly requested as well by the abbat as the duke, he declared that he had a vision in deed, which was, that the realme of England should be destroyed through the misgouernement of king Richard. By the virgin Marie, said the abbat, I had the verie same vision. The duke hereupon disclosed unto them all the secrets of his mind; and by their desires presentlie contrived an assemble of diuerse great lords of the realme at Arundell castell that daie forthwith, at what time he himselfe appointed to be there, with the earles of Derby, Arundell, Spershall, and Gloucestre: also the archbishop of Canturburie, the abbat of saint Albons, the prior of Westminster, with diuerse others.

These estates being come to Arundell castell at the daie appointed, about the verie beginning of the one and thirtieth yeare of king Richards reigne, they swore ech to other to be assistant in all such matters as they should determine, and therewith received the sacrament at the hands of the archbishop of Canturburie, who celebrated masse before them the morow after. Which done, they withdrew into a chamber, and fell in counsell together, where in the end they light upon this point; to take king Richard, the dukes of Lancaster & Yorke, and commit them to prison, and all the other lords of the kings counsell they determined should be strangled and hanged. Such was their purpose which they ment to haue accomplished in August following. But the earle marshall that was lord deputie of Calis, and had married the earle of Arundells daughter, discovered all their counsell to the king, and the verie daie in which they should begin their enterpryse. The king had the earle marshall take heed what he had said, for if it proved not true, he should repent it: but the earle constantlie hereunto answered, that if the matter might be proved otherwise, he was contented to be strangled and quartered.

The king hereupon went to London, where he dined at the house of his brother the earle of Huntington in the street behind All halloves church upon the banke of the riuer of Thames, which was a right faire and statelie house. After dinner, he gaue his counsell to vnderstand all the matter; by whose aduise it was agreed, that the king should assemble forthwith what power he might conuenientlie make of men of armes & archers, and straightwaies take horse, accompanied with his brother the earle of Huntington, & the earle marshall. Hereupon at six of the clocke in the afternone, the last houre when they used to go to supper, the king mounted on horsebacke, and rode his waie; whereof the Londoners had great marvell. After that the king began to approach the dukes house at Westmister, where he then laie, he commanded his brother the earle of Huntington to ride afoze, to know if the duke were at home, and if he were, then to tell him that the king was coming at hand to speake with him.

all the night before, as should appeare by his iournie) came to the house, and entering into the court, asked if the duke were at home, and understanding by a gentlewoman that made him answer, that both the duke and duchesse were yet in bed, he besought hir to go to the duke, and to shew him that the king was comming at hand to speake with him, and forthwith came the king with a competent number of men of armes, and a great companie of archers, riding in to the base court, his trumpets sounding before him. The duke herewith came downe into the base court, where the king was, hauing none other apparell vpon him, but his shirt, and a cloke or a mantell cast about his shoulders, and with humble reuerence said that his grace was welcome, asking of the lords how it chanced they came so earlie, and sent him no word of their comming. The king herewith courteously requested him to go and make him readie, and appoint his horse to be fabled, for that he must needs ride with him a little waite, and conferre with him of businesse. The duke went by againe into his chamber to put vpon him his clothes, and the king alighting from his horse, fell in talke with the duchesse and hir ladies. The earle of Huntington and diuerse other followed the duke into the hall, and there staid for him, till he had put on his raiment. And within a while they came forth againe all together into the base court, where the king was deliuiting with the duchesse in pleasant talke, whom he willed now to returne to hir lodging againe, for he might staid longer, and so toke his horse againe, and the duke likewise. But shortly after that the king and all his companie were gone forth of the gate of the base court, he commanded the earle marshall to apprehend the duke, which incontinentlie was done according to the kings appointment.

Here we find some variance in writers. For as by an old french pamphlet (which I haue seene) it should appeare, the king commanded first, that this duke should be conueied vnto the towre, where he ment to commen with him, & not in any other place: but neuerthelesse, the king shortly after appointed, that he should be sent to Calis, as in the same pamphlet is also conteined. Other write, that immediatlie vpon his apprehension, the earle marshall conueied him vnto the Thames, and there being set aboard in a ship prepared of purpose, he was brought to Calis, where he was at length dispatched out of life, either strangled or smothered with pillowes (as some do write.) For the king thinking it not good, that the duke of Glocester should stand to his answer openly, because the people bare him so much good will, sent one of his iustices called William Biskill, an Irishman borne, ouer vnto Calis, there to inquire of the duke of Glocester, whether he had committed any such treasons as were alledged against him, and the earles of Arundell and Marlowe, as after shall be specified. Justice Biskill hearing what he confessed vpon his examination, wrote the same as he was commanded to do, and therewith speedilie returned to the king, and as it hath bene reported, he informed the king (whether trulie or not, I haue not to say) that the duke frankly confessed euerie thing, wherewith he was charged. Wherevpon the king sent vnto Thomas Mowbraye earle marshall and of Spotingham, to make the duke secretlie awaie.

The earle prolonged time for the executing of the kings commandement, though the king would haue had it done with all expedition, wherby the king conceived no small displeasure, and sware that it should cost the earle his life if he quickly obied not his commandement. The earle thus as it seemed in manner enforced, called out the duke at midnight, as if he should haue taken ship to passe ouer into England, and there in the lodging called the pynces In, he caused his servants to cast featherbeds vpon him, and to smother him to death, or otherwise to strangle him with towels (as some write.) This was the end of that noble man, fierce of nature, hastie, wilfull, and giuen more to war than to peace: and in this great lie to be discommended, that he was euer repining against the king in all things, whatsoeuer he wished to haue forward. He was thus made awaie not so lone as the bzute ran of his death. But (as it should appeare by some authors) he remained allue till the parlement that next ensued, and then about the same time that the earle of Arundell suffered, he was dispatched (as before ye haue heard.) His bodie was afterwards with all funerall pompe conueied into England, and buried at his owne manor of Plashie within the church there, in a sepulchre which he in his life time had caused to be made, and there erected.

The same euening that the king departed from London towards Plashie, to apprehend the duke of Glocester, the earle of Rutland and the earle of Kent were sent with a great number of men of armes and archers to arrest the erle of Arundell; which was done easilie enough, by reason that the said earle was trained with faire words at the kings hands, till he was within his danger: where otherwile he might haue bene able to haue saued himselfe, and deliuered his friends. The earle of Marlowe was taken, and committed to the towre the same day that the king had willed him to dinner, and shewed him verie good countenance. There were also apprehended and committed to the towre the same time, the lord John Cobham, and sir John Cheinie knights. The earle of Arundell was sent to the Ile of Wight, there to remaine as prisoner, till the next parlement, in the which he determined so to prouide, that they should be all condemned, and put to death. And for doubt of some commotion that might arise amongst the commons, he caused it by open proclamation to be signified, that these noblemen were not apprehended for any offense committed long agoe, but for new trespasses against the king, as in the next parlement should be manifestlie declared and proued.

Shortly after, he procured them to be indicted at Spotingham, suborning such as should appeale them in parlement, to wit, Edward earle of Rutland, Thomas Mowbraye earle marshall, Thomas Holland earle of Kent, John Holland earle of Huntington, Thomas Beaufort erle of Summerset, John Mowbraye earle of Salisbury, Thomas lord Spenser, and the lord William Scrope lord chamberleine. In the meane time, the king fearing that might be attempted against him by those that fauoured these noblemen that were in durance, sent for a power of Cheshire men, that might day and night keepe watch and ward about his person. They were about two thousand archers, paid weekelie, as by the annales of Britaine it appeareth. The king had little trust in any of the nobilitie, except in his brother the earle of Huntington, and the earle of Rutland sonne to the duke of Boke, and in the earle of Salisbury: in these onelie he reposed a confidence, and not in any other, except in certeine knights and gentlemen of his priuie chamber.

In the meane time, whiles things were thus in broile, before the beginning of the parlement, diuers other, beside them of whom we haue spoken, were apprehended and put in sundrie prisons. The parlement was summoned to begin at Westminster the 17 of September, and writs therevpon directed to euerie of the lords to appeare, and to bring with them a sufficient number of armed men and archers in their best arraio: for it was not knownen how the dukes of Lancaster and Boke would take the death of their brother, nor how other pères of the realme would take the apprehension and imprisonment of their kinsmen, the earles of Arundell and Warwike, and of the other prisoners. Suerlie the two dukes when they heard that their brother was so suddenly made awaie, they wist not what to saie to the matter, and began both to be sorrowfull for his death, and doubtfull of their owne states: for sith they saw how the king (abused by the counsell of euill men) abstained not from such an heinous ad, they thought he would afterwards attempt greater misorders from time to time. Therefore they assembled in all hast, great numbers of their seruants, friends, and tenants, and coming to London, were receiued into the citie. For the Londoners were right soie for the death of the duke of Glocester, who had euill sought their fauour, in somuch that now they would haue bene contented to haue ioined with the dukes in seeking reuenge of so noble a mans death, procured and brought to passe without law or reason, as the common byte then walked; although peradventure he was not as yet made awaie.

Here the dukes and other fell in counsell, and manie things were proponed. Some would that they shuld by force reuenge the duke of Glocesters death, other thought it met that the earles Marhall and Huntington, and certeine others, as chiefe authours of all the mischance should be pursued and punished for their demerites, hauing trained by the king in vice and euill customes, euen from his youth. But the dukes after their displeasure was somewhat asswaged; determined to coner the stings of their griefes for a time, and if the king would amend his maners, to forget also the iniuries past. In the meane time the king laie at Eltham, and had got about him a great power (namelic of those archers, which he had sent for out of Cheshire, in whome he put a singular trust more than in any other.)

There went messengers betwixt him and the dukes, which being men of honour did their indouour to appease both parties. The king discharged himselfe of blame for the duke of Glocesters death, considering that he had gone about to breake the truce, which he had taken with France, and also stirred the people of the realme to rebellion, and further had sought the destruction and losse of his life, that was his soueraigne lord and lawfull king. Contrariwise, the dukes assured, that their brother was wrongfullie put to death, hauing done nothing worthe of death. At length, by the intercession and meanes of those noble men that went to and fro betwixt them, they were accorded, & the king promised from thenceforth to do nothing but by the assent of the dukes: but he kept small promise in this behalfe, as after well appeared.

When the time came, that the parlement shoulde be holden at Westminster, according to the tenour of the summons, the lords repaired thither, furnished with great retinues both of armed men and archers, as the earle of Derby, the earle Marhall, the earle of Kentland, the lord Spenser, the earle of Northumberland, with his sonne the lord Henrie Percy, and the lord Thomas Percy the said earles brother, also the lord Scrope treasurer of England, & diuerse other. All the which earles and lords brought with them a great & strong power, euerie of them in their best array, as it were to strengthen the king against his enemies. The dukes of Lancaster and Yorkie were likewise there, giuing their attendance on the king with like furniture of men of armes & archers. There was not halfe lodging sufficient within the citie & suburbs of London for such companys of men as the lords brought with them to this parlement, called the great parlement: in somuch that they were constrained to lie in villages abroad ten or twelue miles on ech side the citie.

In the beginning of this parlement, the king greatly complained of the misdeemeanour of the pères and lords of his realme, as well for the things done against his will and pleasure, whiles he was young, as for the streit dealing, which they had shewed towards the quene, who was threë houres at one time on his knees before the earle of Arundell, for one of his esquiers, named John Caluerlie, who neuer the lesse had his head smit fro his shoulders, & all the answer that he could get, was this: Madam, praye for your selfe, and your husband, for that is best, and let this sute alone. Those that set forth the kings greunances, as prolocutors in this parlement were these: John Bushie, William Bagot, and Thomas Cræne. The king had caused a large house of timber to be made within the palace at Westminster, which he was called an hall, covered aboue head with tiles, and was open at the ends, that all men might see through it. This house was of so great a compasse, that scarce it might stand within the romie of the palace. In this house was made an high throne for the king, and a large place for all estates besides to sit in. There were places also made for the appellants to stand on the one side, and the defendants on the other, and a like romie was made behind for the knights and burgeses of the parlement. There was a place deuised for the speaker, named sir John Bushie, a knight of Lincolnshire, accounted to be an exceeding cruell man, ambitious, and couetous beyond measure.

Immediatlie after, ech man being placed in his romie, the cause of assembling that parlement was shewed, as that the king had called it for reformation of diuerse transgressions and oppressions committed against the peace of his land by the duke of Glocester, the earles of Arundell, Warwike, and others. Then sir John Bushie stood forth, and made request on the behalfe of the communalte, that it might please the kings highnesse for their heinous ads attempted against his lawes and roiall maiestie, to appoint them punishment according to their desertings, and speciallie to the archbishop of Canturburie (who then sat next the king) whome he accused of high treason, for that he had euill counselled his maiestie, inducing him to grant his letters of pardon to his brother the earle of Arundell, being a ranke traitor.

When the archbishop began to answer in his owne defense, the king willed him to sit downe againe and to hold his peace, for all shoulde be well. Here with sir John Bushie besought the king, that the archbishop shoulde not be admitted to make his answer, which if he did, by reason of his great wit and good behaviour, he feared least he shoulde lead men awaie to beleue him: so the archbishop might be heard no further. Sir John Bushie in all his talke, when he proponed any matter vnto the king, did not attribute to him titles of honour, due and accustomed, but inuented vnused termes and such strange names, as were rather agreeable to the diuine maiestie of God, than to any earthlie potentate. The prince being desirous inough of all honour, and more ambitious than was requisite, seemed to like well of his speech, and gaue god care to his talke.

Thus when the archbishop was constrained to keepe silence, sir John Bushie proceeded in his purpose, requiring on the behalfe of the commons, that the charters of pardons granted vnto the traitors, to wit, the duke of Glocester, and the earles of Arundell and Warwike, shoulde be reuoked by consent of all the estates now in parlement assembled. The king also for his part protested, that those pardons were not voluntarie granted by him, but rather extorted by compulsion, and therefore he besought them that euerie man would shew forth their opinions what they thought thereof. There were two other persons of great credit with the king, besides sir John Bus-sie, that were, as before ye haue heard, verie earnest to haue those charters of pardon reuoked and made void, to wit, sir William Bagot, and sir Thomas Crene.

But bicause this matter seemed to require good deliberation, it was first put to the bishops, who with small adu gaue sentence, that the said charters were renocable, and might well inough be called in: yet the archbishop of Canturburie in his answer here-unto said, that the king from whome those pardons came, was so high an estate, that he durst not saie, that anie such charters by him granted, might be renoked: notwithstanding, his brethren the bishops thought otherwise: not considering (saith Thomas Wallingham) that such reuoking of the kings charters of pardon should sound highlie to the kings dishonor: forsomuch as mercie and pardoning transgressions is accounted to be the confirmation and establishing of the kings seat and roiall estate.

The temporall lords perceiving what the bishops had done, did likewise giue their consents, to reuoke the same pardons: but the iudges with those that were toward the law, were not of this opinion, but finallie the bishops pretending a scrupulositie, as if they might not with safe consciences be present where iudgement of blood should passe, they appointed a laie man to be their prolocutor, to serue that turne. To conclude, at length all manner of charters of pardon were made void, for that the same seemed to impeach the suertie of the kings person. When sir John Bussie and his associates had obtained that reuocation, it was further by them declared, that the earle of Arundell had yet an other speciall charter of pardon for his owne person, which he had obtained after the first. And therefore sir John Bussie ear-nestlie requested in name of the communalitie that the same might likewise be reuoked.

The question then was asked of the bishops, who declared themselves to be of the like opinion, touching that charter, as they were of the other. At that selie time the archbishop of Canturburie absented himselfe from the parlement, in hope that the king would be his friend, and stand his verie good lord, for that he had promised nothing should be done against him in the parlement whilst he was absent. But nevertheless, at the importunate sute of the said sir John Bussie and others, the archbishop was condemned unto perpetuall exile, and appointed to auoid the realme within six weekes. And therewith the king sent secretlie to the pope for order that the archbishop might be removed from his see to some other, which sute was obtained, and Roger Walden lord treasurer was ordeined archbishop in his place, as after shall appeare.

On the feast daie of saint Mattheu, Richard sitting Alone, earle of Arundell, was brought forth to swaie before the king and whole parlement to such articles as he was to be charged with. And as he stood at the bar, the lord Penill was commanded by the duke of Lancaster, which sat that daie as high steward of England, to take the hood from his necke, and the girle from his waste. When the duke of Lancaster declared unto him, that for his manifold rebellions and treasons against the kings maiestie he had bene arrested, and hitherto kept in ward, and now at the petition of the lords and commons, he was called to answer such crimes as were there to be obtained against him, and so to purge himselfe, or else to suffer for his offences, such punishment as law appointed.

First, he charged him, for that he had traitorously risen in armour against the king in companie of the duke of Gloucester, and of the earle of Warwick, to the breach of peace, and disquieting of the realme.
His answer hereto was, that he did not this upon anie euill meaning towards the kings person, but rather for the benefit of the king and realme, if it were interpreted aright, and taken as it ought to be. It was further demanded of him, whie he procured letters of pardon from the k. if he knew himselfe gilt-lesse. He answered, that he did not purchase them for anie feare he had of faults committed by him, but to staie the malicious speech of them that neither loued the king nor him. He was againe asked, whether he would denie that he had made anie such rode with the persons before named, and that in companie of them he entred not armed unto the kings presence against the kings will and pleasure? To this he answered, that he could not denie it, but that he so did.

Then the speaker sir John Bussie, with open mouth, besought that iudgement might be had against such a traitour: and pour faithfull commons (said he to the king) aske and require that so it may be done. The earle turning his head aside, quietlie said to him; Not the kings faithfull commons require this, but thou, and what thou art I know. Then the eight appellants standing on the other side, cast their gloues to him, and in prosecuting their appeale (which alreadie had bene read) offered to fight with him man to man to iustifie the same. Then said the earle, If I were at libertie, and that it might so stand with the pleasure of my soueraigne, I would not refuse to proue you all liars in this behalfe. Then spake the duke of Lancaster, saieing to him; What haue you further to saie to the points before laid against you?
He answered, that of the kings grace he had his letters of generall pardon, which he required to haue allowed. Then the duke told him, that the pardon was reuoked by the prelates and noble men in the parlement, and therefore willed him to make some other answer. The earle told him againe that he had an other pardon vnder the kings great seale, granted him long after of the kings owne motion, which also he required to haue allowed. The duke told him, that the same was likewise reuoked. After this, when the earle had nothing more to saie for himselfe, the duke pronounced iudgement against him, as in cases of treason is vsed.

But after he had made an end, and paused a little, he said: The king our soueraigne lord of his mercie and grace, bicause thou art of his blood, and one of the peeres of the realme, hath remitted all the other paines, sauing the last, that is to saie, the beheading, and so thou shalt onelie lose thy head; and forthwith he was had awaie, & led through London vnto the Tower hill. There went with him to see the execution done six great lords, of whome there were three earles, Nottingham (that had married his daughter) Kent (that was his daughters son) and Huntington, being mounted on great horses, with a great companie of armed men, and the fierce bands of the Cheshire-men, furnished with ares, swords, bowes and arrowes, marching before and behind him, who onelie in this parlement had licence to beare weapon, as some haue written. When he should depart the palace, he desired that his hands might be loosed to dispose such monie as he had in his purse, betwixt that place and Charingcrosse. This was permitted, and so he gaue such monie as he had in almes with his owne hands, but his armes were still bound behind him.

When he came to the Tower hill, the noble men that were about him, moued him right earnestlie to acknowledge his treason against the king. But he in no wise would so do, but maintained that he was neuer traitour in word or deed: and herewith perceiving the earles of Nottingham and Kent, that stood by with other noble men busie to further the execution (being as ye have heard) of him and alied to him, he spake to them, and said: Trulie it would haue bene seemed you rather to haue bene absent than here at this businesse. But the time will come yet it be long, when as manie shall meruell at your misfortune as do now at mine. After this, forgiuing the executioner, he besought him not to torment him long, but to strike off his head at one blowe, and falling the edge of the sword, whether it was sharpe enough or not, he said: It is verie well, do that thou hast to do quickly, and so kneeling downe, the executioner with one stroke, strake off his head: his bodie was buried together with his head in the church of the Augustine friers in Breadstreet within the citie of London.

The execution of the earle of Arundell.

The death of this earle was much lamented among the people, considering his sudden fall and miserable end, where as not long before among all the noblemen of this land (within the which was such a number, as no countrie in the world had greater store at that present) there was none more esteemed: so noble and valiant he was, that all men spake honour of him. After his death, as the same went, the king was sore vexed in his sleepe with horrible dreames, imagining that he saw this earle appeare unto him threatening him, & putting him in horrible feare, as if he had said with the poet to king Richard;

Nunc quod factorum venio memor umbra tuorum, Insequor & vultus officia forma tuos.

Quid.

With which visions being sore troubled in sleepe, he cursed the daie that ever he knew the earle. And he was the more vnquiet, because he heard it reported, that the common people toke the erle for a martyr, inso much that some came to visit the place of his sepulture, for the opinion they had conceived of his holinesse. And where it was bytuted abroad as for a miracle, that his head should be growne to his bodie againe, the tenth daie after his buriall, the king sent about ten of the clocke in the night, certeine of the nobilitie to see his bodie taken vp, that he might be certified of the truth. Which done, and perceiving it was a fable, he commanded the friers to take downe his armes that were set vp about the place of his buriall, and to cover the graue, so as it should not be perceived where he was buried.

The earle of Warwike as reigned of treason.

But now to returne to the parlement. After the death of this earle, the lord Thomas Beauchampe earle of Warwike was brought forth to abide his trial by parlement, and when his accusers charged him in like points of treason, such as before were imputed to the earle of Arundell; he answered that he neuer meant euill to the kings person, nor thought that those rodes and assemblies that were made in companie of the duke of Gloucester, the earle of Arundell, and others, might not be accounted treason. But when the iudges had shewed him, that they could not be otherwise taken than for treason, he humbly besought the king of mercie and grace. The king then asked of him whether he had rid with the duke of Gloucester, and the earle of Arundell, as had bene alleged: He answered that he could not denie it, and wished that he had neuer seene them. Then said the king, Do ye not know that you are guiltie of treason: He answered againe, I acknowledge it; and with sobbing teares besought all them that were present, to make intercession to the kings maiestie for him.

Then the king and the duke of Lancaster communed, and after the king had a while with silence considered of the matter, he said to the earle; By saint John Baptiste, Thomas of Warwike, this confession that thou hast made, is vnto me more auailable than all the duke of Gloucesters and the earle of Warwikes lands. Herewith the earle making still intercession for pardon, the lords humbly besought the king to grant it. Finally the king pardoned him of life, but banished him into the Ile of Man, which then was the lord Scropes, promising that both he, and his wife, and children, should haue good intertainment. Which promise notwithstanding was but slenderly kept, for both the earle and the countesse liued in great penurie (as some write) and yet the lord Scrope, that was lord chamberleine, had allowed for the earles diet foure thousand nobles yerelie paid out of the kings coffers.

On the mondaie next after the arraignment of the earle of Warwike, to wit, the foure and twentie of September, was the lord John Cobham, and sir John Cheine arraigned, and found guiltie of like treasons for which the other had bene condemned before: but at the earnest instance and sute of the nobles, they were pardoned of life, and banished, or (as Fabian saith) condemned to perpetuall prison. The king desirous to see the force of the Londoners, caused them (during the time of this parlement) to muster before him on Blacke heath, where a man might haue seene a great number of able personages. And now after that the parlement had continued almost till Christmasse, it was adiourned vntill the quinden of S. Hilarie, then to begin againe at Shyrewelburie.

The king then came downe to Lichfield, and there held a roiall Christmasse, which being ended, he toke his iourne towards Shyrewelburie, where the parlement was appointed to begin in the quinden of saint Hilarie, as before ye haue heard. In which parlement there holden upon prorogation, for the loue that the king bare to the gentlemen and commons of the shire of Chesser, he caused it to be ordeined, that from thenceforth it should be called and knowne by the name of the principalitie of Chesser: and herewith he intituled himselfe prince of Chesser. He held also a roiall feast, keeping open household for all honest commers, during the which feast, he created five dukes and a duchesse, a marquesse, and foure earles. The earle of Derby was created duke of Hereford, the earle of Nottingham that was also earle marshall duke of Norfolk, the earle of Rutland duke of Auberle, the earle of Kent duke of Surrie, and the earle of Huntington duke of Worcester; the lady Margaret marshall countesse of Norfolk, was created duchesse of Norfolk; the earle of Summer set marques Dorset, the lord Spenser earle of Gloucester, the lord Beuill surnamed Mairable earle of Westmerland, the lord William Scrope lord chamberleine earle of Wiltshire, and the lord Thomas Berke lord steward of the kings house earle of Worcester.

And for the better maintenance of the estate of these noble men, whome he had thus aduanced to higher degrees of honour, he gaue vnto them a great part of those lands that belonged to the duke of Gloucester, the earles of Warwike, and Arundell. And now he was in good hope, that he had rooted vp all plants of treason, and therefore cared lesse who might be his friend or his fo, than before he had done, esteeming himselfe higher in degree than anie prince liuing, and so presumed further than ever his grandfather did, and toke vpon him to beare the armes of saint Edward, joining them vnto his owne armes. To conclude, what soeuer he then did, none durst speake a word contrarie thereto. And yet such as were chiefe of his counsell, were esteemed of the commons to be the worst creatures that might be,

The duke of Hereford appealed the duke of Dorset.

But now to proceed. In this parlement holden at Shyewsburie, the lord Reginald Cobham, being a verie aged man, simple and byright in all his dealings, was condemned for none other cause, but for that in the eleventh yere of the kings reigne he was appointed with other to be attendant about the king as one of his gouernours. The acts and ordinaunces also deuised and established in the parlement holden in the eleventh yere were likewise repealed. Moreover, in this parlement at Shyewsburie, it was decreed, that the lord John Cobham should be sent into the Isle of Gernesie, there to remaine in exile, hauing a small portion assigned him to liue vpon. The king so wrought & brought things about, that he obtained the whole power of both houses to be granted to certeine persons, as to John duke of Lancaster, Edmund duke of York, Edmund duke of Aumarle, Thomas duke of Surrie, John duke of Hereford, John marquisse Dorset, Roger earle of March, John earle of Salisburie, and Henrie earle of Northumberland, Thomas earle of Gloucester, and William earle of Arundell, John Bussy, Henrie Chelmeke, Robert Teie, and John Coulofer knights, or to leauen or eight of them. These were appointed to heare and determine certeine petitions and matters yet depending and not ended: but by vertue of this grant, they proceeded to conclude vpon other things, which generallie touched the knowledge of the whole parlement, in derogation of the states thereof, to the disadvantage of the king, and perillous example in time to come.

The authority of both houses in parliament granted to certeine persons.

binare desires. By means thereof, the lords of the realme began to feare their owne estates, being in danger of his furious outrage, whome they took for a man destitute of sobrietie and wisdom, and therefore could not like of him; that so abused his authority.

Hereupon there were sundrie of the nobles, that lamented these mischances, and specially the two their graces vnto such; by whose haughtie counsell they understood the king to be misled; and this they did, to the end that they being about him, might either turne their copies, and giue him better counsell; or else by having knowledge what euill report went of him, might mend his manners mislikes of his nobles. But all this in vaine; for so it fell out, that in this parlement holden at Shyewsburie, Henrie duke of Hereford accused Thomas Bolobzaie duke of Dorset, of certeine words which he should utter in talke had betwixt them, as they took together lately before betwixt London and Stratford, bounding highlie to the kings dishonour. And for further proofe thereof, he presented a supplication to the king, wherein he appealed the duke of Dorset in field of battell, for a traitor, false and disloyall to the king, and enemie vnto the realme. This supplication was read before both the dukes, in presence of the king: which done, the duke of Dorset took vpon him to answer it; declaring that whatsoeuer the duke of Hereford had said against him other than well, he lied falselike like an vntrue knight as he was. And when the king asked of the duke of Hereford what he said to it: he taking his hood off his head, said: My soueraigne lord, even as the supplication which I take you inposeth, right so I saie for truth, that Thomas Bolobzaie duke of Dorset is a traitour, false and disloyall to your roiall maiestie, your crowne, and to all the states of your realme.

The duke of Hereford appealed the duke of Dorset.

Thom. Walc.

When the duke of Dorset being asked what he said to this, he answered: Right vere lord, with your fauour that I make answer vnto your cosin here, I saie (your reuerence saued) that Henrie of Lancaster duke of Hereford, like a false and disloyall traitor as he is, doth lie, in that he hath said of me other wise than well. So more said the king, we haue heard enough; and herewith commanded the duke of Surrie for that turne marshall of England, to arrest in his name the two dukes: the duke of Lancaster father to the duke of Hereford, the duke of York the duke of Aumarle constable of England; and the duke of Surrie marshall of the realme vnder toke as pledges bodie for bodie for the duke of Hereford: but the duke of Northfolke was not suffered to put in pledges, and so vnder arrest was led vnto Windsoe castell, and there garded with keepers that were appointed to see him falselike kept.

The duke of Surrie marshall and the duke of Aumarle constable of England.

Now after the dissolving of the parlement at Shyewsburie, there was a date appointed about six weeks after; for the king to come vnto Windsoe, to heare and to take some order betwixt the two dukes, which had thus appealed ech other. There was a great scaffold erected within the castell of Windsoe for the king to sit with the lords and prelates of his realme: and so at the date appointed, he with the said lords & prelates being come thither and set in their places, the duke of Hereford appellant, and the duke of Dorset defendant, were sent for to come & appeare before the king, sitting there in his seat of iustice. And then began Sir John Bussy to speake for the king, declaring to the lords how they should understand, that where the duke of Hereford had presented a supplication to the king, who was there set to minister iustice to all men that would demand the same, as appertained to his roiall maiestie, he therefore would now heare what the parties could say one against an other, and to shall the king commanded the dukes of Aumarle and Surrie, the one being constable, and the other marshall, to go unto the two dukes, appellant and defendant, requiring them on his behalfe, to grow to some agreement: and for his part, he would be ready to pardon all that had bene said or done amisse betwixt them, touching any harme or dishonor to him or his realme: but they answered both assuredly, that it was not possible to haue any peace or agreement made betwixt them.

When he heard that they had answered, he commanded that they should be brought forthwith before his presence, to heare what they would say. Here with an herald in the kings name with loud voice commanded the dukes to come before the king, either of them to shew his reason, or else to make peace together without more delaye. When they were come before the king and lords, the king spake himselfe to them, willing them to agree, and make peace together: for it is (said he) the best waie ye can take. The duke of Posfolke with due reuerence hereunto answered it could not be so brought to passe, his honor faued. When the king asked of the duke of Hereford, what it was that he demanded of the duke of Posfolke, and what is the matter that ye can not make peace together, and become friends?

Then stood forth a knight; who asking and obtaining licence to speake for the duke of Hereford, said; Right deare and soueraine lord, here is Henric of Lancaster duke of Hereford and earle of Derbie, who saith, and I for him likewise say, that Thomas Mowbray duke of Posfolke is a false and disloyal traitor to you and your roiall maiestie, and to your whole realme: and likewise the duke of Hereford saith and I for him, that Thomas Mowbray duke of Posfolke hath receiued eight thousand nobles to pay the soldiers that kepe your towne of Calis, which he hath not done as he ought: and furthermore the said duke of Posfolke hath bene the occasion of all the treason that hath bene contriued in your realme for the space of these eightene yeares, & by his false suggestions and malicious counsell, he hath caused to die and to be murdered your right deare vnckle, the duke of Glocester, sonne to king Edward. Moreover, the duke of Hereford saith, and I for him, that he will proue this with his bodie against the bodie of the said duke of Posfolke within liks. The king herewith waxed angrie, and asked the duke of Hereford, if these were his words, who answered: Right deare lord, they are my words; and hereof I require right, and the battell against him.

There was a knight also that asked licence to speake for the duke of Posfolke, and obtaining, it began to answer thus: Right deare soueraine lord, here is Thomas Mowbray duke of Posfolke, who answereth and saith, and I for him, that all which Henric of Lancaster hath said and declared (sauiug the reuerence due to the king and his counsell) is a lie; and the said Henric of Lancaster hath falselie and wickedlye lied as a false and disloyal knight, and both hath bene, and is a traitor against you, your crowne, roiall maiestie, & realme. This will I proue and defend as becommeth a loiall knight to do with my bodie against his: right deare lord, I beseech you therefore, and your counsell, that it maie please you in your roiall discretion, to consider and marke, what Henric of Lancaster duke of Hereford, such a one as he is, hath said.

The king then demanded of the duke of Posfolke, if these were his words, and whether he had any more to saie. The duke of Posfolke then answered for himselfe: Right deare sir, true it is, that I haue receiued so much gold to paie your people of the towne of Calis; which I haue done, and I do anouch that your towne of Calis is as well kept at your commandement as euer it was at any time before, and that there neuer hath bene by any of Calis any complaint made unto you of me. Right deare and my soueraine lord, for the voiage that I made into France, about your marriage, I neuer receiued either gold or siluer of you, nor yet for the voiage that the duke of Aumarle & I made into Almane, where we spent great treasure: Marie true it is, that once I laid an ambush to haue slaine the duke of Lancaster, that there sitteth: but neuer the less he hath pardoned me thereof, and there was good peace made betwixt vs, for the which I yeld him hartie thanks. This is that which I haue to answer, and I am ready to defend my selfe against mine aduersarie; I beseech you therefore of right, and to haue the battell against him in upright iudgement.

After this, when the king had communed with his counsell a little, he commanded the two dukes to stand forth, that their answers might be heard. The king then caused them once againe to be asked, if they would agree and make peace together, but they both statlie answered that they would not: and withall the duke of Hereford cast downe his gage, and the duke of Posfolke took it vp. The king perceiving this demeanour betwixt them, swore by saint John Baptist, that he would neuer seeke to make peace betwixt them againe. And therefore sir John Buttie in name of the king & his counsell declared, that the king and his counsell had commanded and ordeined, that they should haue a daie of battell appointed them at Coventrie. Here writers disagree about the daie that was appointed: for some saie, it was vpon a morndae in August; other vpon saint Lamberts daie, being the senententh of September, other on the eleuenth of September: but true it is, that the king assigned them not onlie the daie, but also appointed them liks and place for the combat, and thereupon great preparation was made, as to such a matter appertained.

At the time appointed the king came to Coventrie, where the two dukes were ready, according to the order prescribed therein, comming thither in great arrate, accompanied with the lords and gentlemen of their linages. The king caused a sumptuous scaffold or theater, and roiall liks there to be erected and prepared. The sundaie before they should fight, after dinner the duke of Hereford came to the king (being lodged about a quarter of a mile without the towne in a tower that belonged to sir William Bagot) to take his leaue of him. The morow after, being the daie appointed for the combat, about the spring of the daie, came the duke of Posfolke to the court to take leaue likewise of the king. The duke of Hereford armed him in his tent, that was set vp nere to the liks, and the duke of Posfolke put on his armor, betwixt the gate & the barrier of the towne, in a beautiful house, hauing a faire perclois of wood towards the gate, that none might see what was done within the house.

The duke of Aumarle that daie, being high constable of England, and the duke of Surrie marshall, placed themselves betwixt them, well armed and appointed; and when they saw their time, they first entered into the liks with a great companie of men apparelled in silke sendall, imbrodered with siluer, both richlie and curiouslie, euerie man hauing a tipped staffe to keepe the field in order. About the houre of prime came to the barriers of the liks, the duke of Hereford, mounted on a white courser, barded with greene & blew velvet imbrodered sumptuously with swans and antelops of goldsmiths worke, armed at all points. The constable and marshall came to the barriers, demanding of him what he was, he answered;

An. Reg. 21.

"answered; I am Henrie of Lancaster duke of De-"reford, which am come hither to demand redress "against Thomas Spowbzaie duke of Norfolk, as a "traitor untrue to God, the king, his realm, and me.
 "Then incontinentlie he swore upon the holie Evan"gelists, that his quarrell was true and iust, and upon "that point he required to enter the lists: when he put "up his sword, which before he held naked in his hand, "and putting downe his visor, made a crosse on his "horse, and with speare in hand, entered into the lists, "and defended from his horse, and let him downe in "a chaire of greene velvet, at the one end of the lists, "and there reposed himselfe, abiding the coming of "his aduersarie.

Some after him, entered into the field with great triumph, king Richard, accompanied with all the peers of the realme, and in his companie was the earle of saint Daule, which was come out of France in post to see this challenge performed. The king had there about ten thousand men in armour, least some frate or tumult might rise amongst his nobles, by quarrelling or partaking. When the king was set in his seat, which was richlie hanged and adorned; a king at armes made, open proclamation, prohibiting all men in the name of the king, and of the high constable and marshall, to enterpise or attempt to approach, touch any part of the lists upon paine of death, except such as were appointed to order or marshall the field. The proclamation ended, another he"rald cried; Behold here Henrie of Lancaster duke "of Hereford appellant, which is entred into the lists "to tal to do his denoir against Thomas Spowbzaie "duke of Norfolk defendant, upon paine to be found "false and recreant.

The duke of Norfolk howered on horsebacke at the entrie of the lists, his horse being barbed with cri-mosen velvet, imbrodered richlie with lions of siluer and mulberie trees; and when he had made his oth before the constable and marshall that his quar-
 "rell was iust and true, he entred the field manfullie, "sailing aloud: God aid him that hath the right, and "then he departed from his horse, & fate him downe in "his chaire which was of crimosen velvet, courtined "about with white and red damaske. The lord marshall "biewed their speares, to see that they were of equall "length, and deliuered the one speare himselfe to the "duke of Hereford, and sent the other vnto the duke of "Norfolk by a knight. When the herald proclaimed "that the traueses & chaires of the champions should "be removed, commanding them on the kings be"halfe to mount on horsebacke, & addresse themselves "to the battell and combat.

The duke of Hereford was quicklie horsed, and closed his hauberk, and cast his speare into the rest, and when the trumpet sounded set forward couragiously towards his enimie six or seven paces. The duke of Norfolk was not fullie set forward, when the king cast downe his warder, and the heralds cried, Ho, ho.
 When the king caused their speares to be taken from them, and commanded them to repaire againe to their chaires, where they remained two long houres, while the king and his counsell deliberatlie consulted what order was best to be had in so weightie a cause. Finally, after they had deuised, and fullie determined what should be done therein, the heralds cried silence; and sir John Wustie the kings secreta-rie read the sentence and determination of the king and his counsell, in a long roll, the effect wherof was, that Henrie duke of Hereford should within fiftene daies depart out of the realme, and not to returne before the terme of ten peares were expired, except by the king he should be repealed againe, and this upon paine of death; and that Thomas Spowbzaie duke of Norfolk, because he had soluen sedition in the realme by his words, should likewise auoid the realme, and neuer to returne againe into England, nor approach the borders or confines thereof upon paine of death; and that the king would stae the profits of his lands, till he had leuied thereof such summes of monie as the duke had taken vp of the kings treasure for the wages of the garrison of Calis, which were still unpaid.

When these iudgements were once read, the king called before him, both the parties, and made them to sweare that the one should neuer come in place where the other was; willinglie, nor haue any company to gather in any foreign region; which oth they both receiued humbly, and so went their wayes. The duke of Norfolk departed sorrowfullie out of the realme into Almaine, and at the last came to Venice, where he for thought and melancholie deceased: for he was in hope (as writers report) that he should haue bene borne out in the matter by the king, which when it fell out otherwise, it greiued him not a little.
 The duke of Hereford took his leaue of the king at Eltham, who there released foure peares of his ban-nishment: so he took his iourne ouer into Calis, and from thence went into France, where he remained.
 ¶ A wonder it was to see what number of people ran after him in euerie towne and street where he came, before he took the sea, lamenting and bewailing his departure, as who would saie, that when he departed, the onelie shield, defense and comfort of the common wealth was bared and gone.

At his coming into France, king Charles hearing the cause of his banishment (which he esteemed to be vertie light) receiued him gentle, and him honorable interteined, in so much that he had by fauour obtained in mariage the onelie daughter of the duke of Berry, uncle to the French king, if king Richard had not bene a let in that matter, who being thereof certified, sent the earle of Salisburie with all speed into France, both to surmize by untrue suggestion, heinous offenses against him, and also to require the French king that in no wise he would suffer his consine to be matched in mariage with him that was so manifest an offendor. This was a pestilent kind of proceeding against that nobleman then being in a foreign countrie, hauing bene so honorable receiued as he was at his entrance into France, and vpon victo and good liking of his behauiour there, so forward in mariage with a ladie of noble linage. So sharpe, so seuerer, & so heinous an accusation, brought to a strange king from a naturall prince, against his subiect, after punishment inflicted (for he was ban-shed) was inough to haue made the French king his fatal fo, & vpon suspicion of assaieng the like treche-rie against him, to haue throwne him out of the limits of his land. But what will enuie leaue unattempted, where it is once settled? And how are the malicious tormented with egermes of reuenge against them whom they maligne, wpinging themselves in the meane tyme with inward pangs gnawing them at the hart: whereunto serueth the poets allusion,

Inuidia Siculi non inueniunt tyranni Maius tormentum.

On the twelfth day this yeare, the river that passeth betwixt Snelleston or Snellston, and Harewood, two villages not far from Bedford, suddenlie ceased his course, so as the chanell remained drie by the space of thre miles, that any man might enter into, and passe the same drie foot at his pleasure. This diuision, which the water made in that place, the one part seeming as it were not to come nere to the other, was iudged to signifie the reuolting of the subiects of this land from their naturall prince. It may be, that the water of that river sanke into the ground, and by some secret passage or chanell toke

We have heard before, how the archbishop of Cantuarburie Thomas Arundell, was banished the citie, and Roger Walden was made archbishop in his steed, who was a great favourer of the cite of London, the which was chiefly about this season fallen into the kings displeasure : but by the diligent labour of this archbishop, and of Robert Wyke, then bishop of London, upon the humble supplication of the citizens, the kings wrath was pacified. But notwithstanding the kings mind, was made blanke charters were denied, and brought into the cite, which minde of the substantiall and wealthie citizens were sore to seeke, to their great charge, as in the end appeared. And the like charters were sent abrood into all shires within the realme, whereby great grudge and murmuring arose among the people : for when they were so sealed, the kings officers wrote in the same what liked them, as well for charging the parties with payment of monie, as other wise.

In this meane time, the duke of Lancaster departed out of this life at the bishop of Chies place in Holborne, and lieth buried in the cathedrall church of Saint Paule in London, on the northside of the high altar, by the ladie Blanch his first wiffe. The death of this duke gaue occasion of increasing more hatred in the people of this realme toward the king, for he seized into his hands all the goods that belonged to him, and also receiued all the rents and reuenues of his lands which ought to haue descended vnto the duke of Hereford by lawfull inheritance, in renouing his letters patents, which he had granted to him before, by vertue wherof he might make his attorneis generall to sue luerie for him, of any manner of inheritances or possessions that might come from thenceforth fall vnto him, and that his homage might be required, with making reasonable fine: whereby it was euident, that the king meant his utter vndowing.

This hard dealing was much disliked of all the nobilitie, and cried out against the meaner sort: but namelye the duke of Powke was therewith soe moved, who before this time, had bozne things with so patient a mind as he could, though the same touched him verie nere, as the death of his brother the duke of Gloucester, the banishment of his nephew the said duke of Hereford, and other moe iniuries in great number, which for the slipperie pouth of the king, he passed ouer for the time, and did forget aswell as he might. But now perceiving that neither law, iustice nor equitie could take place, where the kings willfull will was bent vpon any wrongfull purpose, he considered that the glorie of the publike wealth of his countrie must needs decaye, by reason of the king his lacke of wit, and want of such as would (without flatterie) admonish him of his dutie: and therefore he thought it the part of a wise man to get him in time to a resting place, and to leaue the following of such an vnaduised captaine, as with a leaden sword would cut his owne throat.

Whereupon he with the duke of Aumarle his sonne went to his house at Langley, reioicing that nothing had misshapened in the common-wealth though his deuile or consent. The common brute ran, that the king had set to farme the realme of England, vnto sir William Scrope earle of Wilthshire, and then treasuro: of England, to sir John Buthie, sir John Bagot, and sir Henrie Greene knights. ¶ About the same time, the earle of Arundels sonne, named Thomas, which was kept in the duke of Creters house, escaped out of the realme, by meanes of one William Scot mercer, and went to his vncle Thomas Arundell late archbishop of Cantarburie, as then sojourning at Cullen. ¶ King Richard being desirous sale of revenues to furnish such a princely post as he manifested by his great names of monk of Monte of the great lords and prelates of his realm, long as it lasted temporal, and the habits of other monasteries, granting them in governance, he belittled to them his better persons for allance, that he would have the monks be governed at a date appointed: and so not only banding the better men.

And after this yearely and tenn yearly shires of the Realme by waite of putting them to the sword to paie no small summes of money; for redeeming their prisoners that they had aye the Duke of Glocester, the Duke of Arundell, and all other, when they rose in armes against him. The nobles, gentlemen, and commons of those shires were enforced also to receiue a new oath to allowe the king of their fidelitie in time to come; and withall certaine peeres and other honorable personages were sent into the same shires to perswade men to this painment; and to see things ordered at the pleasure of the prince; and saue the fines which the nobles, and other the meane estates of those shires were constrained to paie, were not small; but exceeding great; to the offense of manie. Moreover, the kings letters patents were sent into euery shire within this land by vertue whereof, an oath was demanded of all the kings liege people for a further assurance of their due obedience, and they were constrained to ratifie the same in writing vnder their hands and seales.

Wherouer they were compelled to put their hands and seales to certeine blankes, wherof ye haue heard before, in the which, when it pleased him he might write what he thought good. There was also a new oth deuised for the thirsties of euerie countie throughe the realme to receiue: finallye, manie of the kings liege people were throughe spite, enuie, and mallice, accused, apprehended, & put in prison, and after brought before the constable and marshall of England, in the court of chivalrie, and might not otherwise be deliuered, except they could iustifie themselves by combat and fighting in lists against their accusers hand to hand, although the accusers for the most part were lustie, yong and valiant, where the parties accused were perchaunce old, impotent, maimed and sicklie. Whereupon not onelie the great destruction of the realme in generall, but also of euerie singular person in particular, was to be feared and looked for.

¶ About this time the bishop of Calcedon came into England; with letters apostolicall of admonition, that the faithfull and lofall of the land shoud of their goods disburse somewhat to the emperor of Constantinople, who was extremelie bered and troubled by the Tarrars, and their capteins called Poet. And to the intent that the peres of the land might be made the more willing and toward to bestow their contribution in this behalf, the pope granted vnto all benefactors (trulie contrite and confessed) full remission, and wazaped in his bitter censures all such as considered those that were willing to bestow their beneuolence in this case; considering, that although the emperor was a schismaticke, yet was he a christian, and if by the infidels he should be oppressed, all christendome was in danger of ruine; hauing in his mind that saluing of the poet full fit to his purpose.

¶ In this yere in a manner throughout all the realme of England, old bate trees withered, and afterwards, contrarie to all mens thinking, grew trewe againe, a strange sight, and supposed to import some unknowne event. ¶ In this meane time the king being advertised that the wild Irish daily wasted and destroyed the towncs and villages within the English pale, and had slaine manie of the soldiers which laye there in garison for defense of that countrey, countie, determined to make effionnes a boiage thither, & prepared all things necessarie for his passage now against the spring. A little before his setting forth, he caused a iusts to be holden at Windsor: of fourtie knights and fourtie esquiers, against all com-mers, & they to be apparelled in greene, with a white falcon, and the queene to be there well accompanied with ladies and damfels. When these iusts were finished, the king departed toward Bristol, from thence to passe into Ireland, leaving the queene with hir traine still at Windsor: he appointed for his lieutenant generall in his absence his uncle the duke of York: and so in the moneth of Aprill, as dinerse authors write, he set forward from Windsor, and finally took shipping at Milford, and from thence with two hundred ships, and a puissant power of men of armes and archers he sailed into Ireland.

The first daie next after his arrival, there were slain two hundred Irishmen at Fford in Ikenlis within the countie of Kildare, by that ballant gentleman Jenico Dartois, and such Englishmen as he had there with him: and on the morrow next ensuing the citizens of Dublin invaded the countie of Dubzin, and slue thirtie and thre Irishmen.

The king also after he had remained about seven daies at Waterford, marched from thence towards Bilkenie, and comming thither, staid thereabout fourtene daies, looking for the duke of Aumarle that was appointed to have met him, but he failed and came not, whereupon the king on Spidsummer even set forward againe, marching straight towards the countie of Spacur: the principall rebell in that season within Ireland, who keeping himselfe among woods with three thousand right hardie men, seemed to passe little for any power that might be brought against him. Yet the king appoaching to the skirts of the woods, commanded his soldiers to fier the houses and villages: which was executed with great for-wardnesse of the men of war. And here for some valiant act that he did, or some other favourable respect, which the king bare to the lord Henrie sonne to the duke of Hereford, he made him knight. & this Henrie was after king of England, succeeding his father, and called by the name of Henrie the first. There were nine or ten others made knights also at the same time.

Moreover, there were two thousand & five hundred pioneers set a worke to cut downe the woods, and to make passages through, and so then the Englishmen entred, and by force got through: for the Irishmen were feared the English bowes, but yet now and then they espied their advantage, assailed oftentimes Englishmen with their darts, and slue diuerse that went abroad to fetch in forrage. The uncle of Spacur having a wishie or with about his necke, came in and submitted himselfe, and likewise manie other naked and bare legged, so that the king seeming to pity their miserable state, pardoned them, and afterward he also sent unto Spacur, promising that if he would come in and requite pardon as his uncle had done, he would receive him to mercie: but Spacur understanding that for want of vittels, the king must needs retire within a short time, he refused the kings offer. The king with his armie remaining in those parts 11 daies, was in the end constrained to come backe, when all their vittels were spent: for more than they brought with them they could not get. They lost manie houses in this iourne for want of provision and forrage.

As the king was withdrawing towards Dublin, marching through the countie, in despite of his enimies, that hovered still about his armie, Spacur sent to the king, offering to talke of an agreement, if it should please him to send any noble man to meet him at a place appointed. The king hereupon commanded the earle of Gloucester to take with him two hundred lances, and a thousand archers, and to go to trie if he might by persuation cause him to come in and submit himselfe. The earle went, and comming to talke with him, found him so obstinate, that their parle streightwaies brake off: so taking leave each of other, they departed, and the earle returned to the king, to advertise him what he had done and perceiued by the communication which he had had with Spacur.

The king was fore offended with the obstinates of the rebell, that would not agree otherwise: but so as he might remaine still at libertie, without danger to suffer any manner of punishment for his passed offenses. Whereupon the king after his comming to Dublin, and that the armie had rested there, and in the countie nere to the citie, for the space of fiftene daies, he divided his people into thre parts, and sent them abroad into the countie to pursue the enemies and withall made proclamation, that who so ever could bring Spacur unto his presence, should have for his recompense a great reward: for he determined not to depart the countie, till he had him either dead or alive. But he knew full little then what incidents to hinder his purposed intention would after follow.

The same daie that he sent abroad his armie thus into thre severall parts, the duke of Aumarle with an hundred sarkes arrived, of whose coming the king was right iustill, and although he had used no small negligence in that he came no sooner according to order before appointed, yet the king (as he was of a gentle nature) courteously accepted his excuse: whether he was in fault or not, I have not to saye; but verelie he was greatlie suspected, that he dealt not well in tarieng so long after his time assigned. But now whilst the king rested at Dublin, his people to deineaned themselves, that the most part of the rebels, that by manhood and policie were subdued, and brought under subiection, and (as to be thought) if no trouble had risen in England to have called him backe, he meant to have rid by the woods, and made some notable conquest at that time upon the rebels that yet held out. Nevertheless, during the tyme of his abode there, such was the prowesse of him and his, that the Irish were well tamed, and forced to submit themselves: and yet the kings power made no great slaughter of them, if it be true that Christ. Okl. faith, Now whilst he was thus occupied in deniffing hobs to reduce them into subiection, and taking orders for the good state and quiet government of the countie, diuerse of the nobilitie, as well prelats as other, and likewise manie of the magistrats and rulers of the cities, towne, and communalitie, here in England, perceiving daillie how the realme drew to utter ruine, not like to be recovered to the former state of wealth, whilst king Richard lived and reigned (as they took it) devised with great deliberation, and considerate advise, to send and signifie by letters unto duke Henrie, whom they now called (as he was in deed) duke of Lancaster and Hereford, requiring him with all convenient speed to conueie himselfe into England, promising him all their aid, power and assistance, if he expelling R. Richard, as a man not meet for the office he bare, would take upon him the scepter, rule, and diademe of his native land and region.

He therefore being thus called upon by messenthe earnest persuasion of Thomas Arundell, late archbishop of Cantuarburie, who (as before we have heard) had bene banished from his see, and banished the realme by king Richards means, got him downe to Britaine, together with the said archbishop, where he was iustly receiued of the duke and duchesse, and found such friendship at the dukes hands, that there were certaine ships rigged, and made readie for him, at a place in base Britaine, called La port blanc, as we find in the chronicles of Britaine: and when all his promise was made readie, he took the sea, together with the said archbishop of Cantuarburie, and his nephew Thomas Arundell, sonne and heire to the late earle of Arundell, beheaded at the Tower hill, as you have heard. There were also with him, Reginald lord Cobham, sir Thomas Erpingham, and sir Thomas Hamilton knights, John Poyn-tre, Robert Waterton, & Francis Contesquires: few else were there, for (as some write) he had not past affere lances, as they termed them in those daies, that is to saie, men of armes, furnished and appointed as the ise then was. ¶ Yet other write, that the duke of Britaine deliuered unto him three thousand men of warre, to attend him, and that he had eight ships well furnished for the warre, where Broullard yet speaketh but of three. ¶ Moreover, where Broullard and also the chronicles of Britaine auouch, that he should land at Alimouth, by our English writers it seemeth other wise: for it appeareth by their assured report, that he approaching to the shore, did not straight take land, but lay howering aloofe, and shewed himselfe not in this place, and not in that, to see what countenance was made by the people, whether they meant enuoultie to resist him, or friendly to receiue him.

When the lord gouernour Edmund duke of Poike was aduertised, that the duke of Lancaster kept still the sea, and was readie to arrive (but where he meant first to set foot on land, there was not any that understood the certentie) he sent for the lord chancellor Edmund Stafford bishop of Excester, and for the lord treasurer William Scrope earle of Wilthire, and other of the kings priue counsell, as John Baskie, William Bagot, Henrie Greene, and John Knollys knights: of these he required to know what they thought good to be done in this matter, concerning the duke of Lancaster, being on the sea. Their ad-uise was, to depart from London, vnto S. Albons, and there to gather an armie to resist the duke in his landing, but to how small purpose their counsell ser-ued, he conclusion thereof plainly declared, for the most part that were called, when they came thither, boldly protested, that they would not fight against the duke of Lancaster, whome they knew to be evil dealt withall.

The lord treasurer, Baskie, Bagot, and Greene, perceiuing that the commons would cleaue vnto, and take part with the duke, slipped away, leaving the lord gouernour of the realme, and the lord chancellor to make what shift they could for themselves: Bagot got him to Chester, and so escaped into Ireland; the other fled to the castell of Wiltshire, in hope there to be in safetie. The duke of Lancaster, after that he had coasted along the shore a certeine time, had got some intelligence how the peoples minds were affected towards him, landed about the beginning of Iulie in Pockshire, at a place sometime called Hamenpur, betwixt Hail and Widdington, and with him not past threescore persons, as some write; but he was so iustly receiued of the lords, knights, and gentlemen of those parts, that he found means by their helpe) forthwith to assemble a great number of people, that were willing to take his part.
The first that came to him, were the lords of Lincolnshire, and other countie adioining, as the lords Willoughbie, Roos, Darcie, and Beaumont.

At his coming, vnto Doncaster, the earle of Northumberland, and his sonne sir Henrie Persie, wardens of the marches against Scotland, with the earle of Westmerland, came vnto him, where he swore vnto those lords, that he would demand no more, but the lands that were to him descended by inheritance from his father, and in right of his wife.
¶ Moreover, he undertooke to cause the payment of taxes and tallages to be laid downe, & to bring the king to good government, & to renouue from him the Que-shire men, which were enuied of manie; for that the king esteemed of them more than of any other; happily, because they were more faithfull to him than other, readie in all respects to obey his commandements and pleasure. From Doncaster hauing now got a mightie armie about him, he marched forth with all speed through the countie, coming by E-welham vnto Werhelie: within the space of three daies, all the kings castles in those parts were sur-rendred vnto him.

The duke of Poike, whome king Richard had left as gouernour of the realme in his absence, hearing that his nephew the duke of Lancaster was thus arriued, and had gathered an armie, he also assembled a pulsant power of men of armes and archers (as before we have heard) but all was in vaine, for there was not a man that would in his world thrust out one arrows against the duke of Lancaster, or his parta-kers, or in any wise offend him or his friends. The duke of Poike therefore passing forth towards Wiltshire to meet the king, at his coming forth of Ireland, was receiued into the castell of Werhelie, and there remained, till the coming thither of the duke of Lancaster (whom when he perceived that he was not able to resist) on the sabbath, after the feast of saint James, which as that yeare came about, fell vpon the fridaie, he came forth into the church, that stood without the castell, and there communed with the duke of Lancaster. With the duke of Poike were the bishops of Norwich, the lord Werhelie, the lord Seimour, and other: with the duke of Lancaster were these, Thomas Arundell, archbishop of Cantuarburie that had bene banished, the abbat of Leicester, the earles of Northumberland and Westmerland, Thomas Arundell sonne to Richard late earle of Arundell, the baron of Greiffoke, the lords Will-loughbie and Roos, with diuers other lords, knights, and other people, which dancie came to him from eu-erie part of the realme: those that came not, were spoiled of all they had; so as they were neuer able to reouer themselves againe; for their goods being then taken away, were neuer restored. And thus that forsaie, and that for feare of losse, they came flocking vnto him from euerie part.

At the same present there was assembled, and committed to safe custodie, the bishop of Norwich, sir William Elmham, and sir Walter Barlee, knights, Laurence Drex, and John Colsher esquires. On the morrow after, the said dukes with their power, went towards Wiltshire, where (at their coming) they shewd themselves before the towne & castell, being an huge multitude of people. There were inclosed within the castell, the lord William Scrope earle of Wiltshire and treasurer of England, sir Henrie Greene, and sir John Baskie knights, who prepared to make resistance: but when it would not preuaile, they were taken and brought forth bound as prisoners into the campe, before the duke of Lancaster. On the morrow next ensuing, they were arrai-gued before the constable and marshal, and found guilty of treason, for misgouerning the king and realme, and forthwith had their heads smit off. Sir John

John Russell was also taken there, who feining himselfe to be out of his wits, escaped their hands for a time.

In this meane time, king Richard aduertised, how the duke of Lancaster was landed in England, and that the lords, gentlemen, and commons assembled themselves to take his part, he forthwith caused the lord Henrie, sonne to the said duke of Lancaster, and the lord Humfrie, sonne to the duke of Glocester, to be that by fast in the castell of Trimme, and with all speed made hast to retorne into England, in hope with an armie to incounter the duke, before he should haue time to assemble his friends together.
But here you shall note, that it fortuned at the same time, in which the duke of Hereford of Lancaster, whether ye list to call him, arrived thus in England, the seas were so troubled by tempests, and the winds blew so contrarie for anie passage, to come ouer forth of England to the king, remaining still in Ireland, that for the space of six weeks, he receiued no aduer-tisements from thence: yet at length, when the seas became calme, and the wind once turned anie thing fauourable, there came ouer a ship, whereby the king vnderstood the manner of the dukes arrivall, and all his proceedings till that daie, in which the ship departed from the coast of England, whereupon he meant forthwith to haue returned ouer into England, to make resistance against the duke: but through persuasion of the duke of Aumarle (as was thought) he staied, till he might haue all his ships, and other pro-uision, fullie readie for his passage.

In the meane time, he sent the earle of Salisburie ouer into England, to gather a power together, by helpe of the kings friends in Wales, and Cheshire, with all speed possible, that they might be readie to assist him against the duke, vpon his arrivall, for he meant himselfe to follow the earle, within six daies after. The earle passing ouer into Wales, landed at Contwaie, and sent forth letters to the kings friends, both in Wales and Cheshire, to leaue their people, & to come with all speed to assist the k. whose request, with great desire, & very willing minds they fulfilled, hoping to haue found the king himselfe at Contwaie, inasmuch that within foure daies space, there were to the number of fortie thousand men assembled, readie to march with the king against his enemies, if he had bene there himselfe in person.

But when they missed the king, there was a brute spied amongst them, that the king was suerlie dead, which wrought such an impression, and euill disposition in the minds of the Welshmen and others, that for anie persuasion which the earle of Salisburie might vse, they would not go forth with him, till they saw the king: onelie they were contented to staie fourteene daies to see if he should come or not; but when he came not within that tearme, they would no longer abide, but scaled & departed awaie; whereas if the king had come before their breaking bp, no doubt, but they would haue put the duke of Hereford in aduerture of a field: so that the kings lingering of time before his comming ouer, gaue opportunitie to the duke to bring things to passe as he could haue wished, and toke from the king all occasion to recover afterwards anie forces sufficient to resist him.

At length, about eightene daies after that the king had sent from him the earle of Salisburie, he toke the sea, together with the dukes of Aumarle, Crecster, Surrie, and diuerse others of the nobilitie, with the bishops of London, Lincoln, and Carleill. They landed nere the castell of Barclowlie in Wales, about the feast of saint James the apostle, and staied a while in the same castell, being aduertised of the great forces which the duke of Lancaster had got together against him, wherewith he was maruellouslie amazed, knowing certeinlie that those which were thus in armes with the duke of Lancaster against him, would rather die than giue place, as well for the hatred as feare which they had conceiued at him. He uerthelesse he departing from Barclowlie, hasted with all speed towards Contwaie, where he vnder-stood the earle of Salisburie to be still remaining.

He therefore taking with him such Cheshire men as he had with him at that present (in whom all his trust was reposed) he doubted not to reuenge himselfe of his aduersaries, & so at the first he passed with a good courage: but when he vnderstood as he went thus forward, that all the castles, euen from the boders of Scotland vnto Wyllow were deliuered vnto the duke of Lancaster, and that likewise the nobles and commons, as well of the south parts, as the north, were fullie bent to take part with the same duke against him; and further, hearing how his trustie counsellors had lost their heads at Wyllow, he became so greatlie discomfited, that forowfullie lamenting his miserable state, he utterlie despaired of his owne safetie, and calling his armie together, which was not small, licenced euerie man to depart to his home.

The soldiers being well bent to fight in his defense, besought him to be of good chere, promising with an oth to stand with him against the duke, and all his partakers vnto death: but this could not in-courage him at all, so that in the night next ensuing, he stole from his armie, and with the dukes of Crecster and Surrie, the bishop of Carleill, and sir Stephan Scrope, and about halfe a score others, he got him to the castell of Contwaie, where he found the earle of Salisburie, determining there to hold himselfe, till he might see the world at some better staie; for what counsell to take to remedie the mischance thus pressing vpon him he wist not. On the one part he knew his title iust, true, and infallible; and his conscience cleane, pure, and without spot of enuie or malice: he had also no small assistance in the Welsh-men, and Cheshire men. On the other side, he saw the puissance of his aduersaries, the sudden departing of them whom he most trusted, and all things turned vpside downe: he euidentlie saw, and manifestlie perceived, that he was forsaken of them, by whom in time he might haue bene aided and relieued, where now it was too late, and too farre ouerpassed.

This suerlie is a verie notable example, and not without the of all princes to be well weied, and dili-gentlie marked, that this Henrie duke of Lancaster should be thus called to the kingdome, and haue the helpe and assistance (almost) of all the whole realme, which perchance neuer thereof thought or yet dreamed; and that king Richard should thus be left desolate, void, and in despaire of all hope and comfort, in whom if there were anie offense, it ought rather to be imputed to the frailtie of wanton youth, than to the malice of his hart: but such is the deceivable iudgement of man, which not regarding things present with due consideration, thinketh euer that things to come shall haue good successe, with a pleasant & delitefull end. But in this detecting of the one, & aduancing of the other, the prouidence of God is to be respected, & his secret will to be wondered at. For as in his hands standeth the donation of kingdoms, so likewise the disposing of them consisteth in his pleasure, which the verie pagans vnderstood right well; otherwile, one of them would neuer haue said,

Regem timendum in propriis greges, Steward of the kings house, either being so com-write) for that the king had proclaimed his brother the earle of Northumberland traitor, brake his wife staffe, which is the representing signe and token of his office, and without delaye went to duke Henrie.

When the kings servants of household saw this (for it was done before them all) they dispersed themsel-ues, some into one countie, and some into an other.
When the duke of Lancaster vnderstood that king Richard was returned forth of Ireland, he left the duke of York still at Bisslow, and came backe with his power vnto Berkleie; the second daie he came to Glocester, and so to Ross, after to Hereford, where came to him the bishop of Hereford, and sir Edmund Mortimer knight. On the sundae following, he went to Lincolne, and there the lord Charleton came to him. From thence he went to Ludlow, and the next daie to Shrewsburie, where he rested one daie, and thither came to him sir Robert Leigh, and sir John Leigh, and manie other being sent from Che-kept on his iourne towards Chester, and lodging one night by the waie, in a towne there in the borders of Wales, he came the second night to Chester, and staid there certeine daies together, making a solle muster of his armie there in sight of the citie.

The clergy met, & receiued him with procession: he sent forthwith for his sonne & heire, & likewise for the duke of Glocesters sonne & heire, that were as yet remaining in Ireland, commanding them with all speed to returne home into England. But the duke of Glocesters sonne, through mischance perished, as he was on the seas to come ouer, for whose losse his mother took such griefe, that shortly after through immoderate sorow she likewise passed out of this transitorie life.

Perkin a

In this meane time, king Richard being in the castell of Conwaie sore discomfited, and fearing lest he could not remaine there long in safetie, vpon knowledge had by his trustie friends John Paulet, and Richard Seimour, of the dealings and approach of his aduersaries, sent the duke of Gloucester to talke with the duke of Lancaster, who in this meane while had caused one of king Richards faithfull and trustie friends, sir Piers a Leigh, commonlie called Perkin a Lee, to lose his head, & commanded the same to be set vp, vpon one of the highest turrets about all the citie; and so that true and faithfull gentleman, for his stedfast faith, and assured loialtie to his louing soveraigne, thus lost his life. There came to him about the same time, or somewhat before, the dukes of Aunmarle and Surrie, the lord Louell, and sir John Stanleie, beseeching him to receiue him into his fa-uour.

By some writers it should seeme, not onelie the duke of Gloucester, but also the duke of Surrie were sent vnto duke Henrie from king Richard, and that duke Henrie staid them both, and would not suffer them to returne to the king againe, keeping the duke of Gloucester still about him, and committing the duke of Surrie to prison, within the castell of Chester. The king here with went to Beaumaris, & after to Car-naruan: but finding no prouision either of vittels or other things in those castles, no not so much as a bed to lie in, he came backe againe to Conwaie, and in the meane time was the castell of Holt deliuered to the duke of Hereford, by those that had it in keeping wherein was great store of icwels, to the value of two hundred thousand marks, besides an hundred thousand marks in readie coine. After this, the duke, with aduise of his counsell, sent the earle of Northumberland vnto the king, accompanied with foure hundred lances, & a thousand archers, who comming to the castell of Flint, had it deliuered vnto him; and from thence he passed forth towards Conwaie. But before he approached nere the place, he left his power behind him, hid closelie in two ambushes, behind a craggie mountaine, beside the high waie that lea-deth from Flint to Conwaie.

that the

to Con-
waie.

This done, taking not past foure or five with him, he passed forth, till he came before the towne, and then sending an herald to the king, requested a safe conduct from the king, that he might come and talke with him, which the king granted, and so the earle of Northumberland passing the waie, entered the castell, and comming to the king, declared to him, that if it might please his grace to undertake, that there should be a parlement assembled, in the which iustice might be had, against such as were enemies to the common-wealth, and had procured the destruction of the duke of Gloucester, and other noblemen, and herewith pardon the duke of Hereford of all things wher-in he had offended him, the duke would be readie to come to him on his knees, to craue of him forgue-nesse, and as an humble subiect, to obeie him in all dutyfull seruices. The king taking aduise vpon these offers, and other made by the earle of Northumberland on the behalfe of the duke of Hereford, vpon the earles oath, for assurance that the same should be performed in eche condition, agreed to go with the earle to meete the duke, and here vpon taking their horses, they rode forth, but the earle rode before, as it were, to prepare dinner for the king at Rutland, but com-ming to the place where he had left his people, he staid there with them.

The king keeping on his waie, had not ridden past foure miles, when he came to the place where the am-bushes were lodged, and being entred within danger of them, before he was aware, theued himselfe to be sore abashed. But now there was no remedie for the earle being there with his men, would not suffer him to returne, as he gladlie would haue done if he might; but being inclosed with the sea on the one side, and the rocks on the other, hauing his aduersaries so nere at hand before him, he could not shift a waie by any meanes, for if he should haue fled backe, they might easilie haue overtaken him, per he could haue got out of their danger. And thus of force he was then constrained to go with the earle, who brought him to Rutland, where they dined, and from thence they rode vnto Flint to bed. The king had be-rie few about him of his friends, except onelie the earle of Salisburie, the bishop of Carleill, the lord Stephen Scrope, sir Nicholas Herebie, a sonne also of the countesse of Salisburie, and Jenico Dartois a Gascoigne that still wore the cognifance of deuil of his maister king Richard, that is to saie, a white hart, and would not put it from him, neither for persuasions nor threats; by reason whereof, when the duke of Hereford vnderstood it, he caused him to be committed to prison within the castell of Chester.
This man was the last (as saith mine author) which wore that deuil, and theued well thereby his constant hart toward his maister, for the which it was thought he should haue lost his life, but yet he was pardoned, and at length reconciled to the dukes fa-uour, after he was king.

how the earle of Northumberland sped, the morow following being tuesday, and the nineteenth of August, he came thither, & mustered his armie befoze the kings presence, which undoubtedly made a passing faire shew, being verie well ordered by the lord Henrie Percy, that was appointed generall, or rather (as we maie call him) master of the campe, under the duke, of the whole armie. There were come already to the castell, befoze the appochoing of the maine armie, the archbishop of Canturburie, the duke of Aumarle, the earle of Worcester, and diuerse other. The archbishop entred first, and then followed the other, coming into the first ward.

The king that was walking aloft on the bales of the walls, to behold the coming of the duke a farre off, might see, that the archbishop and the other were come, and (as he toke it) to talke with him: where vpon he forthwith came downe vnto them, and beholding that they did their due reuerence to him on their knees, he toke them vp, and drawing the archbishop aside from the residue, talked with him a good while, and as it was reported, the archbishop willed him to be of good comfort, for he should be assured, not to haue anie hurt, as touching his person; but he suspected not as a prelat, but as a Pilat. For, was it no hurt (thinke you) to his person, to be spoiled of his roialtie, to be depouled from his crowne, to be translated from principallitie to prison, & to fall from honoz into honoz. All which befell him to his extreame hart greefe (no doubt:) which to increase, meanes alas there were manie; but to diminish, helps (God wot) but a few. So that he might haue said with the forlome man in the merciesse seas of his miseries, per fera nimis sumitur aquora ventis, In medijs lacera naue relinquitur aquis.

¶ Some write (as befoze in a marginall note I haue quoted) that the archbishop of Canturburie went with the earle of Northumberland vnto Conwaie, and there talked with him: and further, that euen then the king offered, in consideration of his insufficiencie to gouerne, & to resigne the crowne, and his kinglike title to the same, vnto the duke of Hereford. But forsomuch as those that were continually attendant about the king, during the whole time of his abode at Conwaie, and till his coming to Flint, do plainelie affirme, that the archbishop came not to him, till this tuesday befoze his removing from Flint vnto Chester. it maie be thought (the circumstances well considered) that he rather made that promise here at Flint, than at Conwaie, although by the tenour of an instrument, containing the declaration of the archbishop of York, and other commissioners sent from the estates assembled in the next parlement, vnto the said king, it is recorded to be at Conwaie, as after ye maie read. But there maie be some default in the copie, as taking the one place for the other.

But wheresoener this offer was made, after that the archbishop had now here at Flint, communed with the king, he departed, and taking his horse againe, rode backe to meet the duke, who began at that present to approach the castell, and compassed it round about, euen downe to the sea, with his people ranged in good and seemelie order, at the foot of the mountains: and then the earle of Northumberland passing forth of the castell to the duke, talked with him a while in sight of the king, being againe got vp to the walles, to take better view of the armie, being now advanced within two bowes shot of the castell, to the small reioicing (ye may be sure) of the forlorn king. The earle of Northumberland returning to the castell, appointed the king to be let to dinner (for he was fasting till then) and after he had dined, the duke came downe to the castell himselfe, and entred the same all armed, his bassinet onelie excepted, and being within the first gate, he staied there, till the king came forth of the inner part of the castell vnto him.

The king accompanied with the bishop of Carleill, the earle of Salisburie, and sir Stephen Scrope knight, who bare the sword befoze him, and a few other, came forth into the vtter ward, and fate downe in a place prepared for him. Forthwith as the duke got sight of the king, he shewed a reuerend dutie as became him, in bowing his knee, and committing forthward, did so likewise the second and third time, till the king toke him by the hand, and lift him vp, saying; Dere couline, ye are welcome. The duke humbly thanking him said; My soueraigne lord and king, the cause of my coming at this present, is (your honoz saued) to haue againe restitution of my person, my lands and heritage, through your fauourable licence. The king herunto answered; Dere couline, I am ready to accomplish your will, so that ye may inioy all that is yours, without exception.

¶ Meeting thus together, they came forth of the castell, and the king there called for wine, and after they had dronke, they mounted on horsebacke, and rode that night to Flint, and the next daie vnto Chester, the third vnto Pantwich, the fourth to Melcastell. Here, with glad countenance, the lord Thomas Beauchampe earle of Warwick met them, that had bene confined into the Ile of Rhé, as befoze ye haue heard; but now was renoked home by the duke of Lancaster. From Melcastell they rode to Stafford, and the first daie vnto Lichfield, and there rested saturday all daie. After this, they rode forth, and lodged at these places insuing, Couentre, Warrick, Northampton, Dunstable, & so came to London: neither was the king permitted all this while to change his apparell, but rode still through all these towne simple clothed in one sute of raiment, and yet he was in his time exceeding sumptuous in apparell, in so much as he had one cote, which he caused to be made for him of gold and stone, valued at 30000 marks: & so he was brought the next waie to Westminster.

As for the duke, he was receiued with all the ioy and pompe that might be of the Londoners, and was lodged in the bishops palace, by Pauls church. It was a wonder to see what great number of people, & what number of horses came to him, on the waie as he thus passed the countreies, till his coming to London, where (vpon his approach to the citie) the maior rode forth to receiue him, and a great number of other citizens. Also the cleargie met him with procession, and such ioy appeared in the countenances of the people, uttering the same also with words, as the like not lightlie bene seene. For in euery towne and village where he passed, children reioiced, women clapped their hands, and men cried out for ioy. But to speake of the great numbers of people that flocked together in the fields and streets of London at his coming, I here omit, neither will I speake of the presents, welcomings, lauds, and gratifications made to him by the citizens and communalitie.

But now to the purpose. The next day after his coming to London, the king from Westminster was had to the Tower, and there committed to safe custodie. Many euill disposed persons, assembling themselves together in great numbers, intended to haue met with him, and to haue taken him from such as had the conueleng of him, that they might haue slaine him. But the maior and aldermen gathered to them, the worshipfull commons, and graue citizens, by whose policie, and not without much adde, the other were renoked from their euill purpose: albeit, befoze they might be pacified, they coming to Westminster,

A parliament
in the kings name.

minister, tooke maister John Selake deane of the kings chappell, and from thence brought him to Newgate, and there laid him fast in irons.

After this was a parliament called by the duke of Lancaster, using the name of king Richard in the writs directed forth to the lords, and other states for their summons. This parliament began the thirtieth daie of September, in the which manie heinous points of misgouernance and iniurious dealings in the administration of his kinglie office, were laid to the charge of this noble prince king Richard, the which (to the end the commons might be perswaded, that he was an vnprofitable prince to the common-wealth, and worthe to be deposed) were ingrossed by in 33 solempne articles, heinous to the eares of all men, and to some almost incredible, the verie effect of which articles here insue, according to the copie which I haue sene, and is abridged by maister Hall as followeth.

The articles objected to king Richard, whereby he was counted worthe to be deposed from his principalltie.

I Item, that king Richard wastfullie spent the treasure of the realme, and had giuen the possessions of the crowne to men vnworthie, by reason whereof, new charges more and more were laid on the poore commonaltie. And where diuerse lords, as well spirituall as temporall, were appointed by the high court of parliament, to commune and treat of diuerse matters concerning the common-wealth of the realme, which being busie about the same communication, he with other of his assinite went about to impeach, and by force and menacing compelled the iudges of the realme at Shrewsburie to condescend to his opinion, for the destruction of the said lords, in so much that he began to raise warre against John duke of Lancaster, Richard earle of Arundell, Thomas earle of Warwick, and other lords, contrarie to his honor and promise.

2 Item, that he caused his viceroy the duke of Gloucester to be arrested without law, and sent him to Calis, and there without iudgement murdered him, and although the earle of Arundell upon his arraignment pleaded his charter of pardon, he could not be heard, but was in most vile and shameful manner suddenly put to death.

3 Item, he assembled certaine Lancashire and Cheshire men, to the intent to make warre on the same lords, and suffered them to rob and pill, without correction or reuerence.

4 Item, although the king lateringlie, and with great dissimulation, made proclamation through out the realme, that the lords before named were not attached of any crime of treason, but onlie for extortion and oppressions done in this realme, yet he laid to them in the parliament, rebellion and manifest treason.

5 Item, he hath compelled others of the said lords servants and friends, by menaces and other bads, to make great othes to their bitter vnderstanding, and notwithstanding his pardon, yet he made them fine and punish.

6 Item, where diuerse were appointed to commune of the state of the realme, and the common-wealth thereof, the same king caused all the rolls and records to be kept from them, contrarie to promise made in the parliament, to his open dishonor.

7 Item, he withcraftillie commanded, that no man upon paine of losse of life and goods, should once intreat him for the returne of Henrie now duke of Lancaster.

8 Item, where this realme is holden of God, and not of the pope or other piteite, the said king Richard, after he had obteined diuerse acts of parliament, for his owne peculiar profit and pleasure, then he obteined bulles and extreame censures from Rome, to compell all men straightlie to keepe the same, contrarie to the honour and ancient priuileges of this realme.

9 Item, although the duke of Lancaster had done his deuoir against Thomas duke of Dorset in proofe of his quarrell, yet the said king, without reason or ground, banished him the realme for ten years, contrarie to all equitie.

10 Item, before the dukes departure, he vnder his broad seale licenced him to make attornies to prosecute and defend his causes: the said king after his departure, would suffer none attorne to appeare for him, but did with his at his pleasure.

11 Item, the same king put out diuerse shiriffes lawfullie elected, and put in their romes diuerse other of his owne, subuerting the law, contrarie to his oath and honor.

12 Item, he bestowed great summes of monie, and bound him vnder his letters patents, for the repayment of the same, and yet not one pence paid.

13 Item, he feared men at the will of him and his vnhappy counsell, and the same treasure spent in folie, not paying poore men for their vittells and viands.

14 Item, he said, that the lawes of the realme were in his head, and sometimes in his breast, by reason of which fantastickall opinion, he destroyed noble men, and impouerished the poore commons.

15 Item, the parliament setting and enacting diuerse notable statutes, for the profit and advancement of the common-wealth, he by his priue friends and solicitors caused to be enacted, that no act then enacted, should be more prejudiciall to him, than it was to any of his predecessors: through which promise he did often as he liked, and not as the law did meane.

16 Item, for to serue his purpose, he would suffer the shiriffes of the shire to remaine about one yeare or two.

17 Item, at the summons of the parliament, when knights and burghesses should be elected, that the election had bene full proceeded, he put out diuerse persons elect, and put other in their places, to serue his will and appetite.

18 Item, he had priue espials in entrie shires, to heare who had of him any communication, and if he committed of his lastenages living, or outrageous doings, he straightwaies was apprehended, and put to a greuous fine.

19 Item, the spiritualltie alleged against him, that he at his going into Ireland, erased manie notable summes of monie, beside plate and tewels, without law or custome, contrarie to his oath taken at his coronation.

20 Item, where diuerse lords and iustices were tworne to save the truth of diuerse things to them committed in charge, both for the honor of the roime, and profit of the king, the said king to menaced them with greuous threatnings, that no man would or durst save the right.

21 Item, that without the assent of the nobilitie, he caused the tewels, plate, and treasure, over into Ireland, to the great impoverishment of the realme: and all the good records for the common-wealth, and against his christianitie, he caused priuile to be imbested, and committed away.

22 Item, in all leagues and letters to be concluded or sent to the king of Rome, or other regions, his

persua crown the dai

his writing was so subtil and darke, that none other prince once beleued him, nor yet his owne subiects.

23 Item, he most tyrannouslie and unprincelie said, that the liues and goods of all his subiects were in his hands, and at his disposition.

24 Item, that contrarie to the great charter of England, he caused diuerse lustie men to appeale di-uerse old men, vpon matters determinable at the common law in the court partiall, because that there is no triall, but onelie by battell: wherevpon, the said aged persons, fearing the sequele of the matter, submitted themselves to his mercie, whome he fined and ransomed vnreasonablie at his will and pleasure.

25 Item, he craftilie deuised certeine priuie othes, contrarie to the law, and caused diuerse of his subiects first to be sworn to obserue the same, and after bound them in bonds for keeping of the same, to the great vndoing of manie honest men.

26 Item, where the chancelor, according to the law, would in no wise grant a prohibition to a cer-teine person, the king granted it vnto the same, vnder his priuie scale, with great threatenings, if it should be disobeyed.

27 Item, he banished the bishop of Canturburie without cause or iudgement, and kept him in the par-lement chamber with men of armes.

28 Item, the bishops goods he granted to his successor, vpon condition, that he should mainteine all his statutes made at Shrewesburie anno 21, and the statutes made anno 22 at Couentre.

29 Item, vpon the accusation of the said bishop, the king craftilie perswaded him to make no answer for he would be his warrant, and aduised him not to come to the parlement, and so without answer he was condemned and exiled, and his goods seized.

These be all the articles of anie effect, which were laid against him, saving foure other, which touched onelie the archbishops matter: whose working brought king Richard at length from his crowne.
Then for so much as these articles, and other heinous and detestable accusations were laid against him in open parlement, it was thought by the most part, that he was worthy to be deposed from all kinglie honor, and princelie gouernement: and to bring the matter without slander the better to passe, diuerse of the kings seruants, which by licence had access to his person, comforted him (being with sorrow almost consumed, and in manner halfe dead) in the best wise they could, exhorting him to regard his health, and save his life.

The king is perswaded to reigne the croune to the duke.

And first, they aduised him willingly to suffer himselfe to be deposed, and to resigne his right of his owne accord, so that the duke of Lancaster might without murder or battell obtaine the scepter and diademe, after which (they well perceived) he gaped: by meane whereof they thought he might be in perfect assurance of his life long to continue. Whether his their persuasion proceeded by the suborning of the duke of Lancaster and his fauourers, or of a sincere affection which they bare to the king, as supposing it most sure for such an extremitie, it is vncertaine; but yet the effect followed was, that for the time being was: And notwithstanding, the king being now in the hands of his enemies, and vnder the desparing of all comfort, was easily perswaded to resigne his crowne and princelie preeminence, so that in hope of life onelie, he agreed to all things that were of him demanded. And so (as it should seeme by the copie of an instrument hereafter following) he renewed and voluntarilie was deposed from his royall croune, and kinglie dignitie, the ninth being the nine and twentieth daie of September, and feast of S. Michaell the archangel, in the yeare of our Lord 1399, and in the thre and twentieth yeare of sueth.

tuall and temporall of this present parlement, and commons of the same, the right ed to go to the Tower of London, there to heare and testifie such questions and answers as then and there should be by the said honorable and discret persons hard.

Know all men, to whome these present letters shall come, that we, sir Richard of Hereford, Henrie earle of Northumberland, Rafe earle of Westmerland, Thomas lord Berkeleie, William abbat of Westminster, John prior of Canturburie, knights, John Markham iustice, Thomas Stow and John Burbadge doctors of the ciuill law, Thomas Crpingham and Thomas Grey knights, Thomas Ferebie and Denis Lopeham notaries publike, the daie and yere aboue said, betwene the houres of eight and nine of the clocke before none, were present in the chiefe chamber of the kings lodging, within the said place of the Tower, where was rehearsed vnto the king by the mouth of the foresaid earle of Northumberland, that before time at Conwaie in Northwales, the king being there at his pleasure and libertie, promised vnto the archbishop of Canturburie then Thomas Arundell, and vnto the said earle of Northumberland, that he for in-sufficiencie which he knew himselfe to be of, to occupie so great a charge, as to gouerne the realme of England, he would gladlie leaue of and renounce his right and title, as well of that as of his title to the croune of France, and his maiestie roiall, vnto Henrie duke of Hereford, and that to do in such conuenient wise, as by the learned men of this land it should most sufficientlie be deuised and ordeined. To the which rehearsall, the king in our said presences answered benignlie and said, that such promise he made, and so to do the same he was at that houre in full purpose to performe and fulfill: saving that he desired first to haue personall speech with the said duke, and with the archbishop of Canturburie his cousins. And further, he desired to haue a bill drawne of the said resignation, that

This promise
he made at

than at Con-waie, as by that which goeth before it may be partlie conicured,

that he might be perfect in the rehearfall thereof.

After which bill drawne, and a copie thereof to him by me the said earle deliuered, we the said lordes and other departed: and vpon the same afternone the king looking for the comming of the duke of Lancaster, at the last the said duke, with the archbishop of Canturburie and the persons afore recited, entered the foresaid chamber, bringing with them the lordes Ross, Aburgenie, and Willoughbie, with diuerse other. Where after due obeisance done by them vnto the king, he familiarlie and with a glad countenance (as to them and vs appered) talked with the said archbishop and duke a good season; and that communication finished, the king with glad countenance in presence of vs and the other about rehearsed, said openlie that he was readie to renounce and resigne all his kinglie maiestie in maner and forme as he before had promised. And although he had and might sufficientlie haue declared his renouncement by the reading of an other meane person; yet for the more suertie of the matter, and for that the said resignation should haue his full force and strength, himselfe therefore read the scroll of resignation, in maner and forme as followeth.

The tenor of the instrument whereby king Richard resigneth the crowne to the duke of Lancaster.

IN the name of God Amen: I Richard by the grace of God, king of England and of France, &c: lord of Ireland, acquit and assoile all archbishops, bishops, and other prelates, secular or religious, of what dignitie, degree, state, or condition so euer they be; and also all dukes, marquesses, earles, barons, lords, and all my liege men, both spirituall and secular, of what manner or degree they be, from their oth. of fealtie and homage, and all other deeds and priuileges made vnto me, and from all manner bonds of allegiance, regaltie and lordship, in which they were or be bounden to me, or anie otherwise constrained; and them, their heires, and successors for euermore, from the same bonds and oths I release, deliuer, and acquit, and set them for free, dissolued and acquit, and to be harmlesse, for as much as longeth to my person by anie manner waie or title of right, that to me might follow of the foresaid things, or anie of them. And also I resigne all my kinglie dignitie, maiestie and crowne, with all the lordships, power, and priuileges to the foresaid kinglie dignitie and crowne belonging, and all other lordships and possessions to me in anie maner of wise pertaining, of what name, title, qualitie, or condition soeuer they be, except the lands and possessions for me and mine obits purchased and bought. And I renounce all right, and all maner of title of possession, which I euer had or haue in the same lordships and possessions, or anie of them, with anie manner of rights belonging or appertaining vnto anie part of them. And also the rule and gouernance of the same kingdome and lordships, with all ministrations of the same, and all things and euerie each of them, that to the whole empire and iurisdiccions of the same belongeth of right, or in anie wise may belong.

And also I renounce the name, worship, and regaltie and kinglie highnesse, clearelie, freelie, singularlie and wholie, in the most best maner and forme that I may, and with deed and word I leaue off and resigne them, and go from them for euermore; sauing alwaies to my successors kings of England, all the rights, priuileges and appurtenances to the said kingdome and lordships abovesaid belonging and appertaining. For well I wote and knowledge, and deeme my selfe to be, and haue beene insufficient and unable, and also vnprofitable, and for my open deserts not vnworthie to be put downe. And I sweare vpon the holie euangelists here presentlie with my hands touched, that I shall neuer repugne to this resignation, demission or yeelding vp, nor neuer impugne them in anie maner by word or deed, by my selfe nor none other: nor I shall not suffer it to be impugned, in as much as in me is, priuile or apertlie. But I shall haue, hold, and keepe this renouncing, demission, and giuing vp for firme and stable for euermore in all and euerie part thereof, so God me helpe and all saints, and by this holie euangelist, by me bodilie touched and kissed. And for more record of the same, here openlie I subscribe and signe this present resignation with mine owne hand.

Now forthwith in our presences and others, he subscribed the same, and after deliuered it vnto the archbishop of Canturburie, saing that if it were in his power, or at his assignement, he would that the duke of Lancaster there present should be his successor, and king after him. And in token hereof, he tooke a ring of gold from his finger being his signet, and put it vpon the said dukes finger, desiring and requiring the archbishop of Yorke, & the bishop of Hereford, to shew and make report vnto the lords of the parlement of his voluntarie resignation, and also of his intent and good mind that he bare towards his cousin the duke of Lancaster, to haue him his successor and their king after him. ¶ All this doone, euerie man tooke their leaue and returned to their owne.

Upon the morrow after being tuesday, and the last date of September, all the lordes spirituall and temporall, with the commons of the said parlement, assembled at Westmynster, where, in the presence of them, the archbishop of Yorke, and the bishop of Hereford, according to the kings request, shewed vnto them the voluntarie renouncing of the king, with the fauour also which he bare to his cousin of Lancaster to haue him his successor. And moreover shewed them the schedule or bill of renouncement, signed with king Richards owne hand, which they caused to be read first in Latine, as it was written, and after in English. This done, the question was first asked of the lordes, if they would admit and allow that renouncement: the which when it was of them granted granted and confirmed, the like question was asked of the commons, and of them in like manner confirmed. After this, it was then declared, that notwithstanding the foresaid renouncing, so by the lords and commons admitted and confirmed, it were necessarie in avoiding of all suspicions and surmises of euill disposed persons, to haue in writing and registred the manifold crimes and defaults before done by king Richard, to the end that they might first be openlie declared to the people, and after to remaine of record amongst other of the kings records for ever.

All this was done accordingly, for the articles which before yee haue heard, were readone and ingrosed by, and there shewed readie to be read; but for other causes more needfull as then to be preferred, the reading of those articles at that season, was deferred. Then forsomuch as the lords of the parlement had well considered the voluntarie resignation (of king Richard, and that it was behouefull and as they thought) necessarie for the weale of the realme, to proceed vnto the sentence of his deposing, there were appointed by the authoritie of all the estates there in parlement assembled, the bishop of saint Asaph, the abbat of Glasseburie, the earle of Gloucester, the lord Berkeley, William Whiting iustice, and Thomas Erpingham, with Thomas Craie, knights, that they should giue and pronounce the open sentence of the deposing of king Richard. Whereupon the said commissioners taking counsell together, by good and deliberate aduise therein had, with one assent agreed, that the bishop of S. Asaph should publish the sentence for them and in their names, as followeth.

The publication of king Richards deposing.

In the name of God Amen. We John bishop of S. Asaph, John abbat of Glasseburie, Thomas earle of Gloucester, Thomas lord Berkeley, William Whiting iustice, Thomas Erpingham & Thomas Craie knights, chosen and deputed speciall commissioners by the three states of this present parlement, representing the whole bodie of the realme, for all such matters by the said estates to vs committed: we vnderstanding and considering the manifold crimes, hurts, and harmes done by Richard king of England, and misgouernance of the same by a long time, to the great decaille of the said land, and vtter ruine of the same shortlie to haue bene, had not the speciall grace of our God therevnto put the sooner remedie: and also furthermore aduerting, that the said king Richard by acknowledging his owne insufficiencie, hath of his owne mere voluntarie and free will, renounced and giuen ouer the rule & gouernance of this land, with all rights and honours vnto the same belonging, and vtterlie for his merits hath iudged himselfe not unworthy to be deposed of all kinglie maiestie and estate roiall. We the premises well considering by good and diligent deliberation, by the power, name, and authoritie to vs (as aboue is said) committed, pronounce, decerne, and declare the same king Richard, before this to haue bene, and to be vnprofitable, vnable, vninsufficient, and vntoworthie of the rule and gouernance of the foresaid realmes and lordships, and of all rights and other the appurtenances to the same belonging. And for the same causes we depriue him of all kinglie dignitie and worship, and of any kinglie worship in himselfe. And we depose him by our sentence definitiue, forbidding expresselie to all archbishops, and bishops, and all other prelates, dukes, marquesses, eccles, barons and knights, and all other men of the foresaid kingdome and lordships, subjects, and lieges whatsoeuer they be, that none of them from this daie forward, to the foresaid Richard as king and lord of the foresaid realmes and lordships, be neither obedient nor attendant.

After which sentence thus openlie declared, the said estates admitted forthwith the forenamed commissioners for their procurators, to resigne and yeld vnto king Richard, all their homage and fealtie, which in times past they had made and owght vnto him, and also for to declare vnto him (if need were) all things before done that concerned the purpose and cause of his deposing: the which resignation was rescripted till the morow following. Immediatlie as the sentence was in this wise passed, and that by reason thereof the realme stood void without head or gouernour for the time, the duke of Lancaster rising from the place where before he sate, and standing where all those in the house might behold him, in reuerend manner made a signe of the crosse on his forehead, and likewise on his breast, and after silence by an officer commanded, said vnto the people there being present, these words following.

The duke of Lancaster laieth challenge or claime to the crowne.

In the name of the Father, and of the Sonne, & of the Holie-ghost. I Henrie of Lancaster claime the realme of England and the crowne, with all the appurtenances, as I that am descended by right line of the blood comming from that good lord king Henrie the thirde, and through the right that God of his grace hath sent me, with the helpe of my kin, and of my frends, to recouer the same, which was in point to be bridone for default of good gouernance and due iustice.

After these words thus by him vttered, he returned and sate him downe in the place where before he had sitten. When the lords hauing heard and well considered this claime thus made by this noble man, ech of them asked of other what they thought therein. At length, after a little pausing or staie made, the archbishop of Canturburie hauing notice of the minds of the lords, stood up & asked the commons if they would assent to the lords, which in their minds thought the claime of the duke made, to be rightfull and necessarie for the wealth of the realme and them all: whereto the commons with one voice cried, Yea, yea, yea. After which answer, the said archbishop going to the duke, and kneeling downe before him on his knee, addrested to him all his purpose in few words. The which when he had ended, he rose, & taking the duke by the right hand, led him vnto the kings seate, the archbishop of Yorke assisting him, and with great reuerence reuerence set him therein, after that the duke had first vpon his knees made his prayer in deuout manner vnto almighty God. When he was thus placed in his thorne to the great reioicing of the people, the archbishop of Canturburie began a breue collation, taking for his theme these words, written in the first booke of kings the ninth chapter; Vir dominabitur in populo, &c: handling the same, & the whole tenour of his tale to the praise of the king, whose sealed iudgement, grounded in wisdom, perfect reason, and ripe discretion was such (said he) as declared him to be no child, neither in peares, nor in light conditions, but a man able and meete for the gouernement of a realme: so that there was no small cause of comfort ministred to them through the fauourable goodnesse of almighty God, which had provided them of such a gouernor, as like a discret iudge shall deeme in causes by skillfull domes, and rule his subiects in upright equitie, setting apart all willfull pleasures, and childish inconstancie. This is a summarie of his oration. But because the qualitie of this volume is such, as that it hath set forth matters at large: I will laie downe the archbishops words, as they are recozded by Fabian in ample manner as followeth.

The archbishop of Canturburie his oration, framed vpon this text, Vir dominabitur in populo, &c: written in the first booke of kings and ninth chapter.

Abr. Fl. out of Fabian, pag.
351.

These be the words of the high, and most mightie king, speaking to Samuel his prophet, teaching him how he should chosse and ordaine a gouernor of his people of Israel, when the said people asked of him a king, to rule them. And not without cause may these words be said here of our lord the king that is. For, if they be inwardlie conceiued, they shall giue vnto vs matter of consolation and comfort, when it is said that a man shall haue lordship and rule of the people, and not a child. For God threatneth not vs as he sometime threatned the people by Esai, saying: Esa. 3. Et dabo pueros principes eorum, & effeminati dominabuntur eis, I shall (saith our Lord) giue children to be their rulers & princes, and weake or fearefull shall haue dominion ouer them. But of his great mercie he hath visited vs, I trust his peculiar people, and sent vs a man to haue the rule of vs, & put by children that before time ruled this land, after childish conditions, as by the workes of them it hath rightlie appeared, to the disturbance of all this realme; and for want and lacke of a man. For, as saith the apostle Paule ad Corinthios, 1. capite 14. Cum essem paruulus, loquebar vt paruulus, &c: quando autem factus sum vir, euacuaui que erant paruuli, that is to say, When I was a child, I sauored and spake as a child, but at the time when I came vnto the estate of a man, then I put by all my childish conditions.

The apostle saith, he sauored and spake as a child, in whom is no stedfastnesse, or constancie. For a child will lightlie promise, and lightlie he will breake his promise, and doo all things that his appetite giueth him vnto, and forgetteth lightlie what he hath done. By which reason it followeth, that needlie great inconuenience must fall to that people, that a child is ruler and gouernour of: nor it is not possible for that kingdome to stand in felicitie, where such conditions reigne in the head and ruler of the same. But now we ought all to reioice, that all such defaults be expelled, and that a man, and not a child, shall haue lordship ouer vs. To whom it belongeth to haue a sure rane vpon his twong, that he maie be knowne from a child, or a man vsing childish conditions: of whom I trust I maie say, as the wise man saith in his proverbs, Proverb. 3. cap. Beatus homo qui inuenit sapientiam, & qui affluit prudentia, that is to say, Blessed be the man that hath sapience or wisdom, and that aboundeth in prudence. For that man that is ruled by sapience, must needs loue & dread our Lord God, and who so loueth & dreadgeth him, it must consequentlie follow that he must keepe his commandements. By force whereof he shall minister true iustice vnto his subiects, and doo no wrong nor iniurie to any man.

So that then shall follow the words of the wise man the which be rehearsed, Proverb. 10. Benedictio Domini super caput iusti, os autem impiorum operis iniquitatem, that is to saie, The blessing of our Lord God shall light vpon the head of our king, being a iust and righteous man, for the twong of him worketh equitie and iustice; but the twong of the wicked & of sinners couereth iniquitie. And who so worketh or ministereth iustice in due order, he not onlie safeguardeth himself, but also holdeth people in a suertie of restfulness, of the which insueth peace and plentie. And therefore it is said of the wise king Salomon, Eccles. 10. Beata terra cuius rex nobilis est, vel cuius principes vescuuntur in tempore suo, which is to be vnderstanded, that blessed & happie is that land, of the which the king or ruler is noble and wise, and the princes be blessed that liue in his time. As who would say, they may take example of him to rule and guide their subiects. For by the discretion of a noble and wise man being in authoritie, manie evils be sequestred and set apart, all dissemblers put to silence. For the wise man considereth and noteth well the great inconueniences which dailye now growe of it, where the child or insipient drinketh the sweet and delicious words bnauidisedlie, and perceiueth not intoxication which they be mingled or mixt with, till he be inuironed and wrapped in all danger, as latelie the experience thereof hath bene apparent to all our sights and knowledges, & not without the great danger of all this realme. And all was for lacke of wisdom in the ruler, which deemed & taught as a child, giuing sentence of wilfulnesse and not of reason. So that while a child reigned, selfe-will & lust reigned, and reason with good conscience were outlawed, with iustice, stedfastnesse, and manie other vertues.

But of this perill and danger we be deliuered by the speciall helpe and grace of God,

An. Reg. 23.

God, Quia vir dominabitur in populo, that is to say, He that is not a child but perfect in reason. For he cometh not to execute his owne will, but his will that sent him, that is to wit, Gods will, as a man unto whome God of his abundant grace hath giuen perfect reason and discretion, to discern & deme as a perfect man. Wherefore not all onlie of this man we shall saye that he shall dwell in wisdom, but as a perfect man and not a child, he shall thinke, and deme, & haue such a circumspection with him, that he shall diligentlie fore-looke and see that Gods will be done, & not his. And therefore now I trust the words of the wise man, Ecclesiast. 10. Shall be verified in our king: sciens, iudex sapiens indicabit populum, & principatus sensati stabilis erit; that is (as saith the wiseman) A wise and discret iudge shall now deme his people, and the dominion or lordship of a discret wiseman shall stand stedfast. Whereupon shall then follow the second verie of the same chapter, sciens, secundum iudicem populi, sic & ministri eius, that is, Like as the head & soueraigne is replenished with all sapience and vertue, in guiding of his people, administering to them law, with due and convenient iustice, so shall the subiects againward be garnished with awe and louing dread, and beare unto him next God all honour, truth and allegiance.

So that then it may be concluded with the residue of the foresaid verses, Qualis rex, talis & inhabitantes in ea, which is to saye, Such as the ruler of the citie is, such then be the inhabitants of the same. So that consequentlie it followeth, a good master maketh a good disciple. And likewise an euill king or ruler shall lose his people, & the citie of his kingdome shall be left desolate and inhabited. Wherefore thus I make an end. In sted of a child wilfullie doing his lust and pleasure without reason, now shall a man be lord and ruler, that is replenished with sapience and reason, and shall gouerne the people by skilfull dome, setting apart all wilfulness and pleasure of himselfe. So that the word that I began with may be verified of him, Ecce quia vir dominabitur in populo. The which our lord grant, & that he may prosperously reigne unto the pleasure of God and wealth of his realme, Amen.

After the archbishop had ended, wishing that it might so come to passe, and the people answered, men; the king standing on his feet, said unto the lords and commons there present: I thanke you my lords both spirituall and temporall, and all the states of this land, and do you to wit, that it is not my will that any man thinke, that I by the waie of conquest should disherit any man of his heritage, franchises, or other rights, that him ought to haue of right, nor to put him out of that which he now inioieth, and hath had before time by custome or god law of this realme, except such priuat persons as haue bene against the good purpose, and the common profit of the realme. When he had thus ended, all the shiriffes and other officers were put in their authorities againe, to exercise the same as before, which they could not do whilst the kings rofall throne was void.

Whereupon, a proclamation was made, that the states should assemble againe in parlement on Monday then next ensuing, being the feast daie of saint Faith, which is the sixt of October; and that the Monday then next following, being the 13 of the same moneth, and the feast day of saint Edward the king and confessor, the coronation should be solemnized, and that all such as had to claime any seruice to be done by them at the same by any tenure, they should come to the White-hall in the kings palace, before the steward and constable of England, on saturday next before the same day of the parlement, and presenting their petitions that were due & rightfull, they should obtaine that to them appertained. Certe was also made on the kings behalfe, for calling of a parlement upon so short a warning, so as the knights and burgeses were not changed, but onelie appointed to assemble againe, as if the other parlement had rather bene continued than dissolved. The cause was alledged to be for easing of the charges that would haue risen, if ech man had bene sent home, and new knights and burgeses called.

These things done, the king rose from his place, and with a cheerful and right courteous countenance regarding the people, went to White-hall, where the same day he held a great feast. In the after none were proclamations made in the accustomed places of the citie, in the name of king Henrie the fourth. On the morrow following, being Wednesday and first of October, the procurators above named repaired to the tower of London, and there signified unto king Richard the admission of king Henrie. And the aforesaid iustice William Whirning, in name of the other, and for all the states of the land, renounced unto the said Richard late king, all homage and fealties unto him before time due, in manner and forme as appertained. Which renuntiation to the depolish king, was a redoubling of his grace, in so much as thereby it came to his mind, how in former times he was acknowledged & taken for their liege lord and soueraigne, who now (whether in contempt or in malice, God knoweth) to his face swore him to be their king. So that in his beuines he might verie well haue said with a greiued plaintife, Hec quanta fortis miseria mortalibus instans!

Ab hac quoties obliuia nominis apto!
O qui me finctus, quis me telluris huius Perfusa sum tetrica vira deglutiat ore Chasmatico?

Thus was king Richard deprived of all kingly honour and princelie dignitie, by reason he was so giuen to follow euill counsell, and did such inconuenient waies and meanes, through insolent misgouernance, and youthfull outrage, though otherwaie a right noble and worthy prince. He reigned two and twentie yeares, three moneths and eight daies. He deliuered to king Henrie now that he was thus depolish, all the goods that he had, to the summe of three hundred thousand pounds in coine, besides plate and iewels, as a pledge and satisfaction of the injuries by him committed and done, in hope to be in more suretie of life for the deliuerie thereof: but whatsoeuer was promised, he was deceived therein. For shortly after his resignation, he was conueied to the castell of Leeds in Kent, & fro thence to Pomfret, where he departed out of this miserable life (as after you shall heare.) He was semelie of shape and fauor, & of nature good enough, if the wickednesse & naughtie demeanour of such as were about him had not altered it.

This chance berelle was greatlie unfortunate, which fell into such calamitie, that he took it for the best waie he could deuise to renounce his kingdome, for the which mortall men are accustomed to hazard all all they haue to attaine thereunto. But such misfortune (or the like) oftentimes falleth vnto those princes, which when they are aloft, cast no doubt for perils that maie follow. He was prodigall, ambitious, and much giuen to the pleasure of the bodie. He kept the greatest port, and maintained the most plentiful house that euer any king in England did either before his time or since. For there resorted daile to his court about ten thousand persons that had meat and drinke there allowed them. In his kitchen there were three hundred seruitors, and euery other office was furnished after the like rate. Of ladies, chamberlers, and landers, there were about three hundred at the least. And in gorgeous and coslie apparell they exceeded all measure, not one of them that kept with in the bounds of his degre. Preomen and groomes were clothed in silkes, with cloth of grate and skar-let; other sumptuous ye may be sure for their estates.

And this vanitie was not onelie vsed in the court in those daies, but also other people abroad in the towne and countreies, had their garments cut far other wise than had bene accustomed before his daies, with imborderies, rich fures, and goldsmiths worke, and euery daie there was devising of new fashions, to the great hindrance and decate of the common welth.
Moreover, such were preferred to bishoprikes, and other ecclesiasticall livings, as neither could teach nor preach, nor knew any thing of the scripture; so that they were most unworthie the name of bishops, being lewd and most vaine persons disguised in bishops apparell. Furthermore, there reigned abundantly the filthy sinne of lecherie and fornication, with abhominable appetitie, spectable in the king, but most chesellie in the prelatie, whereby the whole realme by such their evil example, was so infected, that the wrath of God was daily provoked to vengeance for the sins of the prince and his people. How then could it continue prosperously with this king, against whom for the whole enuinitie therewith his life was defamed, the wrath of God was whetted and take so sharpe an edge, that the same did thrust him off from the scepter of his kingdom, and gaue him a full cup of affliction to drinke, as he had done to other kings his predecessors, by whose example he might haue taken warning. For it is an heauie case when God thundereth out his reall arguments either vpon prince or people.

Thus haue ye heard what writers do report touching the state of the time and doings of this king. But if I may boldlie saie that I thinke: he was a prince the most vnhankfullie vsed of his subjects, of any one of whom ye shall lightlie read. For although (thorough the frailtie of youth) he demeaned himselfe more dissolutelie than seemed conuenient for his roall estate, & made choise of such counsellors as were not fauoured of the people, whereby he was the lesse fauoured himselfe: yet in no kings daies were the commons in greater wealth, if they could haue perceiued their happie state: neither in any other time were the nobles and gentlemen more cherished, nor churchmen lesse wronged. But such was their ingratitude towards their bountifull & loving soueraigne, that those whom he had chesellie aduanced, were re-bellest to controll him; for that they might not ryle all things at their will, and remoue from him such as they disliked, and place in their roomes whom they thought good, and that rather by strong hand, than by gentle and courteous meanes, which stirred such malice betwixt him and them, till at length it could not be asswaged without perill of destruction to them both.

The duke of Gloucester these instrument of this mischaunce, to what end he came ye haue heard. And although his nephew the duke of Hereford took vpon him to reuenge his death, yet wanted he moderation and loialtie in his doings, for the which both he himselfe and his lineall race were scourged afterwards, as a due punishment vnto rebellious subjects; so as deserued vengeance seemed not to staie long for his ambitious crueltie, that thought it not enough to driue king Richard to resigne his crowne and regall dignitie ouer vnto him, except he also should take from him his guiltlesse life. What vnnaturalnesse, or rather what tigerlike crueltie was this, not to be content with his principalltie: not to be content with his treasure; nor to be content with his depriuation: not to be content with his imprisonment: but being lo herein limit in consanguinitie, which ought to haue moued them like lambs to haue loued each other, woulfullie to lie in wait for the distressed creatures life, and rauenously to thirst after his blood, the spi-riting thereof should haue touched his conscience so, as that death ought rather to haue bene aduentured for his safetie, than so sauagelie to haue sought his life after the losse of his realme.

But to let this passe to the consideration of the learned: according to our manner, I will shew what writers of our English nation liued in his daies, as we find them in John Bale's centuries. First Henrie Bede, other wise surnamed of Wurle, after the name of the house where he is thought to haue bene borne, an Augustine frier, Simon Alcocke, which Bishop of Eborac, borne in the borders of Wales beyond Seuerne; William Jordan a blacke frier, John Wilem a frier spinor, John Clifton a Carmelite frier in Nottingham, Henrie Daniell a blacke frier and a good physitian, Ralfe Parham, John Parham a grate frier, cordelier as some call them, Thomas Wood a Carmelite frier of London, John Walsington borne in Yorkshire, William Wyke an Augustine frier of Canturrie, an histographer, Adam Peremouth a canon of saint Dunstons church in London, that wrote two tre-tises of historical matters, the one intituled Chro-nicon 40 annorum, and the other Chronicon 60 annorum; Simon Eyesham borne in Lincolnshire a doctor of physicke and a skillfull astronomer, John Thompson borne in Dorsetshire in a village of that name, and a Carmelite frier in Blackhithe.

More, Thomas Winton borne in Lincolnshire, an Augustine frier in Stamford; William Walsington secretarie sometime to the Blacke prince an excellent histographer, William Wyke a ciuilian, John Wotesham borne in Cambridgeshire a blacke frier, William Wabbie a Carmelite frier, b-shop of Worcester, and confessor to the duke of Lancaster; William Follenhill a frier spinor borne in Lincolnshire, John Bourgh parson of Collingham in Nottinghamshire a doctor of diuinitie, and chancelor of the Vniuersitie of Cambridge; William Sclade a monke of Buckfast abbey in Devonshire, John Thoresbte archbishop of Yorke and lord chancelor of England, was admitted by pope Urbane the fist into the college of cardinals, but he died before R. Richard came to the crowne, about the eight and fourth yeare of king Edward the third, in the yeare of our Lord 1374. Thomas Ashborne an Augustine frier, John Stone an earnest follower of Wickliffes doctrine, and therefore condemned to perpetuall prison; Casserton a monke of Poerwich and an excellent diuine, Nicholas Radcliffe a monke of saint Albons, John Ashwarbie a diuine and a fauourer of Wicliffes doctrine, Richard Spaldstone so called of the towne in Kent where he was borne, a Carmelite frier of Aileford.

Adde to these John Warbie an Augustine frier, and a great diuine; Robert Waldbie excellentlie

learned as well in diuinitie as other arts, for the which he was first aduanced to a bishoppe in Calcoigne, and after he was admitted archbishop of Dublin; William Berton a doctor of diuinitie, & chancellor of the Vniuersitie of Oxford, and aduersarie to Wickliffe; Philip Kepington abbat of Leicester a notable diuine and defender of Wickliffe, Thomas Lombe a Carmelite frier of Lin, Nicholas Hereford a secular priest, a doctor of diuinitie, and scholer to Wickliffe; Walter Bit also another of Wickliffes scholars wrote both of diuinitie & other arguments, Henrie Berkleie chancellor of the Vniuersitie of Oxford, an enimie to Wickliffe, and a great sophister; Robert Iuorie a Carmelite frier of London, and the twentieth prouinciall of his order here in England; Lankine a Londoner, an Augustine frier, professed in the same citie, a doctor of diuinitie, an aduersarie to Wickliffe.

More, William Gillingham a monke of saint Sauours in Canturburie; John Gylmarke a fellow of sparton colledge in Oxford, a great philosopher and mathematician; John Sharpe a philosopher, and a diuine, wrote many treatises, a great aduersarie to Wickliffe; Richard Lauingham bozne in Suffolke, and a frier of Gipswich, an excellent logician, but a sore enimie to them that fauoured Wickliffes doctrine; Peter Wateshull, of whome ye haue heard before: it is said that he was in the end constrained for doubt of persecution to flee into Boheme; William Woodford a Franciscane frier, a chosen champion against Wickliffe being now dead, procured thereto by the archbishop of Canturburie Thomas Arundell; John Bompyard a Dominicke frier, both a notable lawyer & a diuine, a sore enimie also to Wickliffes; Parcell Angeline an excellent philosopher and a diuine, one of the first teachers in the Vniuersitie of Heidelberg, which Robert duke of Bauier and countie palantine of the Rhene had instituted about that season; Richard Pothall sonne to a maior of London (as is said) of that name, he became a Carmelite frier in the same citie; Thomas Edwardson prior of the friers Augustines at Clare in Suffolke, John Sumner a Franciscane frier at Bridgewater, an enimie to the Wickliffes; Richard Withe a learned priest & an earnest follower of Wickliffe, John Swafham a Carmelite frier of Lin, a student in Cambridge, who became bishop of Bangor, a great aduersarie to the Wickliffes.

Finallie, and to conclude, William Egmond a frier heremit of the sect of the Augustins in Stamford; John Tillington a Franciscane frier, a maineiner of the popes doctrine; William Kimston of Kimington a monke of Salleie, an enimie also to the Wickliffes; Adam Eton well scene in the tongs, was made a cardinal by pope Gregorie the eleauenth, but by pope Urban the first he was committed to prison in Genoa, and at the contemplation of king Richard he was taken out of prison, but not fullie deliuered till the daies of Boniface the ninth, who restored him to his former dignitie; John Beaufu a Carmelite of Pothampton, proceeded doctor of diuinitie in Oxford, and was made prior of his house; Roger Twisford alias Godlucke, an Augustine frier; John Treuise a Cornishman bozne, and a secular priest and vicar of Berkleie, he translated the bible; Bartholomew De proprietatibus rerum; Polychronicon of Ranulph Higden, and diuerse other treatises, Rafe Spalbing a Carmelite frier of Stamford; John mone an Englishman bozne, but a student in Paris, who compiled in the French tong the Romant of the Rose, translated into English by Geoffrey Chaucer, William Shirborne; Richard Wychingham bozne in Suffolke, and diuerse other.

Thus farre Richard of Burdeaux, whose deprivation you haue heard; of his lamentable death hereafter, to wit, pag. 516, 517.

Henrie the fourth, cousine germane to Richard the second, latelie depriued.

When king Richard had resigned (as before is specified) the scepter and crowne; Henrie Plantagenet bozne at Wallingbroke in the countie of Lincolne, duke of Lancaster and Hereford, earle of Derby, Leicester, and Lincoln, sonne to John of Gant duke of Lancaster, with generall consent both of the lords & commons, was published, proclaimed, and declared king of England and of France, and lord of Ireland, the last date of September, in the yeare of the world 5366, of our Lord 1399, of the reigne of the emperour Clemens the two and twentieth, of Charles the first king of France the twentieth, and the tenth of Robert the third king of Scots. After that king Richard had surrendered his title, and dispossessed himselfe (which Chr. Okl. noteth in fewe wordes, saying:

post breue tempus Exiit insigni sese diademate, sceptum Henrico Lancastrensi regale relinquens)

In Angl. prelij.

King Henrie made certeine new officers. And first in right of his earldome of Leicester he gaue the office of high steward of England (belonging to the same earldome) vnto his second sonne the lord Thomas, who by his fathers commandement exercised that office, being assisted (by reason of his tender age) by Thomas Persie earle of Worcester. The earle of Northumberland was made constable of England; sir John Scirlie lord chancellor, John Pothurie elquier lord treasurer, sir Richard Clifford lord p[ri]ncipal scale. For so much as by king Richards resignation and the admitting of a new king, all p[re]sin euery court and place were ceased, and without daie discontinued, new writs were made for summoning of the parliament vnder the name of king Henrie the fourth, the same to be holden, as before was appointed, on mondaie next ensuing. Upon the fourth day of October, the lord Thomas second sonne to the king sat as lord high steward of England by the kings commandement in the White-hall of the kings palace at Westm[on]ster, and as belonged to his office, he caused inquirie to be made what offices were to be exercised by anie maner of persons the daie of the kings coronation, and what fees were belonging to the same, causing proclamation to be made, that what noble man or other that could claime anie office that daie of the solemnizing the kings coronation, they shoulde come and put in their bills cōprehending their demaunders. Whereupon diuers offices & fees were claimed, as well by bills as otherwise by speech of mouth, in forme as here insueth.

First, the lord Henrie the kings eldest sonne, to whome he as in right of his duchie of Lancaster had appointed that office, claimed to beare before the king the principall sword called Curtana, and had his sute granted. John erle of Summerset, to whom the king as in right of his earledome of Lincoln, had granted to be caruer the daie of his coronation, and had it confirmed. Henrie Pertie earle of Northumberland, and high constable of England, by the kings grant claimed that office, and obtained it to enioy at pleasure. The same earle in right of the Ile of Man, which at that present was granted to him, and to his heires by the king, claimed to beare on the kings left side a naked sword, with which the king was girded, when before his coronation he entered as duke of Lancaster into the parts of Holbornesse, which sword was called Lancasters sword. Rafe erle of Westmerland, and earle marshall of England, by the kings grant claimed the same office, and obtained it, notwithstanding that the attornies of the duke of Norfolke, presented to the lord steward their petition on the dukes behalfe, as earle marshall, to exercise the same. Sir Thomas Cringham knight exercised the office of lord great Chamberleine, and gaue water to the king when he washed, both before and after dinner, hauing for his fees, the bason, civer, and towels, with other things whatsoeuer belonging to his office: notwithstanding Aubrie de Aier earle of Wrenford put in his petitions to haue that office as due vnto him from his ancestors. Thomas Beauchampe earle of Warwike by right of inheritance, bare the third sword before the king, and by like right was pantler at the coronation. Sir William Argentine knight, by reason of the tenure of his manour of Wilmundale in the countie of Hertford, serued the king of the first cup of drinke which he tasted of at his dinner the daie of his coronation: the cup was of siluer vngilt, which the same knight had for his fees: notwithstanding the petition which John Fitzwarren presented to the lord steward, requiring that office in right of his wife the ladie Paud, daughter and heire to sir John Argentine knight. Sir Thomas Beuill lord Furnuall, by reason of his manour of Ferneham, with the hamlet of Cere, which he held by the courtessie of England after the decesse of his wife, the ladie Jone decesed, gaue to the king a glove for his right hand, and susteined the kings right arme so long as he bare the scepter.

The lord Reginald Graie of Ruthen, by reason of his manour of Ashleie in Norfolke covered the tables, and had for his fees all the tableclothes, as well those in the hall, as else where, when they were taken by; notwithstanding a petition exhibited by sir John Draiton to haue had that office. The same lord Graie of Ruthen, bare the kings great spurs before him in the time of his coronation by right of inheritance, as heire to John Hastings earle of Penbrooke.

John erle of Summerset, by the kings assignement bare the second sword before him at his coronation, albeit that the said lord Graie of Ruthen by petition exhibited before the lord steward demanded the same office, by reason of his castell & towne of Penbrooke, and of his towne of Denbigh. Thomas earle of Arundell chiefe butler of England, obtained to exercise that office the daie of the coronation, and had the fees thereto belonging granted to him, to wit, the goblet with which the king was serued, and other things to that his office appertaining (the vessels of wine excepted) that late vnder the bar, which were ad-iudged vnto the said lord steward, the said earle of Arundell claime notwithstanding.

The citizens of London chosen forth by the citie, serued in the hall, as assistants to the lord chiefe butler, whilst the king sate at dinner, the daie of his coronation: and when the king entered into his chamber after dinner, and called for wine, the lord maior of London brought to him a cup of gold with wine, and had the same cup given to him, together with the cup that contained water to allay the wine. After the king had drunke, the said lord maior and the aldermen of London had their table to dine at, on the left hand of the king in the hall. Thomas Dimocke, in right of his mother Margaret Dimocke, by reason of the tenure of his manour of Scricuclie, claimed to be the kings champion at his coronation, and had his sute granted; notwithstanding a claime exhibited by Baldwin Frenvill, demanding that office by reason of his castell of Lamtworth in Warwike shire. The said Dimocke had for his fees one of the best coursers in the kings stable, with the kings saddle and all the trappers & harness appertaining to the same horse or courser: he had likewise one of the best armours that was in the kings armourie for his owne bodie, with all that belonged wholie thereunto.

John lord Latimer, although he was vnder age, for himselfe and the duke of Norfolke, notwithstanding that his possessions were in the kings hands, by his attornie sir Thomas Graie knight, claimed and had the office of almoner for that daie, by reason of certeine lands which sometime belonged to the lord William Beauchampe of Bedford. They had a towell of fine linnen cloth prepared, to put in the siluer that was appointed to be given in almes; and likewise they had the distribution of the cloth that concerned the pavement and floers from the kings chamber doze, vnto the place in the church of Westm[on]ster where the pulpit stood. The residue that was spread in the church, the scuten had. William le Menour, by reason he was tenant of the manour of Wiston, claimed and obtained to exercise the office of making wafers for the king the daie of his coronation. The barons of the fine ports claimed, and it was granted them, to beare a canopie of cloth of gold over the sh. with foure staves, & foure bels at the foure corners, euery staffe hauing foure of those barons to beare it: also to dine and sit at the table next to the king on his right hand in the hall the daie of his coronation, and for their fees to haue the said canopie of gold, with the bels and staves, notwithstanding the abbat of Westm[on]ster claimed the same. Edmund chambers claimed and obtained the office of principall larderer for him and his deputies, by reason of his ma-nour of Skulton, otherwile called Wardelebin Skulton, in the countie of Norfolke. Thus was eu-erie man appointed to exercise such office as to him of right appertained, or at the least was thought requisite for the time present. On mondaie then next ensuing,

Edmund erle of Lancaster intrulie false- hood to be sur-named Crokebacke.

when the states were assembled in parlement, order was taken, that by reason of such preparation as was to be made for the coronation, they should sit no more till the morow after saint Edwards daie. On the sundae following, being the euen of saint Edward, the new king lodged in the Tower, and there made fortie & six knights of the Bath, to wit: three of his sonnes, the earle of Arundell, the earle of War-wike his sonne, the earle of Stafford, two of the earle of Devonshires sonnes, the lord Beaumont, the lord Willoughbies brother, the earle of Staffords brother, the lord Camois his sonne, the lord of Spaulie, Thomas Beauchampe, Thomas Pelham, John Ait-trell, John Lisleie, William Haukeford iustice, William Bynchleie iustice, Bartholomew Kach-ford, Giles Daubenie, William Botler, John Ahy-ton, Richard Sanape, John Tiptoft, Richard Fran-cis, Henrie Perle, John Arundell, William Strall, John Turpington, Ailmer Saint, Edward Ha-fings, John Greisclie, Gerald Satill, John Arden, Robert Chalons, Thomas Dimocke, Hungerford, Githeshope, Pelwport, and diuerse other, to the num-ber of fortie and six.

On the morow being saint Edwards daie, and the thirtieth of October, the lord maior of London road towards the Tower to attend the king, with diuerse worshipfull citizens clothed all in red, and from the Tower the king rode through the citie to Westminister, where he was consecrated, annointed, and crowned king by the archbishop of Canturburie with all ceremonies and roiall solemnitie as was due and requisite. Though all other reioiced at his ad-ancement, yet suerlie Edmund Mortimer earle of March, which was cosine and heire to Lionel duke of Clarence, the third begotten sonne of king Ed-ward the third, & Richard earle of Cambzidge, sonne to Edmund duke of York, which had married Anne sister to the same Edmund, were with these doings neither pleased nor contented: insomuch that now the diuision once begun, the one lineage ceased not to persecute the other, till the heires males of both the lines were clerlie destroyed and extinguished.

At the daie of the coronation, to the end he should not seeme to take vpon him the crowne and scepter roiall by plaine extorted power, and insidious intru-sion: he was aduised to make his title as heire to Ed-mund (surnamed of intrulie seined) Crokebacke, sonne to king Henrie the third, and to saie that the said Edmund was elder brother to king Edward the first, and for his desormitie put by from the crowne, to whom by his mother Blanch, daughter and sole heire to Henrie duke of Lancaster, he was next of blood, and vndoubted heire. But because not onelie his friends, but also his priuie enemies, knew that this was but a forged title, considering they were suerlie informed, not onelie that the said Edmund was younger sonne to king Henrie the third, but also had true knowledge, that Edmund was neither cembrebacked, nor a deforimed person, but a goodlie gentelman, and a valiant capteine, and so much fauored of his louing father, that he to preferre him in marriage to the queene Dowager of Spauarre, ha-ving a great luckehod, gaue to him the countie pa-lantine of Lancaster, with manie notable honours, high seignories, and large priuileges. Therefore they aduised him to publish it; that he challenged the realme not onelie by conquest, but also because he by king Richard was adopted as heire, and decla-red by resignation as his lawfull successor, being next heire male to him of the blood roiall.

But to proceed to other doings. The solemnitie of the coronation being ended, the morow after being tuesday, the parlement began againe, and the next daie sir John Cheinie that was speaker, excusing himselfe, by reason of his infirmite and sicknesse, not to be able to exercise that come, was dismissed, and one William Durward esquier was admitted. Herewith were the acts established in the parlement of the one & twentieth yeare of king Richards reigne repealed and made void, and the ordinances deuised in the parlement holden the eleuenth yeare of the same king, confirmed, and againe established for good and profitable. ¶ On the same daie, the kings eldest sonne lord Henrie, by assent of all the states in the parlement, was created prince of Wales, duke of Cornuall, and earle of Chester, then being of the age of twelue yeares.

Upon the thursdaie, the commons came and re-hearsed all the errors of the last parlement holden in the one and twentieth yeare of king Richard, & namelie in certeine five of them.

First, that where the king that now is, was readie to arraigne an appeale against the duke of Dorfolke, he doing what pertained to his dutie in that behalfe, was yet banished afterwards without anie reason-able cause.

Secondlie, the archbishop of Canturburie, me-tropolitan of the realme, was foreiudged without answer.

Thirddie, the duke of Glocester was murdered, and after foreiudged.

Fourthlie, where the earle of Arundell alledged his charters of pardon, the same might not be al-lowed.

Fiftlie, that all the power of that euill parlement was granted and assigned ouer to certeine persons, and sith that such heinous errors could not be com-mitted (as was thought) without the assent and ad-uise of them that were of the late kings counsell, they made sute that they might be put vnder arrest, and committed to safe keeping, till order might be further taken for them.

Thus much adoe there was in this parlement, speciallie about them that were thought to be guiltie of the duke of Glocesters death, and of the condem-ning of the other lords that were adiudged traitors in the forsaide late parlement holden in the said one and twentieth yeare of king Richards reigne. Sir John Bagot knight then prisoner in the Tower, dis-closed manie secrets, vnto the which he was priuie; and being brought on a daie to the barre, a bill was read in English which he had made, containing cer-teine euill practises of king Richard; and further what great affection the same king bare to the duke of Aumarle, insomuch that he heard him say, that if he should renounce the gouernement of the king-dome, he wished to leaue it to the said duke, as to the most able man (for wisdom and manhood) of all o-ther: for though he could like better of the duke of Hereford, yet he said that he knew if he were once king, he would proue an extreamie enimie and cruell tyrant to the church.

It was further contained in that bill, that as the same Bagot rode on a daie behind the duke of Por-folke in the Swanp street toward Westminister, the duke asked him what he knew of the manner of the duke of Glocester his death, and he answered that he knew nothing at all: but the people (quoth he) do say that you haue murdered him. Wherevnto the duke swore great othes that it was intrulie, and that he had saued his life contrarie to the will of the king, and certeine other lords, by the space of three weeks, and more; affirming withall, that he was neuer in all his life time more affraid of death, than he was at his comming home againe from Calis at that time, to the kings presence, by reason he had not put the duke to death. And then (said he) the king appoint-ed one of his owne seruants, and certeine other that her of the par-lement dismis-sed, and wil-liam Dur-ward admit-ted.

It was repealed.

It was confir-med.

were servants to other lords to go with him to see the said duke of Gloucester put to death, swearing that as he should answer afore God, it was never his mind that he should have died in the fort, but onlie for feare of the king, and saving of his owne life. Pe- uertheless, there was no man in the realme to whom king Richard was so much beholden, as to the duke of Aumarle: for he was the man that to fulfill his mind, had set him in hand with all that was done against the said duke, and the other lords. There was also contained in that bill, what secret malice king Richard had conceived against the duke of Hereford being in exile, whereof the same Bagot had sent intelligence unto the duke into France, by one Roger Smart, who certified it to him by Piers Buckton, and others, to the intent he should the better have regard to himselfe. There was also contained in the said bill, that Bagot had heard the duke of Aumarle say, that he had rather than twentie thousand pounds that the duke of Hereford were dead, not for any feare he had of him, but for the trouble and mischefe that he was like to procure within the realme.

John Hall a
preman.

After that the bill had bene read and heard, the duke of Aumarle rose vp and said, that as touching the points contained in the bill concerning him, they were bitterlie false and untrue, which he would proue with his bodie, in what manner soeuer it should be thought requisite. Therewith also the duke of Gloucester rose vp, and willed Bagot that if he could say any thing against him to speake it openlie. Bagot answered, that for his part he could say nothing against him: But there is (said he) a preman in *pe*lucog at one John hall that can say somewhat. Well then (said the duke of Gloucester) this that I do and shall say is true, that the late king, the duke of *po*rfolke, and thou being at *W*oodstoke, made me to go with you into the chappell, and there the duke being shut, ye made me to sweare vpon the altar, to keepe counsell in that ye had to say to me, and then ye rehearsed that we should neuer haue our purpose, so long as the duke of Lancaster liued, & therefore ye purposed to haue counsell at *W*ichfield, & there you would arrest the duke of Lancaster, in such sort as by colour of his disobeying the arrest, he should be dispatched out of life. And in this manner ye imagined his death. To the which I answered, that it were conuenient the king should send for his counsell, and if they agreed hereunto, I would not be against it, and so I departed. To this Bagot made no answer.

After this, the king commanded that the lords, Berkleie, and Louell, and six knights of the lower house, should go after dinner to examine the said Hall. This was on a Thursdaye being the fifteenth of October. On the Saturday next ensuing, sir William Bagot and the said John Hall were brought both to the barre, and Bagot was examined of certaine points, and sent againe to prison. The lord Fitzwater herewith rose vp, and said to the king, that where the duke of Aumarle excuseth himselfe of the duke of Gloucesters death, I say (quoth he) that he was the verie cause of his death; and so he appealed him of treason, offering by throwing downe his hood as a gage to proue it with his bodie. There were twentie other lords also that threw downe their hoods, as pledges to proue the like matter against the duke of Aumarle. The duke of Aumarle threw downe his hood to trie it against the lord Fitzwater, as against him that lied falselie, in that he had charged him with, by that his appeale. These gages were deliuered to the constable and marshall of England, and the parties put vnder arrest.

The duke of Surrie stood by also against the lord Fitzwater, auouching that where he had said that the appellants were causers of the duke of Gloucesters death, it was false, for they were constrained to sue the same appeale, in like manner as the said lord Fitzwater was compelled to giue iudgement against the duke of Gloucester, and the earle of Arundell; so that the suing of the appeale was done by constraint, and if he said contrarie he lied: and therewith he threw downe his hood. The lord Fitzwater answered herewith, that he was not present in the parlement house, when iudgement was giuen against them, and all the lords bare witness thereof. Moreover, where it was alledged that the duke of Aumarle should send two of his servants to Calis, to murder the duke of Gloucester, the said duke of Aumarle said, that if the duke of *po*rfolke affirme it, he lied falselie, and that he would proue with his bodie, throwing downe an other hood which he had borrowed. The same was likewise deliuered to the constable and marshall of England, and the king licensed the duke of *po*rfolke to returne, that he might arraigne his appeale. After this was John Hall condemned of treason by authoritie of the parlement, for that he had confessed himselfe to be one of them that put the duke of Gloucester to death at Calis, and so on the Monday following, he was drawne from the Towler to Tiburne, and there hanged, bowelled, headed, and quartered: his head being sent to Calis there to be set vp, where the duke was murdered.

On Wednesday following, request was made by the commons, that sith king Richard had resigned and was lawfullie deposed from his roiall dignitie, he might haue iudgement decreed against him, so as the realme were not troubled by him, and that the causes of his deposing might be published through the realme for satisfieng of the people: which demand was granted. Whereupon the bishop of Carleill, a man both learned, wise, and stout of stomach, boldlie shewed forth his opinion concerning that demand, affirming that there was none amongst them worthy to meet to giue iudgement vpon so noble a prince as king Richard was, whom they had taken for their souereigne and liege lord, by the space of two & twentie yeares and more; And I assure you (said he) there is not so rank a traitor, nor so errant a thief, nor yet so cruell a murderer apprehended or detained in prison for his offence, but he shall be brought before the iustice to heare his iudgement; and will ye proceed to the iudgement of an anointed king, hearing neither his answer nor excuse? I say, that the duke of Lancaster whom ye call king, hath more trespassed to Richard & his realme, than king Richard hath done either to him, or vs: for it is manifest & well knowne, that the duke was banished the realme by Richard and his counsell, and by the iudgement of his owne father, for the space of ten yeares, for what cause ye know, and yet without licence of king Richard, he is returned againe into the realme, and (that is worse) hath taken vpon him the name, title, & prebendience of king. And therefore I say, that you haue done manifest wrong, to proceede against him against king Richard, without calling him openlie to his answer and defense. As soon as the bishop had ended his tale, he was attached by the earle marshall, and committed to ward in the abbey of saint Albons.

Moreover, where the king had granted to the earle of Westmerland the countie of Richmond, the duke of Britaine pretending a right thereto by an old title, had sent his letters ouer vnto the estates assembled in this parlement, offering to abide such order as the law would appoint in the like case to any of the kings subjects. Whereupon the commons for the more suertie of the intercourse of merchants, besought the king that the matter might be committed to the ordering of the counsell of either of the parties, parties, and of his counsell, so as an end might be had therein, which request was likewise granted. After this, the records of the last parliament were shewed, with the appeals, & the commission made to twelve persons, to determine things that were motioned in the same last parliament. Whereupon the commons prayed that they might have iustice Parkham, and maister Calcoigne a sergeant at the law joined with them for counsell, touching the perusing of the records, which was granted them, and day given over till the next morrow in the White-hall, where they sat about these matters three daies together.

On the morrow following, being the euen of Simon and Jude the apostles, the commons requested to heare the iudgement of king Richard. Whereupon the archbishop of Canturburie appointed to speake, declared how that the king that now is, had granted king Richard his life; but in such wise as he should remaine in perpetuall prison, so safely kept, that neither the king nor realme should be troubled with him. It was also concluded, that if anie man went about to deliuer him, that then he should be the first that should die for it. After this, the commons prayed that the lords and other that were of king Richards counsell, might be put to their answers for their sundrie misdemeanours, which was granted. On Wednesday following, being the morrow after the feast of Simon and Jude, all the proceſſe of the parlement holden the 21 yere of king Richards reigne was read openlie, in which it was found, how the earle of Warwick had confessed himselfe guiltie of treason, and asked pardon and mercie for his offense: but the earle denied that euer he acknowledged anie such thing by word of mouth, and that he would proue in what manner soeuer should be to him appointed. Wherein was also the appeale found of the dukes of Aumarle, Surrie, and Exceſter, the marquesse Dorset, the earles of Salisburie, and Gloceſter, unto the which eche of them answered by himselfe, that they neuer assented to that appeale of their owne free wills, but were compelled thereto by the king: and this they affirmed by their othes, and offered to proue it by what manner they should be appointed.

Sir Walter Clopton said then to the commons; If ye will take aduantage of the proceſſe of the last parlement, take it, and ye shall be receiued thereunto. Then rose vp the lord Spolzie, and said to the earle of Salisburie, that he was chiefe of counsell with the duke of Gloceſter, and likewise with king Richard, & so discovered the dukes counsell to the king, as a traitor to his maister, and that he said he would with his bodie proue against him, throwing downe his hod as a pledge. The earle of Salisburie soe moued herewith, told the lord Spolzie, that he falslie belied him, for he was neuer traitor, nor false to his maister all his life time, and therewith threw downe his gloue to wage battell against the lord Spolzie. Their gages were taken by, and deliuered to the constable and marshall of England, and the parties were arrested, and day to them given till another time.

On mondaie following, being the morrow after All soules day, the commons made request, that they might not be entred in the parlement rols, as parties to the iudgement given in this parlement, but there as in verie truth they were partie to the same: for the iudgement otherwise belonged to the king, except there anie iudgment is given by statute enacted for the profit of the common-wealth, which request was granted. Divers other petitions were presented on the behalfe of the commons, part whereof were granted, and to some there was none answer made at that time. Finally, to auoid further inconvenience, and to qualifie the minds of the enuious, it was finally enacted, that such as were appellants in the last parlement against the duke of Gloceſter and other, should in this wise following be ordered. The dukes of Aumarle, Surrie, and Exceſter there present, were iudged to lose their names of dukes, together with the honours, titles and dignities thereunto belonging. The marquesse Dorset being likewise there present, was adiudged to lose his title and dignitie of marquesse; and the earle of Gloceſter being also present, was in semblable manner iudged to lose his name, title and dignitie of earle.

Moreover, it was further decreed against them, that they and euerie of them should lose and forfeit all those castles, lordships, manors, lands, possessions, rents, seruices, liberties and reuenues, whatsoever had bene given to them, at or since the last parlement, belonging aforesaid to any of those persons whom they had appealed, and all other their castles, manors, lordships, lands, possessions, rents, seruices, liberties, and reuenues whatsoever, which they held of the late kings gift, the daie of the arrest of the said duke of Gloceſter, or at any time after, should also remaine in the kings disposition from thenceforth, and all letters patents and charters, which they or any of them had of the same names, castles, manors, lordships, lands, possessions, and liberties, should be surrendered by into the chancery, there to be cancelled. Diuerse other things were enacted in this parlement, to the preiudice of those high estates, to satisfie mens minds that were soe displeased with their doings in the late kings daies, as now it manifestlie appeared. For after it was understood that they should be no further punished than as before is mentioned, great murmuring rose among the people against the king, the archbishop of Canturburie, the earle of Northumberland, and other of the counsell, for saving the liues of men whom the commons reputed most wicked, and not worthe in anie wise to liue. But the king thought it best, rather with courtesie to reconcile them, than by cutting them off by death, to procure the hatred of their friends and allies, which were manie, and of no small power.

After that the foresaid iudgement was declared with protestation by sir William Thirning iustice, the earle of Salisburie came and made request, that he might haue his protestation entered against the lord Spolzie, which lord Spolzie rising vp from his seat, said, that so he might not haue; because in his first answer he made no protestation, and therefore he was past it now. The earle prayed day of aduſement, but the lord Spolzie prayed that he might lose his aduantage, sith he had not entered sufficient plea against him. Then sir Matthew Gournie sitting by derneath the king said to the earle of Salisburie, that forsomuch as at the first day in your answers, ye made no protestation at all, none is entered of record, and so you are past that aduantage: and therefore asked him if he would saie any other thing. Then the earle desired that he might put in mainprise, which was granted: and so the earle of Kent, sir Rafe Ferrers, sir John Roch, & sir John Draxton knights, mainprised the said earle bodie for bodie. For the lord Spolzie all the lords and barons offered to undertake, and to be suerties for him; but yet foure of them had their names entered, that is to saie, the lords Willoughbie, Beauchampe, Seales, and Berkelie: they had day till the fridaie after to make their libell.

After this came the lord Fitzwater, and prayed to haue day and place to arreigne his appeale against the earle of Rutland. The king said he would send for the duke of Northfolke to returne home, and then upon his returne he said he would proceed in that matter. Many statutes were established in this parlement, as well concerning the whole bodie of the common-wealth (as by the booke thereof imprinted may appeare) as also concerning diuerse private persons then presentlie living, which partlie we haue touched, and partlie so: doubt to be ouer-tedious, we do omit. But this among other is not to be forgotten that the archbishop of Canturburie was not onelie restored to his former dignitie, being removed from it by king Richard, who had procured one Roger Walden to be placed therein (as before ye haue heard) but also the said Walden was established bishop of London, wherewith he seemed well content.

Whereouer, the kings eldest sonne Henrie already created (as heire to his father, and to the crowne) prince of Wales, duke of Cornetwall, and earle of Chester, was also intituled duke of Aquitaine: and to auoid all titles, claimes, and ambiguities, there was an act made for the uniting of the crowne vnto king Henrie the fourth, and to the heires of his bodie lawfullie begotten, his soure sonnes, Henrie, Thomas, John, and Humfrie, being named, as to whom the right should descend successiuelie by waie of inheritance, in case where heires failed to any of them. By force of this act king Henrie thought himselfe firmer set on a sure foundation, not needing to feare any storme of aduerser fortune. But yet shortly after he was put in danger to haue bene set besides the seat, by a conspiracie begun in the abbay of Westminster house, which had it not bene hindered, it is doubtful whether the new king should haue inioined his roialtie, or the old king (now a prisoner) restored to his principallitie. But God (of whome the poet saith,

humana rotat Instar volucris pulueris acti Turbine celeri mobilis aura) had purposed a disappointment of their confuration, and therefore no maruell though the issue of their labours were infortunat by their flattering hope.

But now to make an end with this parlement. After that things were concluded and granted, so as was thought to stand with the suertie of the king, and good quiet of the realme, the king granted a free pardon to all his subiects, those excepted that were at the murder of the duke of Gloucester, and such as had committed wilfull murder, or rape, or were knowne to be notorious thieues. And those that were to take benefitt by this pardon, were appointed to sue forth the charters thereof, betwixt that present and the feast of All saints next ensuing, and so was this parlement dissolved. Immediately after, the king (according to an order taken in the same parlement, to giue to vnderstand vnto all princes and countries about him, by that title and occasion he had taken to him the kingdom) sent ambassadors vnto them to signifie the same. Into Rome were sent, John Trenchant bishop of Hereford, sir John Cheine knight, & John Cheine esquier. Into France, master Walter Shirley bishop of Durham, and Thomas Persie earle of Worcester. Into Spaine, John Trenchour bishop of saint Asaph, and sir William Parre knight. Into Almaine the bishop of Bangor, and two others.

The Scots in time of the late parlement, taking occasion of the absence of the northerne lords, and also by reason of great mortalitie that afflicted the northerne people that yeare, invaded the borders, took the castell of Warke, that was assigned to the safe keeping of sir Thomas Greie knight, who then was at the parlement, as one of the knights of the shire, by meanes of whose absence, the enemies the sooner (as is to be thought) obtained their desire, and so kept that castell a certeine time, and finally spoiled it, and overthrow it to the ground. Besides all this, they did manie other mischeues in the countrie, to the vndoing of manie of the kings subiects. This yeare Thomas Mowbray duke of Norfolk died in erile at Mentce, whose death might haue bene too: shillie bewailed of all the realme, if he had not bene consenting to the death of the duke of Gloucester. The same yeare deceased the duchesse of Gloucester, thorough sorrow (as was thought) which she conceined for the losse of hir sonne and heire the lord Humfrie, who being sent for: south of Ireland (as before ye haue heard) was taken with the pestilence, and died by the waie.

But now to speake of the conspiracie, which was contriued by the abbay of Westminster as chiefe instrument thereof. We shall vnderstand, that this abbay (as it is reported) vpon a time heard king Henrie saie, when he was but earle of Derby, and young of yeares, that princes had too little, and religious men too much. He therfore doubting now, least if the king continued long in the estate, he would remove the great beame that then greued his eyes, and picked his conscience, became an instrument to search out the minds of the nobilitie, and to bring them to an assemblie and counsell, where they might consult and commen together, how to bring that to effect, which they earnestlie wished and desired: that was, the destruction of king Henrie, and the restoring of king Richard. For there were diuerse lords that shewed themselves outwardlie to fauor king Henrie, where they secretlie wished & sought his confusion. The abbay after he had felt the minds of sundrie of them, called to his house on a day in the terme time, all such lords & other persons which he either knew or thought to be as affectioned to king Richard, so enuious to the prosperitie of king Henrie, whose names were, John Holland earle of Huntington late duke of Excester, Thomas Holland earle of Kent late duke of Surrie, Edward earle of Rutland late duke of Aumarle sonne to the duke of Porke, John Pontacute earle of Salisbury, Hugh lord Spenser late earle of Gloucester, John the bishop of Carleill, sir Thomas Blunt, and Maudelen a priest one of king Richards chappell, a man as like him in stature and proportion in all lineaments of bodie, as unlike in birth, dignitie, and conditions.

The abbay highlie feasted these lords, his speciall frends, and when they had well dined, they withdrew into a secret chamber, where they sat doone in counsell, and after much talke & conference had about the bringing of their purpose to passe concerning the destruction of king Henrie, at length by the aduise of the earle of Huntington it was deuised, that they should take vpon them a solemne iuss to be enterprised betwene him and 20 on his part, & the earle of Salisbury and 20 with him at Oxford, to the which triumph king Henrie should be desired, & when he should be most busilie marking the martiall pastime, he suddenly should be slaine and destroyed, and so by that means king Richard, who as yet liued, might be restored to libertie, and haue his former estate & dignitie. It was further appointed, who should assemble the people, the number and persons which should accomplish and put in execution their deuised enterprise. Whereupon was an indenture septipartite made, sealed with their seales, and signed with their hands, in the which each stood bound to other, to do their whole endeavour for the accomplishing of their purposed exploit. Whereouer, they swore on the holie euangelists to be true and secret each to other, euen to the houre and point of death.

When all things were thus appointed, the earle of Huntington came to the king vnto Windsor, earnestlie requiring him, that he would vouchsafe to be at Oxford on the daie appointed of their iusses, both to behold the same, and to be the discourser and indifferent iudge (if anye ambiguitie should rise) of their couragious acts and doings. thus instantlie required of his brother in law, and nothing lesse imagining than that which was pzetendthing obtained, all the lords of the conspiracie departed home to their houses, as they noised it, to set armours on worke about the trimming of their armour against the iusts, and to prepare all other furniture and things readie, as to such an high & solemne triumph appertained. The earle of Huntington came to his house and raised men on euerie side, and prepared horse and harnesse for his compassed purpose, and when he had all things readie, he departed towards Drenford, and at his coming thither, he found all his mates and confederates there, well appointed for their purpose, except the earle of Rutland, by whose follie their pzedified conspiracie was brought to light and disclosed to king Henrie. For this earle of Rutland departing before from Westminster to see his father the duke of Yorke, as he sat at dinner, had his counterpane of the indenture of the confederacie in his bosome.

The father espieing it, would needs see what it was:
and though the sonne humbly denied to shew it, the father being more earnest to see it, by force took it out of his bosome, and perceiuing the contents ther-of, in a great rage caused his hordes to be fabled out of hand, and spitefullie repprouing his sonne of treason, for whome he was become suertie and mainpernour for his god abearing in open parlement, he incontinentlie mounted on horsebacke to ride towards Windsoze to the king, to declare vnto him the malicious intent of his complices. The earle of Rutland seeing in what danger he stood, took his horse, and rode another waie to Windsoze in post, so that he got thither before his father, and when he was alighted at the castell gate, he caused the gates to be shut, saieing that he must needs deliuer the keyes to the king. When he came before the kings presence, he kneeled downe on his knees, beseeching him of mercie and forgiveness, and declaring the whole matter vnto him in order as euerie thing had passed, obtained pardon. Therewith came his father, and being let in, deliuered the indenture which he had taken from his sonne, vnto the king, who thereby perceiuing his sonnes words to be true, changed his purpose for his going to Drenford, and dispatched messengers forth to signifie vnto the earle of Yorke, humblyland his high constable, and to the earle of Westmerland his high marshall, and to other his assured friends, of all the doubtfull danger and perilous iopardie.

The conspiratozs being at Drenford, at length perceiued by the lacke of the earle of Rutland, that their enterprize was reuealed to the king, and there-vpon determined now openlie with speare and shield to bring that to passe which before they couertlie attempted, and so they adorneed Hagbale, a man most resembling king Richard, in roiall and princelie be-sure, and named him to be king Richard, affirming that by fauour of his keepers he was escaped out of pison, and so they came forwarde in order of warre, to the intent to destroe king Henrie. Whilest the confederatozs with their new published idoll, accompanied with a strong armie of men, took the direct waie towarde Windsoze, king Henrie admonished thereof, with a few horsemen in the night came to the Tower of London about twelue of the clocke, where in the morning he caused the maior of the citie to apparell in armour the best and most couragious persons of the citie, which brought to him thre thousand archers, and thre thousand bill-men, besides them that were appointed to kepe and defend the citie.

The conspiratozs coming to Windsoze, entered the castell, and vnderstanding that the king was gon from thence to London, determined with all speed to make towarde the citie: but changing that determination as they were on their waie, they turned to Colbroke, and there staid. King Henrie issuing out of London with twentie thousand men, came streight to Hunslo heath, and there pitched his campe to abide the coming of his enemies: but when they were aduertised of the kings puissance, amazed with fear, and forthinking their begun enterprize, as men mistrusting their owne companie, departed from thence to Berkhamsted, and so to Cirencester, & there the lords took their lodging. The earle of Kent, and the earle of Salisburie in one Inne, and the earle of Huntington and lord Spenser in an other, and all the host laie in the fields, whereupon in the night season, the bailiffe of the towne with fourescore archers set on the house, where the erle of Kent and the other laie, which house was manfullie assaulted and strong-lie defended a great space. The earle of Huntington being in an other Inne with the lord Spenser, set fire on diuerse houses in the towne, thinking that the assailants would leaue the assault and rescue their goods, which thing they nothing regarded. The host li-eng without, hearing noise, and seeing this fire in the towne, thought verelie that king Henrie had bene come thither with his puissance, and therevpon fled without measure, euerie man making shift to saue himselfe, and so that which the lords desired for their helpe, wrought their destruction: for if the armie that laie without the towne had not mistaken the matter, when they saw the houses on fire, they might easilie haue succoured their cheefesteins in the towne, that were assailed but with a few of the townesmen, in comparison of the great multitude that laie abroad in the fields. But such was the ordinance of the mightie Lord of hostes, who disposeth althings at his pleasure.

The earle of Huntington and his companie seeing the force of the townesmen to increase, fled out on the backside, intending to repaire to the armie which they found dispersed and gone. When the earle seeing no hope of comfort, fled into Ciler. The other lords which were left fighting in the towne of Cirencester, were wounded to death and taken, and their heads stricken off and sent to London. Thus witeth Hall of this conspiracie, in following what authoz I know not. But Thomas Walsingham and diuerse other seeme somewhat to dissent from him in relation of this matter: for they write that the conspiratozs ment vpon the sudden to haue set vpon the king in the castell of Windsoze, vnder colour of a maske omummerie, and so to haue dispatched him: and restoring king Richard vnto the kingdome, to haue reco-uered their former titles of honour, with the possessions which they had lost by iudgement of the last par-lement. But the king getting knowledge of their pzetended treasons, got him with all speed vnto London.

The conspiratozs, to wit, the earles of Kent and Salisburie, sir Rafe Lumlie, and others, supposing that the king had not vnderstood their malicious purpose, the first sundaie of the new yeare, which fell in the octaues of the Innocents, came in the twilight of the evening vnto Windsoze with foure hundred armed men, where vnderstanding that the king was withdrawne vpon warning had of their purposed intention, they forthwith returned backe, and came first vnto Sunnings, a manor place not farre from Reading, where the quene wife to king Richard then laie. Here setting a good countenance of the matter, the earle of Kent declared in presence of the quenes seruants that the lord Henrie of Lancaster was fled from his presence with his children and friends, and had had shut by himselfe & them in the Tower of London, as one afraid to come abroad, for all the brags made heretofore of his manhood: and therefore (saith he) my intention is (my lords) to go to Richard that was, is, and shall be our king, who being already escaped forth of prison, lieth now at Pomfret, with an hundred thousand men. And to cause his speech the better to be believed, he took away the kings cognisances from them that wore the same, as the collars from their necks, and the badges of crellants from the sleeves of the servants of household, and throwing them away, said that such cognisances were no longer to be borne.

Thus having put the queene in a false hope of that which was nothing so, they departed from thence unto Wallingford, and after to Abington, instilling the people by all meanes possible unto rebellion, all the waie as they went, and sending their agents abroad for the same purpose: at length they came to Cirester in the darke of the night, and took by their lodgings. The inhabitants of that towne suspecting the matter, and indging (as the truth was) these rumors which the lords spread abroad to be but dreams, they took thereupon counsell together, got them to arms, and stopped all the entries and outgates of the town where these new ghesles were lodged, in so much that when they about midnight secretly attempted to have come forth, and gone their waies, the townsmen with bows and arrowes were ready to slay them, and keepe them in. The lords perceiving the danger, got them to their arms and weapons, and did their best by force to breake through and repell the townsmen. But after they had fought from midnight till thre of the clocke in the afternoon of the next daie, and perceived they could not prevail, they yielded themselves to the townsmen, beseeching them to have their lives saved, till they might come to the kings presence.

This request they had obtained, if a priest that was chapleine to one of them, had not in the meane time set fire upon certaine houses in the towne, to the end that whiles the townsmen should busie themselves to quench the fire, the lords might find meanes to escape. But it came nothing to passe as he imagined, for the townsmen leaving all care to save their houses from the rage of the fire, were kindled more in furie towards the lords, and so to revenge themselves of them they brought them forth of the abbey where they had them in their hands, and in the twilight of the evening, strooke off their heads. The earle of Salisbury, saith Thomas Walsingham) who in all his life time had bene a fauourer of the Lollards or Wickliffites, a despiser of images, a contemner of canons, and a scorner of the sacraments, ended his daies, as it was reported) without the sacrament of confession. These be the words of Thom. Wall. which are set downe, to signifie that the earle of Salisbury was a hidden ghesst to blackham feast with the rest: and as it should seme by his relation the more maligne, because he was somewhat estranged fro the corruption of the religion then received, and leaned to a sect pursued with spitefulness and revenge.

John Houl and earle of Huntington (as Thomas Walsingham writeth) was not with the lords at the castell of Windsor, but staid about London to be bold the end of his businesse: and hearing how the matter went, farre contrarie to that he wished, he sought to flee by sea; but not able to get away, by reason the wind being contrarie would not permit him, he took his battle, and having a knight with him called sir John Schellie, he rood into Essex, attempting to have fled from thence by sea: but still the wind was so against him, that he was continually driven backe when he was about to make saile, and so coming againe to land, he was taken one evening at Whitwell in Essex, in a mill (that belonged to one of his trustie friends) as he sat there at supper, together with the said sir John Schellie. The commons of the countie that took him, brought him first to Chelmsford, and after to Plashie, where on the daie of St. Maure, that is the fifteenth of Januarie, about sun setting he was beheaded, in the verie place in which the duke of Glocester was arrested by king Richard. He confessed with lamentable repentance (as writers do record) that diuers & manie waies he had offended God and his prince, because that understanding the purpose of the other lords, he had not reuealed the same.

The lord Hugh Spenser, otherwisse called earle of Glocester, as he would have fled into Wales, was taken and carried to Wiltshir, where (according to the earnest desires of the commons) he was beheaded. Gaudeleu fleeing into Scotland, was taken by the waie, and brought to the Tower. Manie other that were partie to this conspiracie, were taken, and put to death, some at Wyford, as sir Thomas Blunt, sir Benet Cilie knight, and Thomas Wintercell esquier, but sir Leonard Bokas, and sir John Schellie knights, John Gaudeleu, and William Serbie chaplains, were alone, hanged, and beheaded at London. There were nineteene in all executed in one place and other, and the heads of the chiefe conspirators were set on poles ouer London bridge, to the terror of others. Shortly after, the abbat of Westminster, in whose house the conspiracie was begun (as is said) going betwene his monastrie & manstion, for thought fell into a sudden palsey, and shortly after, without speech, ended his life. The bishop of Carleill was impeached, and condemned of the same conspiracie; but the king of his mercifull clemencie, pardoned him of that offense, although he died shortly after, more through feare than force of sickness, as some haue written. Thus all the associates of this unhappie conspiracie tasted the painefull penance of their pleasant pastime.

Thus haue ye heard what writers haue recorded of this matter, with some difference betwixt them: that write, how the king should haue bene made away at a iuss; and other that testifie, how it should haue bene at a masse or mummerie: but whether they meant to haue dispatched him at a mumming, or at a iuss, their purpose being reuealed by the earle of Rutland, they were brought to confusion (as before ye haue heard.) And immediatlie after, king Henrie, to rid himselfe of any such like danger to be attempted against him thereafter, caused king Richard to die of a violent death, that no man should afterward saue himselfe to represent his person, though some haue said, he was not partie to that wicked offense. The common fame is, that he was euer daie serued at the table with costlie meat, like a king, to the intent that no creature should suspect any thing done contrarie to the order taken in the parlement; and when the meat was set before him, he was forbidden once to touch it: yea, he was not permitted so much as to smell to it, and so he died of forced famine.

But Thomas Walsingham is so farre from imputing his death to compulsiue famine, that he referreth it altogether to voluntarie pining of himselfe. For when he heard that the complots and attempts of such his fauourers, as sought his restitution, and their owne advancement, aduised, and the chiefe agents therein executed; he took such a conceit at these misfortunes (for so Thomas Walsingham termeth them) and was so beaten out of hart, that he fullie he starued himselfe, and so died in Pomfret castell.

castell on S. Valentines daie: a happie daie to him, for it was the beginning of his ease, and the ending of his paine: so that death was to him daintie and sweet, as the poet saith, and that verie well in these,

Dulce mori miseris,

Neque est melius morte in malis rebus.

One witer, which seemeth to haue great knowledge of king Richards doings, saith, that king Henrie, sitting on a daie at his table, fore sighing, said, Haue I no faithfull friend which will deliuer me of him, whose life will be my death, and whose death will be the preservation of my life? This saying was much noted of them which were present, and especial-lie of one called sir Piers of Erton. This knight incontinentlie departed from the court, with eight strong persons in his companie, and came to Pomfret, commanding the esquier that was accustomed to sew and take the assaie before king Richard, to do so no more, saying: Let him eat now, for he shall not long eat. King Richard sat downe to dinner, and was serued without courtesie or assaie, whereupon much maruelling at the sudden change, he demanded of the esquier whie he did not his dutie: Sir (said he) I am otherwise commanded by sir Piers of Erton, which is newlie come from R. Henrie. When king Richard heard that word, he toke the heruing knife in his hand, and strake the esquier on the head, saying The diuell take Henrie of Lancaster and thee together. And with that word, sir Piers entered the chamber, well armed, with eight tall men likewise armed, curie of them hauing a bill in his hand.

King Richard perceiving this, put the table from him, & keping to the foremost man, toying the bill out of his hands, so valiantlie defended himselfe, that he slue foure of those that thus came to assaile him. Sir Piers being halfe dismaied herewith, leapt into the chaire where king Richard was wont to sit, while the other foure persons fought with him, and chased him about the chamber. And in conclusion, as king Richard trauesed his ground, from one side of the chamber to an other, & coming by the chaire, where sir Piers stood, he was felled with a stroke of a pollax which sir Piers gaue him vpon the head, and therewith rid him out of life, without giuing him respite ones to call to God for mercie of his passed offenses.
It is said, that sir Piers of Erton, after he had thus slaine him, wept right bitterlie, as one stricken with the prick of a gillie conscience, for murdering him, whome he had so long time obeyed as king. After he was thus dead, his bodie was embalmed, and sared, and couered with lead, all saue the face, to the intent that all men might see him, and perceiue that he was departed this life: for as the corps was conueied from Pomfret to London, in all the townes and places where those that had the conueiance of it did staie with it all night, they caused dirige to be song in the evening, and masse of Requiem in the morning; and as well after the one seruice as the other, his face discovered, was shewed to all that coueted to behold it.

Thus was the corps first brought to the Tower, and after through the citie, to the cathedrall church of saint Paule bare faced, where it laie three daies together, that all men might behold it. There was a solemne obsequie done for him, both at Paules, and after at Westminster, at which time, both at dirige ouer night, and in the morning at the masse of Requiem, the king and the citizens of London were present.
When the same was ended, the corps was commanded to be had vnto Langley, there to be buried in the church of the friers preachers. The bishop of Chester, the abbats of saint Albons and Waltham, celebrated the exequies for the buriall, none of the nobles nor anye of the commons (to accompt of) being present: neither was there anye to bid them to dinner after they had laid him in the ground, and finished the funerall seruice. He was after by king Henrie the sixt removed to Westminster, and there honozable intombed with quene Anne his wife, although the Scots vntruclie wrote, that he escaped out of prison, and led a vertuous and a solitarie life in Scotland, and there died, & is buried (as they hold) in the blacke friars at Sterling. But Fabian and others do as it were point out the place of his interment, saying that he lieth intombed on the south side of saint Cowards shaine, with an epitaph expressing partlie his proportion of bodie and partlie his properties of mind, as after followeth in a rime herafter shon:

Prudens & mundus, Richardus iure secundus,

Per fatum victus, iacet hic sub marmore pictus,

Verax sermone, fuit & plenus ratione,

Corpore procernus, animo prudens vt Homerus,

Ecclesie sauit, elatos suppeditauit,

Quemuis prostrauit, regalia qui violauit.

When the newes of king Richards deposing was reported in France, king Charles and all his court wondering, detested and abhorred such an iniurie done to an annointed king, to a crowned prince, and to the head of a realme: but in especiall, Walter earle of saint Paule, which had married king Richards halfe sister, moued with great disdain towards king Henrie, ceased not to stirre king Charles & his counsell to make warres against the Englishmen, and he himselfe sent letters of defiance into England. The earles sate was easilie agreed vnto, and an armie rofall appointed with all speed, to inuade England. The armie was come downe into Picardie, redie to be transported into England: but when it was certeinlie knowne, that king Richard was dead, and that the enterprise of his deliuerance (which was chieflie meant) was frustrate and void, the armie was dissolued. But when the certentie of R. Richards death was intimate to the Gascoignes, the most part of the wisest men of the countrie were right pensiue: for they iudged verelie, that hereby the English nation should be brought to dishonour, and losse of their ancient fame and glorie, for committing so heinous an offense against their king and souereigne lord, the mermozie whereof (as they thought) would neuer die: and chieflie, the citizens of Bur-deaur toke the matter verie sore at the stomack: for they bare exceeding fauour to king Richard, because he was borne and brought vp in their citie, and therefore more than all the residue they shewed themsel-ues to abhorre so heinous a deed.

The Frenchmen hauing vnderstanding hereof, thought with themselves that now was the time for them to practise with the Gascoignes to reduce them from the English obedience, vnder their subiection.
Whereupon came Lewis duke of Burbon vnto A-gen, and wrote to diuerse citie and townes, on the confines of Guien, exhorting them with large promises, and faire sugred words, to revolt from the Englishmen, and to become subiects to the crowne of France; but his trauell preuailed not: for the people vnderstanding that the English yoke was but easie in comparison to the French bondage, determined to abide rather in their old subiection, than for a displeasure irreuerable to aduenture themselves on a new doubtful perill; yet it was doubted, least the cities of Burdeaur, Mar, and Baion, would haue re-uolted, if the lords of the marches about those places had leaned to them in that purpose, for they sent their commissioners to Agen, to treat with the duke of Burbon. But forsomuch as the lords, Pomiers, Gucident, Duras, Landuras, Copane, Rofern, & Langurant, were minded to continue still English, those cities durst not without them turne to the French obreifance, for they could not haue stirred out of their gates, but those lords would haue bene readie at their elbowes, to haue caught them by the sleeves.

King Henrie being aduertised of the Frenchmens covert meanings, and also of the wauering minds of the Gascoignes, sent Thomas Persie earle of Worcester with two hundred men of armes, and foure hundred archers into Guien, to aid and assist sir Robert Binols, his lieutenant there. The chiefeſt capteines that accompanied the earle in this iournie were theſe: firſt, his nepheue fir Hugh Haliſings, fir Thomas Colleuill, fir William Liſle, John de Craillie baſe ſonne to the capitall de Boerue, fir William Draiton, fir John Danbreticourt: alſo there went with him the biſhop of London, and maſter Richard Doall or Dolicie. The earle at his arriual ſo wiſelicly intreated the noble men, ſo grauelicly perſuaded the magiſtrats of the cities and towncs, and ſo gentlelic and familiarlic vſed and treated the commons, that he not onelic appeaſed their furie and malice, but brought them to louing and vniſorme obedience, receiuing of them othes of obedience, & totall fealtie, which done, he returned againe into Eng- land with great thanks,

The french king perceiuing he could not bring his purpose about, neither by inuading England, nor by practising with the Gascoignes, sent a solemne ambassage into England, requiring to haue his daughter the ladie Isabel, sometime espoused to king Richard, restored to him againe. King Henrie gently receiued those that were sent to him about this message, and for answer, promised to send his commissioners vnto Calis, which should further commune and conclude with them. ¶ This seemeth dissonant from the report of Fabian deuised out of Gaguine. For he saith that Charles hearing of the suppression of st. Richard, sent 2 of his household knights into England, requiring king Henrie the fourth, then newlie made king, to send home his daughter Isabel, latelie married vnto king Richard, with such dowrie as with him was promised. In doing of which message king Henrie toke such displeasure, that he thereto the said two knights in prison; where through one of them (named Blanchet) died in England, and the other called Henrie, after great sickness returned into France: wherefore if Fabian plaie not the fabler, those that were sent on the said message were not gently receiued of king Henrie; vntlesse to be cast in prison and discontented dealt withall stand countable for beneuolence & gentle intertainment. But to remit this and the like variances among writers to such as can reconcile them, let vs returne to the storie.

It was not inough that H. Henrie was thus troubled now in the first yere of his reigne, with ciuill sedition, and the couert practises of Frenchmen; but that the Scots also toke vpon them to make open warre against him: it chanced (as in the Scottissh Chronicles more at large appeareth) that George of Dunbar, earle of the marches of Scotland, being in displeasure with Robert king of Scots, fled into England, to Henrie earle of Northumberland, wher vpon the Scottissh king depriued him of all his dignities and possessions, and caused his goods to be confiscate, and after wropte to the king of England, requiring him if he would haue the truce anie longer to continue, either to deliuer into his possession the earle of March and other traitors: to his person, or else to banish them out of his realmes and dominions. King Henrie discreetly answered the herald of Scotland, that the words of a prince ought to be kept: and his writings and seale to be inviolate: and considering that he had granted a safe conduct to the earle and his companie, he should neither without cause reasonable breake his promise, no: yet de face his hope. Which answer declared to the king of Scots, he incontinentlie proclaimed open warre against the king of England, with fire and sword. Whereupon, one sir Robert Logon, a Scottish knight, with certeine ships well appointed for the warre, meane to haue destroyed the English fleet that was come on the coasts of Scotland, about Aberdeen, to figh there: but (as it chanced) he met with certeine ships of Lin, that fought with him, and toke him prisoner, with the residue of his companie, so that he quite failed of his purpose, and came to the losse himselfe.

At the same time, the Englishmen spoiled all cer-teine of the Isles of Orkeneye. This summer, great death chanced in this land, manie dying of the pestilence, wherewith sundrie places were infected. King Henrie perceiving that policie oftentimes preuen-teth peril, and vnderstanding the naughtie purposes of the Scots, gathered a great armie, and entred into Scotland, burning towncs, villages, and castels, with a great part of the towncs of Edem-burgh and Leith, and besseged the castell of Edem-burgh in the end of September, whereof was capteine Dauid duke of Rothesay, and a prince of the realme, with Archembald earle of Douglas, having with them manie hardie men of warre. Robert duke of Albanie, that was appointed gouernour of the realme, because the king was sicke and not meet to rule, sent an herald vnto king Henrie, promising him battel within six daies at the furthest, if he wold so long tarry, which king Henrie promised to doe right gladlie, and gaue to the herald for bringing him so acceptable newes, a gowne of silke, and a chaine of gold. But king Henrie failed six daies, and sixtene mo, without hearing any word of the gouernors com-ming. When the winter beginning to wax cold, and foule weather still increasing, caused the king to breake by his siege, and so returned without battell or skirmish offered.

In the meane time that the king was thus in Scotland, the Scots made a robe into Forthumberland, and burned diuerse towne in Wamburroughshire. At the kings comming backe to Dorke, there were two strangers, the one a Frenchman, and the other an Italian, requiring to accomplish certeine feats of armes, against sir John Cornewall, and Zenico de Artois. Their request was granted, and the strangers were put to the worst, whereby sir John Cornewall obtained the kings fauour so farre forth, that he married the kings siller, the widow of John Holland, earle of Huntington. Yet some said, that the knight and the countesse were agreed aforehand, without the kings consent. In the kings absence, whilest he was forth of the realme in Scotland against his enemies, the Welchmen took occasion to rebell vnder the conduct of their capteine Owen Glendouer, doing what mischefe they could cruise, vnto their English neighbours. This Owen Glendouer was some to an esquier of Wales, named Griffith Nighan: he dwelled in the parish of Conswate, within the countie of Merioneth in Northwales, in a place called Glindourtwie, which is as much to saie in English, as The ballie by the side of the water of Dee, by occasion whereof he was surnamed Glindour Deu.

He was first set to studie the lawes of the realme, and became an utter barrestre, or an apprentise of the law, (as they terme him) and serued king Richard at Flint castell, when he was taken by Henrie duke of Lancaster, though other haue written that he serued this king Henrie the fourth, before he came to attaine the crowne, in roome of an esquier, and after, by reason of variance that rose betwixt him and the lord Reginald Erie of Rutlin, about the lands which he claimed to be his by right of inheritance: when he saw that he might not preuaile, finding no such fauor in his sute as he looked for, he first made warre against the said lord Greie, wasting his lands and possessions with fire and sword, cruelly killing his servants and tenants. The king aduertised of such rebellious exploits, enterprised by the said Dwen, and his brutish complices, determined to chastise them, as disturbers of his peace, and so with an armie entered into Wales; but the Welshmen with their capitaine withdrew into the mounteines of Snow-don, so to escape the reuenge, which the king meant towards them. The king therefore did much hurt in the countries with fire and sword, sleing diuerse that with weapon in hand came forth to resist him, and so with a great botle of beasts and cattell he returned.

The emperor of Constantinople comming into England to sue for aid against the Turkes, was met by the king on Blackheath, upon the feast day of saint Thomas the apostle, and brought unto London with great honor. The king bare all his charges, presented him with gifts at his departure, met for such an estate. After the feast of the Epiphanie, a par-lement was holden, in which an act was made, against those that held opinions in religion, contrarie to the received doctrine of the church of Rome; ordi-ning, that wheresoever any of them were found and proued to set forth such doctrine, they should be apprehended, and deliuered to the bishop their diocesane; and if they stood stiffelie in their opinions, and would not be reformed, they should be deliuered to the secular power, to be burnt to ashes. The first that tasted the smart of this statute, was one William Hawtre: or Sawtre a priest, that being apprehended was burnt in Smithfield, in time of this parlement.

About the same time, king Henrie (according to promise made (as ye haue heard) unto the French ambassadors, sent ouer into the countrie of Guines, Edward earle of Rutland, otherwise in king Richards daies intituled duke of Aumarie, son to Edmund duke of Yorke, Henrie earle of Northumberland, and his sonne the lord Henrie Percie, the lord Puan Fitzwarren, the bishops of Winchester and Lincolne: where the duke of Burbon, the lords Charles d'Albert, Charles de Hangeul, John de Cha-selmoyant, the Patriarke of Jerusalem, and the bishops of Paris and Beauuois, were readie there to commune with them, and so they assembling togiether at sundrie times and places, the Frenchmen required to haue queene Flabell to them restored, but the Englishmen seemed loth to depart with hir, requiring to haue hir married to Henrie prince of Wales, one in blood and age in all things to hir equall; but the Frenchmen would in no wise conde-scend thereto, without their kings consent, who at that present was not in case to offer his mind, being troubled with his wonted disease. The commissioners then began to treat of peace, and at length renewed the truce to endure for six and twentie yeares yet to come; whereunto the foure yeares passed being added, made by the number of thirtie yeares, according to the conclusion agreed vpon, in the life time of king Richard.

Some authors affirme, that there was a new league concluded, to continue, during the liues of both the princes. The Frenchmen diuerse times required to haue some dowre assigned forth for queene Flabell, but that was at all times vtterlie denied, for that the marriage betwixt hir and king Richard was neuer consummate, by reason whereof she was not dowable. Perierthelesse, she was hostlie after sent home, vnder the conduct of the earle of Worcester, associat with diuerse other noble and honorable personages, both men and women, hauing with hir all the iewels, ornaments, and plate which she brought into England, with a great surpluse besides giuen to hir by the king. She was deliuered betwixt Bul-longne and Calis, to Valeran earle of saint Paule, the French kings lieutenant in Picardie, who being accompanied with the bishop of Chartres, the lord de Huguculle, the ladie of Monpensier sister to the erle of March, the ladie of Lucenburgh sister to the said earle of saint Paule, & diuerse other ladies and gentlewomen, which receiued hir with great ioy and gladnesse, and taking leaue of the English lords and ladies, they conueied hir to the dukes of Burgognie and Burbon, that attended for hir, not far off, vpon a hill, with a great number of people. They first conueied hir to Bullogne, & after to Abail, from whence the duke of Orleans conueied hir to Paris, vnto the presence of the king hir father, and the queene hir mother: she was after giuen in marriage vnto Charles, sonne to Letours duke of Orleans.

About the same time, Dwen Glendouer and his Welshmen did much hurt to the kings subiects. One night as the king was going to bed, he was in danger to haue bene destroyed; for some naughtie traitorous persons had conueied into his bed a certeine iron made with smiths craft, like a caltrop, with three long pickes, sharpe and small, standing vp right, in such sort, that when he had laid him downe, & that the weight of his bodie should come vpon the bed, he should haue bene thrust in with those pickes, and peradventure slaine: but as God would, the king not thinking of any such thing, chanced yet to slee and perceiue the instrument before he laid him downe, and so escaped the danger. Howbeit it was not so sone deliuered from feare; for he might well haue his life in suspicion, & prouide for the preservation of the same; sith perils of death crept into his secret chamber, and late lurking in the bed of downe where his bodie was to be reposed and to take rest. Oh what a suspected state therefore is that of a king holding his regiment with the hatred of his people, the hartgrudgings of his courtiers, and the peremptorie practises of both together? Could he confidentlie compose or settle himselfe to sleepe for feare of strangling? Durst he boldly eat and drinke without dread of poisoning?
Might he aduenture to shew himselfe in great meetings or solemn assemblies without mistrust of mis-chance against his person intended? What pleasure or what felicitie could he take in his princelie pompe, which he knew by manifest and fearefull experience, to be enuied and maligne to the verie death? The state of such a king is noted by the poet in Dionysius, as in a mirrore, concerning whome it is said,

*Districus ensis cui super impia

This yeare, the eight day of Aprill deceased the lord Thomas Beauchampe earle of Warwick. In the moneth of March appeared a blasing starre, first be-twene the east part of the firmament and the north, flashing forth fire and flames round about it, and lastlie, shooting forth fierie beams towards the north, foreshewing (as was thought) the great effusion of blood that followed, about the parts of Wales and Northumberland. For much about the same time, Dwen Glendouer (with his Welshmen) fought with the lord Greie of Rutland, comming forth to defend his possessions, which the same Dwen wasted and destroyed: and as the fortune of that daies worke fell out, the lord Greie was taken prisoner, and marie of his men were slaine. This hap lifted the Welshmen into high pride, and increased meruelouslie their wicked and presumptuous attempts.

About Whitsuntide a conspiracie was deuised by certeine persons, that wished the kings death, main- teining and byting abroad, that king Richard was alieue, and therefore exhorted men to stand with him, for shortly he would come to light, and reward such as toke his part with iust recompense. Herewith, there was a priest taken at Ware, or (as some books haue) at Martwike, who had a kalendar or roll, in which a great number of names were written, more than were in any wise guiltie of the fact, as after- wards appeared by the same priests confession. For being examined, whether he knew such persons as he had so inrolled, & were there present before him, he said he neuer knew them at all; and being deman- ded wherefore he had then so recorded their names, he answered, because he thought they would gladlie do what mischiefe they could against king Henrie, vpon any occasion offered in reuenge of the injuries done to king Richard, by whom they had bene ad- vanced, and princelie preferred. When therefore there appeared no more credit in the man, he was condem- ned, drawn, hanged, and quartered, and diuerse that had bene apprehended about that matter, were re- leased, and set at libertie. Shortly after, the prioz of Laund (who for his euill gouernment had bene de- priued of his state and dignitie) was likewise execu- ted, not for attempting any thing of himselfe, but on- ly for that he confessed, that he knew euill counsell and concealed it. His name was Walter Baldocke, a canon sometime in Dunstable, and by king Ri- chard promoted to the priozship of Laund.

Also the same time, certeine grete friers were ap- prehended for treason which they had deuised to bying to passe, and one of them, whose name was Richard Frisefie, being asked what he would do if king Ri- chard had bene alieue, and present with them, an- swered stoutly, that he would fight against any man in his quarrell, euen to death. Whereupon, he was con- demned, drawn, and hanged in his friers weed, to the great confusion of his brethren; but they made earnest instance to haue his bodie taken downe, and buried with diriges and exequies, and had their sute granted. Sir Roger of Claringdon knight was also put to death about this conspiracie, with two of his seruants, the one an esquier, the other a peoman. He was base sonne (as was reported) vnto Edward, el- dest sonne to king Edward the third, surnamed the blacke prince. On Corpus Christi daie at euenfong time, the diuell (as was thought) appeared in a towne of Essex called Danburie, entring into the church in likenesse of a grete frier, behauing himselfe verie outragiously, plateng his parts like a diuell indeed, so that the parishioners were put in a marvellous great fright.

At the same instant, there chanced such a tempest of wind, thunder, and lightning, that the highest part of the rofe of that church was blowne doونه, and the chancell was all to shaken, rent, and tozned in pec- ces. Within a small while after, eight of those grete friers that had practised treason against the king, were brought to open iudgement, and conuicted were drawn and headed at London; and two other suffe- red at Leicester, all which persons had published king Richard to be alieue. Owen Glendouer, according to his accustomed manner, robbing and spoiling within the English borders, caused all the forces of the shire of Hereford to assemble together against them, vnder the conduct of Edmund Mortimer earle of March. But coming to trie the matter by battell, whether by treason or otherwise, so it fortuneed, that the English power was discomfited, the earle taken prisoner, and aboue a thousand of his people slaine in the place. The shamefull villanie vsed by the Welsh women towards the dead carcases, was such, as honest eares would be ashamed to heare, and continent tongs to speake thereof. The dead bodie might not be buried, without great summes of monie gi- uen for libertie to conuie them awaite.

The king was not hastie to purchase the deliue- rance of the earle March, because his title to the crowne was well enough known, and therefore suf- fered him to remaine in miserable prison, wishing both the said earle, and all other of his linage out of this life, with God and his saints in heauen, so they had bene out of the waie, for then all had bene well enough as he thought. But to let these things passe, the king this yeare sent his eldest daughter Blanche, accompanied with the earle of Summerfet, the bishop of Worcester, the lord Clifford, and others, into Al- manie, which brought hir to Colin, and there with great triumph she was married to William duke of Bawier, sonne and heire to Lewis the emperor. About mid of August, the king to chastise the presum- ptuous attempts of the Welshmen, went with a great power of men into Wales, to pursue the cap- teine of the Welsh rebell Owen Glendouer, but in effect he lost his laboz; for Owen conuied himselfe out of the waie, into his known lurking places, and (as was thought) through art magike, he caused such foule weather of winds, tempest, raine, snow, and haile to be raised, for the annoiuaunce of the kings ar- mie, that the like had not bene heard of; in such sort, that the king was constrained to returne home, ha- uing caused his people yet to spoile and burne first a great part of the countrie. The same time, the lord Edmund of Langlie duke of York departed this life, and was buried at Langlie with his brethren. The Scots vnder the leding of Patrike Hepborne, of the Isles the yonger, entring into England, were ouerthrowen at Presbit, in the marches, as in the Scottish chronicle ye may find more at large. This battell was fought the two and twentieth of June, in this yeare of our Lord 1402.

Archembald earle Dotoglas soze displeased in his mind for this ouerthrow, procured a commission to inuade England, and that to his cost, as ye may like- wise read in the Scottish histories. For at a place cal- led Homildon, they were so sterclie assailed by the Englishmen, vnder the leading of the lord Percie, surnamed Henrie Hotspur, and George earle of March, that with violence of the English shot they were quite vanquished and put to flight, on the third daie in haruest, with a great slaughter made by the Englishmen. We know that the Scottish writers note this battell to haue chanced in the yeare 1403. But we following Tho. Walsingham in this place, and other English writers, for the accompt of times, haue thought good to place it in this yeare 1402, as in the same writers we find it. There were slaine of men of estimation, sir John Swinton, sir Adam Gordon, sir John Leuiston, sir Alexander Ramsie of Dalehousie, and thre and twentie knights, besides ten thousand of the commons: and of prisoners among other were these, Moridacke earle of Fife, son to the gouernour Archembald earle Dotoglas, which in the fight lost one of his eyes, Thomas erle of Mar- rep, Robert earle of Angus, and (as some writers haue) the earles of Atholl & Menteith, with five hun- dred other of incaner degrees. After this, the lord Percie, hauing bestowed the prisoners in suer kee- ping, entered Wiltshire, wasting and destroing the whole countrie, and then besieged the castell of Co- klawes, whereof was capteine one sir John Gren- low, who compounded with the Englishmen, that if the castell were not succoured within thre moneths, then he would deliuer it into their hands.

The first two moneths passed, and no likelihood of rescue appeared; but yet the third moneth was ex- pired, red, the Englishmen being sent for to go with the king into Wales, raised their siege and departed, leaving the noble men prisoners with the earle of Northumberland, and with his sonne the lord Percie, to keepe them to the kings use. In this meane while, such as misliked with the doctrine and ceremonies then used in the church, ceased not to utter their consciences, though in secret, to those in whom they had affiance. But as in the like cases it commonlie happeneth, they were beliaied by some that were thought chieftie to fauour their cause, as by sir Lewes Clifford knight, who hauing leained to the doctrine a long time, did now (as Thomas Walsingham writeth) disclose all that he knew vnto the archbishop of Canturburie, to shew him selfe as it were to haue erred rather of simplenesse and ignozance, than of frowardnesse or stubborne malice. The names of such as taught the articles and conclusions maintained by those which then they called Lollards or heretikes, the said sir Lewes Clifford gaue in writing to the said archbishop. Edmund Mortimer earle of March, prisoner with Owen Glendouer, whether for irksomenesse of cruell captiuitie, or feare of death, or for what other cause, it is vncertaine, agreed to take part with Owen, against the king of England, and toke to wife the daughter of the said Owen.

Strange wonders happened (as men reported) at the natiuitie of this man, for the same night he was borne, all his fathers hostes in the stable were found to stand in blood vp to the bellies. The morow after the feast of saint Michaell, a parlement began at Westminster, which continued the space of seauen weekes, in the same was a tenth and a halfe granted by the cleargie, and a fiftenth by the communalite. Moreover, the commons in this parlement besought the king to haue the person of George earle of March a Scottishman, recommended to his maiestie, for that the same earle shewed him selfe faithfull to the king his realme. Where was also a statute made, that the friers beggers should not receiue any into their order, vnder the age of fourtene yeares. In this fourth yeare of king Henries reigne, ambassadoys were sent ouer into Britaine, to bring from thence the dukes of Britaine, the ladie Jane de Beauarre, the widow of John de Montford, late duke of Britaine, surnamed the conqueror, with whom by procurators the king had contracted matrimonie. In the beginning of Februarie, those that were sent returned with hir in safetie, but not without tasting the bitter stormes of the wind and weather, that tolled them soe to and fro, before they could get to land. The king met hir at Winchester, where the seventh of Februarie, the marriage was solemnized betwixt them.

Whilest these things were thus in doing in England, Walter earle of Saint Paule, bearing still a deable and malicious hatred toward king Henrie, hauing assembled fiftene or seuentene hundred men of warre, imbarked them at Harleu, and taking the sea, landed in the Ile of Wight, in the which he burned two villages, and foure simple cotages, and for a triumph of so noble an act, made foure knights. But when he heard that the people of the Ile were assembled and approached to fight with him, he hasted to his ships, and returned home: where with the noble men of his companie were displeased, considering his prouision to be great and his gaine small. In the same verie season, John earle of Cleremont sonne to the duke of Bourbon, was in Castoigne out of the Englishmens possession, the castles of saint Peter, saint Marie, and the Ile to castell, and the lord de la Bret was the castell of Carliassin, which was no small losse to the English nation.

Thomas earle of Worcester, and his sonne the lord Henrie Percie, surnamed Hotspur, which were to king Henrie in the beginning of his reigne, both faithfull friends, and earnest aiders, began now to enuie his wealth and felicitie, and especiallie they were grieved, because the king demanded of the earle and his sonne such Scottish prisoners as were taken at Homelbon and Peblit: for of all the captiues which were taken in the conflicts foughten in those two places, there was deliuered to the kings possession onelie Morlake earle of Fife, the duke of Albanies sonne, though the king did diuers and sundrie times require deliuerance of the residue, and that with great threatnings: where with the Percies being soe offended, for that they claimed them as their owne proper prisoners, and their peculiar priues, by the counsell of the lord Thomas Percie earle of Worcester, whose studie was ever (as some write) to procure malice, and set things in a boile, came to the king vnto Windsor (vpon a purpose to proue him) and there required of him, that either by ranisme or otherwise, he would cause to be deliuered out of prison Edmund Mortimer earle of March, their cousine germane, whom (as they reported) Owen Glendouer kept in filthy prison, shakled with irons, onelie for that he toke his part, and was to him faithfull and true.

The king began not a little to muse at this request, and not without cause: for in deed it touched him somewhat here, sith this Edmund was sonne to Roger earle of March, sonne to the ladie Philip, daughter of Lionell duke of Clarence, the third sonne of king Edward the third, which Edmund at king Richards going into Ireland, was proclaimed heire apparant to the crowne and realme, whose aunt called Glanor, the lord Henrie Percie had married; and therefore king Henrie could not well heare, that any man should be earnest about the aduancement of that linage. The king when he had studied on the matter, made answer, that the earle of March was not taken prisoner for his cause; nor in his seruice, but willingly suffered himselfe to be taken, because he would not withstand the attempts of Owen Glendouer, and his complices; therefore he would neither ranisme him, nor release him.

The Percies with this answer and fraudulent excuse were not a little fumed, and indignantly that Henrie Hotspur said openlie: Behold, the heire of the realme is robbed of his right; and yet the robber with his owne will not redeeme him. So in this sort the Percies departed, minding nothing more than to depose king Henrie from the high type of his solatie, and to place in his seat their cousine Edmund earle of March, whom they did not onlie deliuer out of captiuitie, but also (to the high displeasure of king Henrie) entered in league with the foresaid Owen Glendouer: where with, they by their deputies in the house of the archdeacon of Bangor, diuided the realme amongst them, causing a tripartite indenture to be made and sealed with their seales, by the conenants whereof, all England from Seuerie and Trent, southward and eastward, was assigned to the earle of March; all Wales, and the lands beyond Seuerie, westward, were appointed to Owen Glendouer; and all the remnant from Trent northward, to the lord Percie.

This was done (as some haue said) through a foolish credit giuen to a vaine prophete, as though king Henrie was the moldwarpe, cursed of Gods diuine mouth; and they three were the dragon, the lion, and the wolfe, which should diuide this realme betwixt them. Such is the deuotion (saith Hall) and not diuination of those blind and fantasticall dreames of the welch propheters. King Henrie not knowing of this new confederacie, and nothing lesse minding than that which after happened, gathered a great armie to go againe into Wales, whereof the earle of Northumberland and his sonne were advertised by the earle of Worcester, and with all diligence raised all the power they could make, and sent to the Scots which before were taken prisoners at Homeldon, for aid of men, promising to the earle of Douglas the towne of Berwik, and a part of Northumberland, and to other Scottish lords, great lordships and seigniories, if they obtained the upper hand. The Scots in hope of gaine, and desirous to be reuenged of their old græues, came to the earle with a great companie well appointed.

The Perles to make their part seeme good, deuised certaine articles, by the aduise of Richard Scrope, archbishop of Yorke; brother to the lord Scrope, whome king Henrie had caused to be beheaded at Bristow. These articles being shewed to diuerse noblemen, and other states of the realme, moued them to fauour their purpose, in so much that manie of them did not onlie promise to the Perles aid and succour by words, but also by their writings and seales confirmed the same. Whobeyt when the matter came to triall; the most part of the confederates abandoned them, and at the daie of the conflict left them alone. Thus after that the conspirators had discouered themselves, the lord Henrie Perle desirous to proceed in the enterprise, vpon trust to be assisted by Owen Glendouer, the earle of March, and other, assembled an armie of men of armes and archers south of Cheshire and Wales. Incontinentlie his uncle Thomas Perle earle of Worcester, that had the gouernement of the prince of Wales, who as then laie at London in secret manner, conueied himselfe out of the princes house, and coming to Stafford (where he met his nephew) they increased their power by all waies and means they could deuise. The earle of Northumberland himselfe was not with them, but being sicke, had promised vpon his amenderment to repaire vnto them (as some write) with all convenient speed.

These noble men, to make their conspiracie to seeme excusable, besides the articles aboue mentio- ned, sent letters abroad, wherein was contained, that their gathering of an armie tended to none other end, but onlie for the safegard of their owne persons, and to put some better gouernment in the common- weale. For whereas taxes and tallages were daily leuied, vnder pretence to be imployed in defense of the realme, the same were vainlie wasted, and bur- sutable continued: and where through the slanderous reports of their enemies, the king had taken a grie- uous displeasure with them, they durst not appeare personallie in the kings presence; but till the prelates and barons of the realme had obtained of the king licence for them to come and purge themselves be- fore him, by lawfull triall of their peeres, whose iudge- ment (as they pretended) they would in no wise re- fuse. Panie that saw, and heard these letters, did com- mend their diligence, and highlie praised their as- sured fidelitie and trustinesse towards the common- weale.

But the king vnderstanding their cloaked dyss, deuised (by what means he might) to quiet and ap- pease the commons, and deface their contrived for- geries; and therefore he wrote an answer to their li- bels, that he marvelled much, sith the earle of Northumberland, and the lord Henrie Perle his sonne, had receiued the most part of the summes of monie granted to him by the cleargie and commonaltie, for defense of the marches, as he could euidentlie proue that should moue them to complaine and raise such manifest slanders. And whereas he vnderstood, that the earles of Northumberland and Worcester, and the lord Perle had by their letters signified to their friends abroad, that by reason of the slanderous re- ports of their enemies, they durst not appeare in his presence, without the mediation of the prelates and nobles of the realme, so as they required pledges, whereby they might safelie come afore him, to de- clare and alledge what they had to saie in proue of their innocencie, he protested by letters sent forth vnder his seale, that they might safelie come and go, without all danger, in any manner of indamage- ment to be offered to their persons.

But this could not satisfie those men, but that re- solved to go forwards with their enterprise, they marched towards Shrewesburie, vpon hope to be as- sisted (as men thought) by Owen Glendouer, and his Welshmen, publishing abroad throughout the coun- tries on each side, that king Richard was alive, whome if they wished to see, they willed them to re- paire in armour vnto the castell of Chester, where (without all doubt) he was at that present, and redie to come forward. This tale being raised, though it were most untrue, yet it had variable motions in mens minds, causing them to wauer, so as they knew not to which part they should sicke; and here- lie, diuers were well affected towards king Richard, speciallie such as had tasted of his princelie bounti- fulnes, of which there was no small number. And to speake a truth, no maruell it was, if manie enuied the prosperous state of king Henrie, sith it was eu- ident inough to the world, that he had with wrong v- surped the crowne, and not onlie violently deposed king Richard, but also cruelly procured his death, for the which vndoubtedlie, both he and his posteritie ta- sted such troubles, as put them still in danger of their states, till their direct succeeding line was quite rooted out by the contrarie faction, as in Henrie the first and Edward the fourth it may appeare.

But now to retorne where we left. King Henrie advertised of the proceedings of the Perles, forth- with gathered about him such power as he might make, and being earnestlie called vpon by the Scot, the earle of March, to make hast and giue battell to his enemies, before their power by delateng of time should still too much increase, he passed forward with such speed, that he was in sight of his enemies, lying in campe nere to Shrewesburie, before they were in doubt of any such thing, for the Perles thought that he would haue staied at Burton vpon Trent, till his counsell had come thither to him to giue their aduise what he were best to do. But herein the enimie was deceiued of his expectation, sith the king had great regard of expedition and making speed for the safetie of his owne person, wherevnto the earle of March incited him; considering that in delate is danger, a losse in lingering, as the poet in the like case saith:

Tolle moras, necis scilicet differre paratis.

Dura trepidant nullo firmata robore partes.

By reason of the kings sudden coming in his host, they staied from assaunting the towne of Shrewesburie, which enterprise they were readie at that instant to haue taken in hand, and forthwith the lord Perle (as a tapteine of high courage) began to exhort the captiues and souldiers to prepare themselves to battell, sith the matter was growen to that point, that by no means it could be auoided, so that (said he) this daie shall either bring vs all to advancement or honor, or else if it shall chance vs to be ouercome, shall deliuer vs from the kings spitefull malice and cruell disdain: for plaieing the men (as we ought to do) better it is to die in battell for the common- wealthis cause, than through cowardlike feare to pro- long life, which after shall be taken from vs, by sen- tence of the enimie.

Hereupon, the whole armie being in number about fourtene thousand cholen men, promised to stand with him so long as life lasted. There were with the Perles as chieftaines of this armie, the earle of Dowglas a Scottish man, the baron of Kinderton, sir Hugh Bostone, and sir Richard Vernon knights, with diuerse other stout and right valiant capitaines.
Now when the two armies were incamped, the one against the other, the earle of Worcester and the lord Perle with their complices sent the articles (whereof I spake before) by Thomas Calton, and Thomas Salman esquires to king Henrie, vnder their hands and seales, which articles in effect charged him with manifest perurie, in that (contrarie to his oth recei-ued vpon the euangelists at Doncaster, when he first entred the realme after his exile) he had taken vpon him the crowne and roiall dignitie, imprisoned king Richard, caused him to resigne his title, and finally to be murdered. Diuerse other matters they laid to his charge, as leuening of taxes and tallages, contra-rie to his promise, infringing of lawes & customes of the realme, and suffering the earle of March to re-maine in prison, without travelling to haue him de-liuered. All which things they as procuroys & protectors of the common-wealth, took vpon them to proove against him, as they protested vnto the whole world.

King Henrie after he had read their articles, with the assurance which they annexed to the same, answered the esquires, that he was ready with dint of sword and force battell to proue their quarrell false, and nothing else than a forged matter, not doubting, but that God would aid and assist him in his righteous cause, against the dissolial and false forsworne traitors. The next daie in the morning earlie, being the euen of Marie Magdalene, they set their battels in order on both sides, and now whilst the warriors looked vpon the token of battell should be giuen, the abbat of Shrewsburie, and one of the clerkes of the prince seale, were sent from the king vnto the Per-les, to offer them pardon, if they would come to any reasonable agreement. By their persuasions, the lord Perle began to giue eare vnto the kings offers, & so sent vnto them his vncle the earle of Worcester, to declare vnto the king the causes of those troubles; and to request some effectuall reformation in the same.

It was reported for a truth, that now when the king had condescended vnto all that was reasonable at his hands to be required, and seemed to humble himselfe more than was meet for his estate, the earle of Worcester (vpon his returne to his nepheue) made relation cleane contrarie to that the king had said, in such sort that he set his nepheues hart more in displeasure towards the king, than euer it was before, dyuing him by that meanes to fight whether he would or not: then suddenly blew the trumpets, the kings part crying S. George vpon them, the aduersaries cried Efferance Perle, and so the two armies furiously ioined. The archers on both sides shot for the best game, laing on such load with arrowes, that manie died, and were dynen downe that neuer rose againe.

The Scots (as some write) which had the fore ward of the Perles side, intending to be reneged of their old displeasures done to them by the English nation, set so fiercelie on the kings fore ward, led by the earle of Stafford, that they made the same draw backe, and had almost broken their aduersaries arraie. The Welshmen also which before had laine lurking in the woods, mounteines, and marishes, hearing of this battell toward, came to the aid of the Perles, and refreshed the wearied people with new forces. The king perceiving that his men were thus put to discomfiture, what with the violent impession of the Scots, and the tempestuous stormes of ar-rowes, that his aduersaries discharged firely against him and his people, it was no need to will him to flee: for suddenly with his fresh battell, he appo-ched and relieued his men; so that the battell began more fierce than before. Here the lord Henrie Per-le, and the earle Dowglas, a right stout and hardie capitaine, not regarding the shot of the kings battell, nor the close order of the ranks, pressing forward together bent their whole forces towards the kings person, conning vpon him with speares and swordes so fiercelie, that the earle of March the Scot, perceiuing their purpose, withdrew the king from that side of the field (as some write) for his great benefit and safegard (as it appeared) for they gaue such a violent onset vpon them that stood about the kings standard, that slaieng his standard-bearer sir Walter Blunt, and overthrowing the standard, they made slaughter of all those that stood about it, as the earle of Stafford, that daie made by the king constable of the realme, and diuerse other.

The prince that daie holpe his father like a lustie young gentleman: for although he was hurt in the face with an arrow, so that diuerse noble men that were about him, would haue conueied him forth of the field, yet he would not suffer them so to do, least his departure from amongst his men might happlie haue striken some feare into their harts: and so without regard of his hurt, he continued with his men, & neuer ceased, either to fight where the battell was most hot, or to encourage his men where it seemed most need. This battell lasted thre long houres, with indifferent fortune on both parts, till at length, the king crying saint George victorie, brake the arraie of his enemies, and aduentured so farre, that (as some write) the earle Dowglas strake him downe, & at that instant slue sir Walter Blunt, and thre other, apparelled in the kings sute and clothing, saing: I maruell to see so many kings thus suddenly arise one in the necke of an other. The king in deed was raised, & did that daie manie a noble feat of armes, for as it is written, he slue that daie with his owne hands sir and thirtie persons of his enemies. The other on his part encouraged by his doings, fought valiantlie, and slue the lord Perle, called sir Henrie Hotspurre. To conclude, the kings enemies were baniished, and put to flight, in which flight, the earle of Dowglas, for hast, falling from the crag of an hie mounteine, brake one of his collions, and was taken, and for his valiantnesse, of the king franklie and frelie deliuered.

There was also taken the earle of Worcester, the procuroys and setter forth of all this mischief, sir Richard Vernon, and the baron of Kinderton, with di-uerse other. There were slaine vpon the kings part, beside the earle of Stafford, to the number of ten knights, sir Hugh Shollie, sir John Clifton, sir John Cokaine, sir Nicholas Gausell, sir Walter Blunt, sir John Caluerleie, sir John Hallie of Haddington, sir Hugh Postmer, and sir Robert Gausell, all the which receiued the same morning the order of knight-hod: sir Thomas Wilsdesleie was wounded to death, and so passed out of this life shortly after. There died in all vpon the kings side sixtene hundred, and four thousand were grauenlie wounded. On the contrarie side were slaine, besides the lord Perle, the most part of the knights and esquires of the countie of Chester, to the number of two hundred, besides prouers and footmen, in all there died of those that fought on the Perles side, about five thousand. This battell was fought on Marie Magdalene euen, being saturday. Vpon the mondaie following, the earle of Worcester, the baron of Kinderton, and sir Richard Vernon knights, were condemned and beheaded. The earles head was sent to London, there to be set on the badge.

The earle of Northumberland was now marching forward with great power, which he had got thither, either to aid his sonne and brother (as was thought): or at the least towards the king, to procure a peace: but the earle of Westmerland, and Sir Robert Waterton knight, had got an armie on foot, and meant to meet him. The earle of Northumberland, taking neither of them to be his friend, turned suddenly backe, and withdrew himselfe into Warkeworth castell. The king having set a fraie in things about Shrewesburie, went straight to York, from thence he wrote to the earle of Northumberland, willing him to dismisse his companies that he had with him, and to come unto him in peaceable wise. The earle upon receipt of the kings letters came unto him the morow after saint Laurence daie, having with him a few of his servants to attend him, and so excused himselfe, that the king (because the earle had beene in his possession, and further, had his castles of Alnewike, Warkeworth, and other, fortified with Scots) dissembled the matter, gave him faire words, and suffered him (as saith Hall) to depart home, although by other it should seeme, that he was committed for a time to safe custodie.

The king returning forth of Northshire, determined to go into Northwales, to chastise the presumptuous doings of the unruly Welshmen, who (after his coming from Shrewesburie, and the marches there) had done much harme to the English subjects. But now where the king wanted monie to furnish that enterprise, and to wage his souldiers, there were some that counselled him to be bold with the bishops, and supplie his want with their surpluse. But as it forned, the archbishop of Canturburie was there present, who in the name of all the rest boldie made answer, that none of his province should be spoiled by any of those naughtie disposed persons; but that first with hard stripes they should understand the price of their rash enterprise. But the king neuertheless so fled the matter with the bishops for their good wills, that the archbishop at length to pleasure him, calling the cleargie together, got a grant of a tenth, towards the kings necessarie charges.

The Britaines under the conduct of the lord of Castils, spoiled and burnt the towne of Wilmouth, and returned without receiving any damage, but immediatlie thereupon, the westerne men manning forth a fleet, under the gouvernement of one William Wilford esquier, made saile over to the coasts of Britaine, where they took above fortie ships laden with oile, spe, and Rochell wine, to the quantitie of a thousand tunne, or much thereabouts. In returning homewards, they burnt fortie other vessels, and landing at Pennarch, they burnt townes and villages six leagues within the countrie, together with the towne of saint Pattheo, and all the buildings there, three leagues round about the same towne. About the feast of All saints, a parlement began at Couentrie, and continued there till saint Andrews tide: but at length, because vittels wared deere, and lodging was strait, it was adioined from thence unto London, there to begin againe in the octaves of the Epiphanie. The same time, a pardon was granted and proclaimed, for all such as had taken part with the Perles against the king, and likewise for other offenders, those excepted that had consented to betraye Calis, whom the king sent thither to suffer for their offenses. A little before Christmas the Frenchmen meant to have robbed and spoiled the Isle of Wight, but when a thousand of them were set on land, and had got together a great bottie of cattell, suddenly there came upon them such number of people that they were constrained to withdraw to their ships, leaving their preie behind them, and no small number of their men to paie for their shot, so that they wan little by that iourne, returning home with shame and dishonour.

This peace in the parlement holden at London (beginning the morow after the feast of saint Hilarie, and continuing twelve weeks) the earle of Northumberland was restored unto his former dignities, lands and goods, the Isle of Man onlie excepted, which by reason of the forfeiture made by the earle of Salisburie, the king had first given unto him, and now deprived him thereof, where all his other lands, possessions, and livings were wholie to him and his heires restored. By authoritie of the same parlement a subsidie was also granted to the king, of everie knights fee twentie shillings, whether the same were holden of him by menalltie, or otherwise. Moreover, everie man and woman that might dispend in lands the value of twentie shillings & so upward, above the reprises, whether the same lands belonged to the laie fee, or to the church, paid for everie pound twelve pence: and those that were valued to be worth in goods twentie pounds and upward, paid also after the rate of lands, that is, twelve pence for everie pound. ¶ This seemeth to be that subsidie which Thomas Wallingham calleth a soze furcharging subsidie, or an unaccustomed tax: the forme and maner whereof (saith he) I had here interlaced, but that the vertie granters and authors thereof had rather that the posteritie should be utterlie ignorant thereof, and neuer heare of it; sthens it was granted upon this condition, that hereafter it should not be broken in to example; neither might the evidences thereof be kept in the kings treasure, nor in the exchequer; but the records thereof presentlie (after the last accounts given up) burned; neither should tois or commissions be sent abroad against the collectors or inquirers hereof for their better inquest.

The Frenchmen about the same time came before the Isle of Wight with a great armie, and sent certeine of their men to the shore, to demand in name of king Richard, and of his wife queene Isabel, a tribute or speciall subsidie in monie, of the inhabitants of that Ile; who answered, that king Richard was dead, and queene Isabel sometime his wife had bene sent home to his parents and countrie, without condition of any dowrie or tribute: wherefore, they answered reasonablie, that none they would give: but if the Frenchmen had desire to fight, they willed them to come on land, and there should be none to resist them; and after they were on land, they promised to give them respite for six houres space to refresh themselves, and that time being once expired, they should not faile to have battell. When the Frenchmen heard of this stout answer made by the Islanders, they had no lust to approach nere to the land, but returned without further attempt.

About this season, the duke of Exceance, brother to the French king, a man of no lesse pride than hartinesse of courage, wrote letters to king Henric, advertising him, that for the love he bare to the noble seats of chivalrie, he could imagine nothing either more honorable or commendable to them both, than to meet in the field each part with an hundred knights and equiers, all being gentlemen, both of name and armes, armed at all points, and furnished with speares, ares, swords, and daggers, and there to fight and combat to the pecking; and everie person, to whom God should send victorie, to have his prisoner, & him to ransom at his pleasure, offering himselfe with his companie to come to his citie of Angouleme, so that the king should come to the lands of Burdeaux, and there defend this challenge.

An. Reg. 5. 6.

The king of England grauelie answered hereto, to, that he marvelled why the duke under colour of doing deeds of armes for a vaine-glozie, would now sake to breake the peace betwixt the realmes of England and France, he being sworne to mainteine the same peace, sith he might further vnderstand, that no king ante challenge, but to his pære of equal state and dignitie: and further declared, that when opportunitie serued, he would passe the sea, and come into his countrie of Gascoigne, with such companie as he thought convenient, and then might the duke set forward with his band, for the accomplishing of his couragious desire, promising him in the word of a prince, not thence to depart, till the duke either by fulfilling his owne desire in manner aforesaid, or by singular combat betwene them two one lie, for avoiding of more effusion of Christian blood, should thinke himselfe fullie satisfied. To this and much more contained in the kings answer, the duke replied, and the king againe reioined; not without talents and checks unfitting for their estates. The duke of Exeance offended highlie (as he might seeme) furnished against the king of England with an armie of six thousand men, entered into Guien, and besieged the towne of Mergi, whereof was capitaine sir Robert Antifield, a right hardie and valiant knight, having with him onelie three hundred Englishmen, which defended the fortresse so manfullie, that the duke (after he had laine three moneths) and lost manie of his men, without honour or spoile returned into France.

After this, the admerall of Britaine highlie incouraged, for that the last yere he had taken certeine English ships laden with wines, accompanied with the lord du Chastell, a valiant baron of Britaine, and twelve hundred men of armes, sailed forth with thirtie ships from S. Malos, and came before the towne of Dartmouth, and would have landed; but by the puissance of the townsmen and aid of the countrie, they were repelled, in the which conflict, the lord du Chastell, and two of his brethren, with foure hundred other were slaine, and above two hundred taken prisoners and put to their ransoms, amongst whom the lord of Baqueville the marshall of Britaine was one. All this summer, Owen Glendouer and his adherents, robbed, burned, and destroyed the countries adioining nere to the places where he hunted, and one while by sleight & guilefull policie, an other while by open force, he took and slue manie Englishmen, brake downe certeine castles which he won, and some he fortified and kept for his owne defense. John Tenois, bishop of Alass, considering both himselfe how things prospered under the hands of this Owen, fled to him, and took his part against the king. About the same time, the Britaines and the Flemings took certeine ships of ours laden with merchandise, and slue all the mariners or else hanged them.

Also, the old countesse of Arford, mother to Robert Clere late duke of Ireland, that died at Rouenne, caused certein of hir seruants, and other such as she durst trust, to publish and brabe abroad, throughout all the parts of Citer, that king Richard was alieue, and that he would shortly come to light, and claime his former estate, honors, and dignitie. She procured a great number of harts to be made of silver and gold, such as king Richard was wont to give unto his knights, esquires, & friends, to weare as cognizances, to the end that in bestowing them in king Richards name, the might the sooner allure men to further hir lewd practises: and where the same went abroad, that king Richard was in Scotland with a gre at power of Frenchmen and Scots, ready to come to recouer his realme, manie gaue the more light credit vnto this brabe thus set forth by the said countesse.

The persuaasions also of one Serlo, that in times past was one of king Richards chamber, greatlie increased this errour; for the same Serlo, bearing in France (whether he was fled) that his master king Richard was in Scotland alieue, conueied himselfe thither, to vnderstand the truth of that matter, and finding there one indeed that greatlie resembled him in all lineaments of bodie, but yet was not the man himselfe (as he well perceiued) vpon malice that he bare to king Henrie, aduertised by letters sent vnto diuerse of king Richards friends, that he was alieue indeed, and shortly would come to shew himselfe openlie to the world, when he had once made his waie ready to recouer his kingdome, to the confusion of his enemies, and comfort of his friends. These forged inuentions caused manie to beleue the brabe raised by the countesse of Arford, for the which they came in trouble, were apprehended and committed to prison. The countesse hir selfe was shut vp in close prison, and all hir goods were confiscat, and hir secretarie dauen and hanged, that had spied abroad this fained report, in going vp and downe the countrie, blowing into mens eares that king Richard was alieue, & affirming that he had spoken with him in such a place and in such a place, apparelled in this raiment and that raiment, with such like circumstances.

About the feast of saint John Baptiste, at the kings commandement, the earle of Northumberland came to Bomfret, and brought with him his nephews, and his nephews sonnes, whereby he cleared himselfe of a great deale of suspicion, manie doubting before his coming that he had given euill counsell to the young men, whereby to moue them to rebellion, and to withstand the king. Sir William Clifford also came with the earle, and brought the foresaid Serlo with him, whom he had apprehended vpon his coming to him at Berwik, in hope to haue found succour at his hands: in consideration whereof the king pardoned the said sir William Clifford of his disobedience shewed, in keeping the castell of Berwik against him, in which doing he had committed manifold treason.

This Serlo being knowne to be the man that had bene the chiefe murderer of the duke of Gloucester, when he was made a waite at Calis, was diligentlie examined; who were helpers with him in the execution thereof, and after what sort they made him a waite: Serlo knowing there was no waite with him but death, would not utter any other, but confessed for his owne part, he was worthy for that wicked deed to die ten thousand deaths, and shewed such outward appearance of repentance, that manie sore lamented his case, and promised to hire priests to sing masses, (as the maner was) for his soule, of their owne costs and charges. He was condemned to die at Bomfret, and was drawen from thence through euerie goddowne, through which those that had the conuenance of him passed with him till they came to London, where he was executed, confessing euerie thing to be true concerning his wicked ptenle, as before is related: and further, that when he perceiued how their counterfeit practise would come to light and he openlie revealed, he meant to haue returned into France, but wanting monie, he thought to haue bene relieved with some portion at the hand of the said sir William Clifford, and this caused him to come vnto Berwik, to shew him his necessitie, who to make his owne peace, did apprehend him, and present him to the king, as before ye haue heard.

court of parlement, in the which the lord Stephen Scrope of Walsham, and the lord Henric Fitz Hugh obtained first to haue places of barons. Moreover, it is to be noted, that this was called the laie mans parlement, because the shiriffes were appointed to haue a speciall regard, that none should be chosen knights for the countie, nor burgesles for the cities and townes, that had any skill in the lawes of the land. This was done, and when they came together to talke of the weightie affaires of the realme, spe- 10 ciallie how the king might be relieved with monie, to beare such charges as he was knowen to be at, as well in defending the realme from the Scots and Welshmen at home, as from the Britains, Flemings, and Frenchmen abroad, it was thought most expedient, that the spiritualtie should be depriued of their temporall possessions, to the reliefe of the kings necessitie. Hereupon rose great alteration betwixt the cleargie and the laitie; the knights affirming, that they had oftentimes serued the king, not onelie 20 with their goods, but also with their persons in great dangers and leopordies, whilst the spiritualtie sat at home, and holp the king nothing at all. Thomas Arundell archbishop of Canturburie forthlie answered herevnto, that the cleargie had alwaie giuen to the king as much as the laitie had done, conside- ring they had oftener giuen their tenths to him than the laitie their assens: also, that more of their ten- 30 nants went forth into the kings warres, than the remnants of them of the laie se: beside this, they praied day and night for the kings good successe against his enemies.

When the speaker named Sir John Cheinie, in re- plying by plaine speech, seemed little to eskeeme such praiers of the church, the archbishop was set in a great chafe, and with sharpe words declaring what he thought must needs followe, both of the king and kingdom, when praiers and suffrages of churchmen came to be so little set by, he grew to such impatientie, that he flatlie told the speaker, that although he 40 seemed little to eskeeme of the religion of the cleargie, he would not haue him to thinke, that he should take awaie the possessions of the church, without finding such as would seeke to withstand him, for if (said he) the archbishop of Canturburie made liue, thou shalt haue hot taking awaie any manner of thing that is his. After this, when the archbishop perceived that the king winked at these matters, he rose from his place and comming before the king, kneled downe, and besought him to consider, how through the fauour and grace of the almightie God, he had attained to the kingdom, and therefore he ought to remember his first purpose and intent, which was, to faue vnto 50 euerie man his right, so far as in him laie.

He willed him likewise to haue in consideration the oth which he willingly had receiued, that is, that he should aduance the honoz of the church, and the mi- nisters thereof of cherish and mainteine. Also, to haue in mind the danger and dishonour that redounded to such as brake their othes: so that he besought him to permit and suffer the church to inioy the priuileges and liberties, which in time of his predecessors it had inioied, requesting him to stand in aide of that king, by whom all kings did reigne; and to feare the cen- sures and condemnation that those incurred, which 60 toke and bereft from the church any good or right be- longing to it, who most certeinlie (said he) are ac- cursed. When the archbishop had vsed this, or the like speech, the king commanded him to go to his seat a- gaine, assuring him, that his intent and purpose was to leaue the church in as good state, or better, than he found it.

The archbishop here with turning to the knights and burgesles of the parlement, said vnto them;

10 You, and such other as you be, haue giuen counsell vnto the king and his predecessors, to confiscate and take into their hands the goods and possessions of the celles, which the Frenchmen and Romans possessed here in England, and affirmed that by the same he and they should heape up great riches, and in deed those goods and possessions (as is to be proued) were 20 worth manie thousands of gold: and yet it is most true, that the king at this day is not halfe one marke of siluer the richer thereby, for you haue begged and gotten them out of his hands, and haue appropriated the same vnto your selues, so that we may coniecture verie well, that you request to haue our temporal- ties, not to aduance the kings profit, but to satisfie 30 your owne greedie conetousnesse; for vndoubtedly if the king (as God forbid he should) did accomplish your wicked purposes and minds, he should not be one farthing the richer the yeare next after: and tra- lie, sooner will I suffer this head of mine to be cut off from my shoulders, than that the church should lose the least right that appertaineth to it.

The knights said little, but yet they proceeded in their sute to haue their purpose forward, which the archbishop perceiuing (as an other Argus, hauing his eie on each side, to marke what was done) labou- red so to disappoint their doings, that he wane the fa- 40 uour of certeine of the temporall lords to assist him, who constantlie avouched by their consents, that the church should neuer be spoiled of the temporalities, and herein they acquitted the archbishop and prelates, one pleasure for an other, which they had done for them before, when the commons in this parlement required, that all such lands and reuenues as some- time belonged to the crowne, and had bene giuen a- waie, either by the king, or by his predecessors king Edward, and king Richard, should be againe resto- red to the kings vse; vnto which request, the archbi- 50 shop and other the prelates would in no wise consent: thus by the stout diligence of the archbishop Arundell that petition of the commons, touching the spiritual temporalities, came to none effect. For the knights themselves, who verie instantlie had stood in this er- ror, acknowledging their maliciousnes and guiltinesse herein, besought the archbishop of Canturburie to pardon them; and gaue thanks that by his corra- gionnesse the church in this so troubleosome a time re- 60 uined, calling to mind the saluing of an ethnike, by way of application, to the said archbishops his praise:

[Temporibus malis animus esse bonus.]

Two sutes were granted by the commons, with condition, that the same should be paid vnto the hands of the lord Furnuall, who should see that mo- nie imploied for maintenance of the kings warres. Moreover, at the importunate sute of the commons, the letters patents that had bene made to diuerse persons of annuities to them granted by king Ed- 60 ward and king Richard, were called in, and made void, not without some note of dishonoz to the king. The cleargie granted to the king a tenth and a halfe, notwithstanding that the halfe of one tenth latelie granted was yet behind; and appointed to be paid vpon saint Martins daie next comming. About this season, great losse happened in Kent, by breaking in of waters, that ouerflowed the sea banks, as well in the archbishop of Canturburies grounds, as other mens, whereby much castell was drowned. Whether did England alone beuaile his losses by such break- ings in of the sea, but also Zealand, Flanders, & Hol- land tallied of the like damage.

two colleges, one at Winchester for grammar ans, and the other at Orenford called the new col-ledge, purchasing lands and revenues for the maintenance of students there to the great commoditie of the commonwealth: for from thence, as out of a good nurserie, haue come forth diuerse men in all ages excellentlie learned in all sciences. ¶ And here I haue not thought it impertinent to speake somewhat of this worthy prelat (considering that by him so great a benefit hath returned to the commonwealth) according to such notes as I haue scene collected by that painfull traoueller in search of antiquities John Leland, who saith, that as some haue supposed, the said Wickham, otherwise called Perot, was bore sonne to one Perot, the towne-clerke of Wickham in Hampshire, of which place he toke his surname, and that one maister Modall a gentleman, dwelling in the said towne, brought him by at school, where he learned his grammar, and to write verie faire, in so much that the constable of Winchester castell, a great ruler in those daies in Hampshire, got him of maister Modall, and retained him to be his secretarie, with whome he continued, till king Edward the third, comming to Winchester, conceiued some good liking of the yong man, and toke him to his seruice, and withall vnderstanding that he was minded to be a churchman, he first made him parson and deane of saint Martins in London, then archdeacon of Buckingham.

¶ But for so much as his seruice was right acceptable to the king, as he that with great dexteritie could handle such affaires of the state, or other matters of charge as were committed to his hands, the king still kept him about his person, as one of his chiefe chaplaine of household, and imployed him in sundrie offices, as occasions serued: and first he made him surueior of his works and buildings, namely at Winchore, in repairing of that castell, and also at Winbrough, where, by the kings appointment, a strong fortresse was raised, for defense of the realme on that side. After this, he was aduanced to the keeping of the priuie seale, made ouersceer of the wards and forests, also tresuroer of the kings revenues in France, and at length was made bishop of Winchester. ¶ Yet the Blacke prince did not greatlie fauour him, whereupon Wickham procured to keepe him occupied in warres beyond the seas. ¶ But at length John duke of Lancaster, and Alice Perets king Edwards concubine, conceiuing some great displeasure against him, found meane to procure the king to banish him the realme, and then he remained in Normandie and Picardie for the space of seauen yeares, or thereabout, and might not be restored so long as king Edward liued. But after his decesse, about the second yeare of king Richard the seconds reigne, he was restored home, and purchased a generall pardon for all matters past that might be surmised against him, or laid to his charge.

¶ Afterwards he bare himselfe so straightlie in that dangerous time, when such misliking and priuie en-mie reigned betwixt the king and his nobles, that both parts seemed to like of him, inasmuch that when the king made him lord chancellor, there was not a nie that greatlie repined thereat; and verelie in that the king made choise of him before others to occupie that place, it argueth there was not so euill a disposition in the king, nor lacke of discretion in order of government, as writers seeme to charge him with.
But where other could not so well beare injuries at others hands as haplie Wickham could, the fire of dissention chafie kindled thereof. For if the duke of Ireland, and the earle of Suffolke, with those of that faction could haue refrained to their displeasures, when the duke of Gloucester and other his complices pinched at them (for that they sawe the king haue them in more estimation than they wished) matters might haue bene qualified peradventure with lesse adoe, and without danger to haue insued to either part. But howsoeuer it went with them, it may doubtlesse be easilie coniectured, that Wickham was a man of singular wisdomne, and politike foresight, that could from meane degre in such wise clime aloft, and afterwards passe through the chances and changes of variable fortune, keeping himselfe euer so in state, that he grew at length to be able to furnish the chargeable expences of two such notable foundations which he left behind him, to make his name immortall. But leauing the consideration hereof to others, I will returne to the purpose from whence I haue thus far stepped.

In this first yeare, the fridaie after saint Valentines daie, the earle of March his sonnes earlie in the mornng were taken south of Winchore castell, and conueied awaie, it was not knowne whither at the first, but such search and inquirie was made for them that shortly after they were heard of, and brought backe againe. The smith that counterfitted the keyes, by the which they that conueied them thence got into the chamber where they were lodged, had first his hands cut off, and after his head striken from his shoulders. The ladie Spenser, sister to the duke of Yorke and widow of the lord Thomas Spenser, executed at Bristow (as before ye haue heard) being apprehended and committed to close pison, accused hir brother the duke of Yorke, as chefe author in stealing awaie the said earle of March his sonnes. And further, that the said duke ment to haue broken into the manor of Eltham the last Christmasse, by scaling the wals in the night season, the king being there the same time, to the intent to haue murdered him. For to proue hir accusation true, she offered that if there were anie knight, or el-quier, that would take vpon him to fight in hir quar-rell, if he were ouercome, she would be content to be burnt for it.

¶ One of hir esquieres named William Spadstone, hearing what answer his ladie and mistresse propounded, cast downe his hood, and proffered in hir cause the combat. The duke likewise cast downe his hood, ready by battell to cleare his innocencie. ¶ But yet the kings sonne lord Thomas of Lancaster arrested him, and put him vnder safe keeping in the Tower, till it were further knowne what order should be taken with him, and in the meane time were all his goods confiscate. The same time was Thomas Spolobzaie earle marshall accused, as pri-uie to the purpose of the duke of Yorke, touching the withdrawing of the earle of March his children, who confessed indeed that he knew of the dukes purpose: but yet in no wise gaue his consent thereunto, and therefore besought the king to be good and gracious lord vnto him for concealing the matter, and so he ob-teined pardon of that offense.

The king had assembled at the same time the most part of the nobilitie at London, to consult with them for diuerse weightie matters, concerning the state of the common-wealth, and about some aid of mo-nie which he requited: but the lords shewd themselves not willing to satisfie his request. He therfore caused the spirituall lords as well as the temporall, to meet at S. Albons in the Lent season, about the same matter; but yet obtined not his purpose, by reason the barons were soe against him, and so at length on Walne fundate they went their waie, each man to his home, hauing gratified the king in nothing concerning his demand. In the meane time, to wit the fifteenth of March at a place in Wales called Hulke, in a conflict fought betwixt the Welshmen

Infl. lib. 1. Herod. lib. 1. Val. Max. lib. 8. cap. 7.

This was a thyetwo discomfiture to the Welsh by the English, on whome siniffer lot lowzsd, at such time as more than a thousand of them were slaine in a hot skirmish; and such shamefull villanie executed vpon the carcasses of the dead men by the Welsh women; as the like (I do beleue) hath neuer or shal dome beane practised. For though it was a cruell deed of Comyzis quene of the Passagets in Scythia, against whome when Cyzus the great king of Persia came, and had slaine hir sonne, she by hir policie trained him into such streets, that she slue him and all his host; and causing a great vessell to be filled with the blood of Cyzus and other Persians, did cast his head therein, saying; Bloud thou hast thirsted and now drinke thereof thy fill: againe, though it was a cruell deed of Fulvia the wife of Marcus Antonius (at whose commandement Popilius cut off the head and hands of that golden mouthed orator Cullie, which afterwards were nailed vp ouer the place of common pleas at Rome) to hold in hir hands the tongue of that father of eloquence cut out of his head after the same was parted from his shoulders, and to picke it all ouer with pins and needles: yet neither the crueltie of Comyzis nor yet of Fulvia is comparable to this of the Welshwomen; which is worthy to be recorded to the shame of a ser pretending the title of weake vessels, and yet raging with such force of fiercencesse and barbarisme. For the dead bodies of the Englishmen, being about a thousand lying vpon the ground imbrued in their owne blood, was a sight (a man would thinke) greuous to looke vpon, and so farre from exciting and stirring vp affections of crueltie; that it should rather haue moued the beholders to commiseration and merrie: yet did the women of Wales cut off their pluries, and put one part thereof into the mouthes of euerie dead man, in such sort that the cullions hong downe to their chins; and not so contented, they did cut off their noses and thrust them into their tailes as they laie on the ground mangled and defaced. This was a verie ignominious deed, and a worse not committed among the barbarous; which though it make the reader to read it, and the hearer to heare it, ashamed: yet because it was a thing done in open sight, and lest testified in historie; I fee little reason why it should not be imparted in our mother tongue to the knowledge of our owne countrymen, as well as vnto strangers in a language vnknewne. And thus much by waie of notifying the inhumanitie and detestable demeanour of those Welshwomen, after the conflict betwene the English and the Welsh, whereof defaultie mention is made before pag. 520, where Edmund Mortimer earle of March was taken prisoner.

The castell of Marke besieged about the middell of Maye as Iac. Meir. saith. Sir Philip Hall.

Ralran earle of S. Paule, by the assent of the French king, assembled five hundred men of armes, five hundred Genotvates with crossbowes, and a thousand Flemings on foot, with the which he laid siege to the castell of Marke, three leagues from Calis, vpon the fiftenth daie of Iulie. Capteine of the castell as then for the king of England was one sir Philip Hall, hauing with him foure score archers, and foure and twentie other soldiers, which defended the place so manfully, that the earle retired into the towne, and there lodged, fortifying it for feare of rescue that might come from Calis. The next daie he gaue another assault to the castell, and toke the bitter court, wherein was found a great number of horses, kine, and other cattell. The next daie there issued forth of Calis two hundred men of armes, two hundred archers, and three hundred footmen, with ten or twelue wagons laden with vittells and artillerie, conducted by sir Richard Aston knight, lieutenant of the English pale for the earle of Summerset, capteine generall of those marches.

The Frenchmen advertised that the Englishmen were coming to remove the siege, issued not forth of their lodgings, but kept them within their closure. Neuerthelesse, the Englishmen shot so sharpe and close together, that the Flemings and footmen began to flie: the men of armes, fearing the slaughter of their horses, ran awaie with a light gallop. The Genotvates which had spent the most part of their shot at the assaults made to the castell, shewed small resistance, and so all the number of the French part were slaine and put to flight. The earle of S. Paule and diuerse other escaped awaie, and by S. Omers got to Cherouenne, or (as others saie) to saint Omers. But there were taken to the number of three or foure score, and amongst other the lord de Dampier scerhall of Ponthien, monsieur de Wexlers, monsieur de Wines, monsieur de Poitelles, monsieur John de Hangelis capteine of Bullongne, the lord de Rambures, monsieur Lionell Darreis capteine of Graueling, monsieur Peter Kasser capteine of Arde, also Combernard capteine of Cironan, Bold Chanon capteine of Pontoire, John Chanon capteine of Lille, Stenebreche capteine of Ralingham, the bastard of Burneuill capteine of Burburgh. There were slaine about 60, and among them as chiefe sir Robert Berenguetill, the lord of Quercus, Gouert de Sanctes, the lord Courbet de Kemppeupzet, and others.

The Englishmen had the spoile of the earls campe, and being returned to Calis, within five daies after there issued forth about five hundred men, meaning to haue towne the towne of Arde, with a sudden assault, which they gaue to it in the night time. But sir Spanfrid de Bois, and the lord Bigine, did so valiantly defend it, that the Englishmen with losse of foure of their men were constrained to retire vnto Calis, after they had burnt the dead bodies in an old house, for that the enemies should not perceiue that losse the Englishmen had susteyned. After this, the French king, to auoid perils, laid in garison at Bullongne, and in other places, the marques of Pount, sonne to the duke of Bar, the earle of Dampier, and sir John Harpagan a knight of great renowne and estimation. The duke of Burgognie likewise sent a number of soldiers vnto Graueling, vnder the leading of one John Mandenball, and to other fortresses along the coast he sent new supplies, for doubt of the Englishmens inuasions.

The king of England in deed hearing of the preparation made by the Frenchmen, issued forth four thousand men, which he sent vnto Calis, and to the sea, of the which 3000 were vnder the conduct of the kings sonne. The lord Thomas of Lancaster, and the earle of Mont, the two and twentieth daie of Maie (as some write) came vpon the coast of Flanders, and entrenging the haven of Aldis, burnt foure great ships which they found here lying at anchor. On the fift daie after their coming into that haven they went on land, thinking to haue fought with the duke of Burgognie. But as other write, after they had besieged the castell that stood in the mouth of the haven, and losing three score of their men, amongst which they name one to beare the title of earle of Denbroke (whom they buried for the time in the church of Wade) five daies after their coming ming thither they determined to depart from thence, perceiving the castell would not easilie be twone, but first they spoiled the countie about them, and burnt theis fleet, otherwise called Condekirke, and divers other places thereabout.

This done, they took by the bodie of him whom the Flemish writers call the earle of Penbrooke, and got them againe to the sea, for that they were advertised how the duke of Burgonie meant to besiege Calis. Whereupon raising their siege thus from Calis, they returned unto the defense of the towne of Calis, so much desired of the French nation. As they returned homewards, they met with three caricks of Genoa, of the which one having the wind with him, meant to have overthrowne the ship wherein the lord Thomas of Lancaster was aboard: but by the good foresight of the master of the ship that ruled the sterne, suddenlie turning the same, the violent swaie of that huge vessell comming so upon them, was avoided; but yet the caricke strooke off the nose of the English ship, and bzused him on the side. Then began the fight verie cruell, till the earle of Kent came to the rescue: and so finally after a great wound and bloudie battell betwixt the caricks and English ships, the victorie remained with the Englishmen, who taking the caricks, turned their sailes toward: Poymandie, where they arrived and burnt the towne of Hoggue, Mountburge, Bersie, saint Petronils and other, to the number of thirtie six, passing forth into the countie without resistance, the space of thirtie miles, spoiling all that came in their waie. This done, they returned, and brought the caricks into the chamber at Kie, where one of them by misfortune of fire perished, to the losse & no gaine of either of the parties.

John duke of Burgonie having obtained licence to besiege Calis, prepared an armie of six thousand men of armes, fiftene hundred cosbowes, & twelve thousand footmen, the which being assembled, and all necessarie provision readie at saint Amers, he was by the French king countermanded, and not suffered to proceed any further in that weightie enterprise. And this was thought to be partlie the cause of the malice that he conceived against the duke of Orleans, supposing that through him (envieng his gayte) he was thus disappointed of his purpose. Which such wrongs were in hand betwixt the English and French, as the besieging of Marke castell by the earle of saint Paule, and the sending forth of the English fleet, under the governance of the lord Thomas of Lancaster, and the earle of Kent, the king was minded to have gone into Wales against the Welsh rebels, that under their chiefeine Owen Glendouer, ceased not to do much mischief still against the English subiects.

But at the same time, to his further disquieting, there was a conspiracie put in practise against him at home by the earle of Northumberland, who had conspired with Richard Scrope archbishop of Yorke Thomas Spowbray earle marshall sonne to Thomas duke of Norfolk, who for the quarrell betwixt him and king Henrie had bene banished (as ye have heard) the lords Hastings, Franconbroge, Berdolf, and divers others. It was appointed that they should meet altogether with their whole power, upon Yorke shire, at a daie assigned, and that the earle of Northumberland should be chiefeine, promising to bring with him a great number of Scots. The archbishop accompanied with the earle marshall, devised certaine articles of such matters, as it was supposed that not onelie the commonaltie of the Realme, but also the nobilitie found themselves grieved with: which articles they shewed first unto such of their adherents as were neere about them, & after sent them abroad to their friends further off, assuring them that for redress of such oppressions, they would shed the last drop of blood in their bodies, if need were.

The archbishop not meaning to staie after he saw himselfe accompanied with a great number of men, that came flocking to Yorke to take his part in this quarrell, forthwith discovered his enterprise, causing the articles also said to be set up in the publike streets of the citie of Yorke, and upon the gates of the monasteries, that ech man might vnderstand the cause that moued him to rise in armes against the king, the reforming whereof did not yet appertene unto him. Hereupon knights, esquires, gentlemen, yeomen, and other of the commons, as well of the citie, townes and countries about, being allured either for desire of change, or else for desire to see a reformation in such things as were mentioned in the articles, assembled together in great numbers; and the archbishop comming forth amongst them clad in armour, incouraged, exhorted, and (by all means he could) picked them forth to take the enterprise in hand, and manfullie to continue in their begun purpose, promising forgiveness of sinnes to all them, whose hap it was to die in the quarrell: and thus not onelie all the citizens of Yorke, but all other in the countries about, that were able to beate weapon, came to the archbishop, and the earle marshall. In deed the respect that men had to the archbishop, caused them to like the better of the cause, since the grauitie of his age, his integritie of life, and incomparable learning, with the reuerend aspect of his amiable personage, moued all men to haue him in no small estimation.

The king advertised of these matters, meaning to prevent them, lest his iourne into Wales, and marched with all speed towards the north parts. Also Rafe Penill earle of Westmerland, that was not farre off, together with the lord John of Lancaster the kings sonne, being informed of this rebellious attempt, assembled together such power as they might make, and together with those which were appointed to attend on the said lord John to defend the borders against the Scots, as the lord Henrie Fitzhugh, the lord Rafe Geuers, the lord Robert Umfravill, & others, made forward against the rebels, and comming into a plaine within the forest of Caltre, caused their standards to be pitched doونه in like sort as the archbishop had pitched his, ouer against them, being farre stronger in number of people than the other, for (as some write) there were of the rebels at the least twentie thousand men.

When the earle of Westmerland perceived the force of the aduersaries, and that they late skill and attempted not to come forward upon him, he subtilie deuised how to quail their purpose, and forthwith dispatched messengers unto the archbishop to understand the cause as it were of that great assemble, and for what cause (contrarie to the kings peace) they came so in amour. The archbishop answered, that he toke nothing in hand against the kings peace, but that whatsoeuer he did, tended rather to aduance the peace and quiet of the common-wealth, than otherwise; and where he and his companie were in armes, it was for feare of the king, to whom he could haue no free access, by reason of such a multitude of flatterers as were about him; and therefore he maintained that his purpose to be good & profitable, as well for the king himselfe, as for the realme, if men were willing to vnderstand a truth: & herewith he shewed forth a scroll, in which the articles were written wherof before ye have heard.

The messengers returning to the earle of Westmerland, shewed him what they had heard & brought from the archbishop. When he had read the articles, he he shewed in word and countenance outwardly that he liked of the archbishops holie and vertuous intent and purpose, promising that he and his would prosecute the same in assisting the archbishop, who resolving hereat, gaue credit to the earle, and perswaded the earle marshall (against his will as it were) to go with him to a place appointed for them to commune together. Where then they were met with like number on either part, the articles were read ouer, and without anie more ado, the earle of Westmerland and those that were with him agreed to do their best, to see that a reformation might be had, according to the same.

The earle of Westmerland's politike dealing.

The earle of Westmerland being more politic than the rest: Well (said he) then our trauell is come to the wished end: and where our people haue bene long in armour, let them depart home to their wonted trades and occupations: in the meane time let vs drinke together in signe of agreement, that the people on both sides maie see it, and know that it is true, that we be light at a point. They had no sooner shaken hands together, but that a knight was sent straight waies from the archbishop, to bring word to the people that there was peace concluded, commanding ech man to laie aside his armes, and to resort home to their houses. The people beholding such tokens of peace, as shaking of hands, and drinking together of the lords in louing manner, they being already wearied with the vnaccustomed trauell of warre, brake by their field and returned homewards: but in the meane time, whilst the people of the archbishops side withdrew awaie, the number of the contrarie part increased, according to order giuen by the earle of Westmerland; and yet the archbishop perceived not that he was deceived, untill the earle of Westmerland arrested both him and the earle marshall, with diuerse other. Thus saith Wallingham.

The archbishop of York and the earle marshall arrested.

But others write somewhat otherwise of this matter, affirming that the earle of Westmerland in deed, and the lord Kase Cuers, procured the archbishop & the earle marshall, to come to a communication with them, vpon a ground iust in the midwaie betwixt both the armies, where the earle of Westmerland in talke declared to them how perillous an enterprise they had taken in hand, so to raise the people, and to moue warre against the king, aduising them therefore to submit themselves without further delay vnto the kings mercie, and his sonne the lord John, who was present there in the field with banners spread, redie to trie the matter by dint of sword, if they refused this counsell: and therefore he willed them to remember themselves well; & if they would not yeld and craue the kings pardon, he bad them do their best to defend themselves.

Whereupon as well the archbishop as the earle marshall submitted themselves vnto the king, and to his sonne the lord John that was there present, and returned not to their armie. Whereupon their tromps scaled and fled their waies; but being pursued, manie were taken, manie slaine, and manie spoiled of that that they had about them, & so permitted to go their waies. Howsoeuer the matter was handled, true it is that the archbishop, and the earle marshall were brought to Donistret to the king, who in this meane while was aduanced thither with his powder, and from thence he went to York, whither the prisoners were also brought, and there beheaded the morrow after Whitsondaie in a place without the citie, that is to say, betwixt the archbishop himselfe, the earle marshall, sir John Lamplere, and sir Robert Plumpton. & vnto all which persons though in demerit were promised, yet was the same to none of them at anie hand performed. archbishop, the prophesie of a sicklie canon of Badington in Northshire fell out to be true, who darklie though foretold this matter, & the unfortunate event thereof in these words hereafter following, saieing:

*Pacem tractabant, sed fraudem subter arabant, Pro nulla marca, saluabitur ille * hierarcha.*

The archbishop suffered death verie constantlie, inasmuch as the common people took it, he died a martyr, affirming that certeine miracles were wrought as well in the field where he was executed, as also in the place where he was buried: and immediately vpon such bynts, both men and women began to worship his dead carcasse; whom they loued so much when he was alieue, till they were forbidden by the kings friends, and for feare gaue ouer to visit the place of his sepulture. The earle marshalls bodie by the kings leaue was buried in the cathedrall church, manie lamenting his destinie; but his head was set on a pole aloft on the walls for a certeine space, till by the kings permission [after the same had suffered manie a hot sunnie date, and manie a wet shower of raine] it was taken downe and buried together with the bodie.

After the king, accordinglie as seemed to him good, had ransomed and punished by greuous fines the citizens of York (which had borne armour on their archbishops side against him) he departed for York with an armie of thirtie and seuen thousand fighting men, furnished with all prouision necessary, marching northwards against the earle of Northumberland. At his coming to Durham, the lord Hastings, the lord Fauconbridge, sir John Colclough of the Dale, and sir John Griffith, being convicted of the conspiracie, were there beheaded. The earle of Northumberland, hearing that his counsell was betrayed, and his confederats brought to confusion, though too much hat of the archbishop of York, with three hundred horse got him to Berwik. The king coming Edward quicklie, toan the castell of Tharkeborow. Whereupon the earle of Northumberland, not thinking himselfe in surtie at Berwik, fled with the lord Berwolfe into Scotland, where they were received of David lord Fleming.

The king coming to Berwik, commanded that that kept the castell against him to render it to his hands, and when they flatlie denied so to do, he caused a peece of artillerie to be planted against one of the towers, and at the first shot ouerthrowing part thereof, they within were put in such feare, that they flatlie yelded themselves without any manner of condition, whollie to remaine at the kings pleasure. Whereupon the chieftest of them, to wit, sir William Greystoke, sonne to Kasebaron of Greystoke, sir Henrie Beinton, and John Blenkinlop, with foure or five other were put to death, and diuerse other were kept in prison. Some write that the earle of Northumberland at his entring into Scotland, deliuered the towne of Berwik vnto the Scots, who hearing of king Henries approach, and despairing to defend the towne against him, set fire on it and departed. There was not one hold that was left vnburnt, except the friers and the church.

After that the king had disposed things in such convenient order as stood with his pleasure at Berwik, he came backe, and had the castell of Alnetholke deliuered vnto him, with all other the castells that belonged to the earle of Northumberland in the north parts, as Boddow, Langlie, Cockermonth, Altham, and Bewlsted. Thus hauing quieted the north parts, he took his iourne directlie into Wales, where he found fortune nothing favourable vnto him, for all his attempts had euill successe, in somuch that lacking stiffe of his cariages through abundance of raine and waters, he returned; and coming to Worcester for, he sent for the archbishop of Cantuarburie, and other bishops, declaring to them the misfortune that had chanced to him, in consideration whereof he requested them to helpe him with some portion of money, towards the maintenance of his warres, for the taming of the presumptuous and unquiet Welshmen.

In the meane time, the French king had appointed one of the marshalls of France called Pontmerancie, and the master of his crossbowes, with twelue thousand men to saile into Wales to aid Owen Glendouer. They took shipping at Brest, and hauing the wind prosperous, landed at Milford haueu, with an hundred and fourtie ships, as Thomas Walsingham saith; though Enguerant de Montfrellet maketh mention but of an hundred and twentie. The most part of their horses were lost by the waie for lacke of fresh water. The lord Berkeley, and Henrie Paie, espieng their advantage, burnt fiftene of those French ships, as they laie at road there in the haueu of Milford; and shortly after the same lord Berkeley, and sir Thomas Swinborne, with the said Henrie Paie, took other fourtene ships, as they came that waie with prouision of vittels and munition for the France to the aid of the other.

In the meane while the marshall Pontmerancie, with his armie, besieged the towne of Carmarden, and won it by composition, granting to the men of waire that kept it against him, licence to depart whither they would, & to take with them all their mouable goods: the castell of Denbroke they assaulted not, esteeming it to be so well manned, that they shuld but lose their labour in attempting it. Shortly after, when they besieged the towne of Hereford well, which neuertheless was so well defended by the earle of Arundell and his power, that they lost more than they won, and so they departed towards the towne of Denbigh, where they found Owen Glendouer abiding for their coming, with ten thousand of his Welshmen. Here were the Frenchmen toisollie retrained of the Welsh rebels, and so when all things were prepared, they passed by Glamorganshire towards Worcester, and there burnt the suburbs: but hearing of the kings approach, they suddenly returned towards Wales.

The king with a great puissance followed, and found them unbattelled on a high mountaine, where there was a great battell betwixt both the armies, so that either armie might plainelie perceiue the other, and either host looked to be assailed of his aduersarie, & therefore sought to take the advantage of ground. Thus they continued for the space of eight daies from morning till night, readie to abide, but not to giue battell. Here were many skirmishes, and diuerse proper feats of armes wrought in that meane while, in the which the French lost many of their nobles and gentlemen; as the lord Patrouillars de Tries, brother to the marshall of France, the lord Patellonne of Parlelonne, the lord de la Masse, and the bassard of Bourbon, with other, to the number (as some haue written) of fure hundred. But Enguerant de Montfrellet affirmeth, that vpon their retorne into France, there wanted not above threescore persons of all their companies.

After they had laine thus one against another the space of eight daies (as before is said) vittels began to faile, so that they were inforced to dislodge. The French and Welshmen withdrew into Wales, and though the Englishmen followed, yet impeached with the desert grounds and barren countrie, thorough which they must passe, as our felles and cragie mounteins, from hill to daie, from marsh to wood, from naught to worse (as Hall saith) without vittels or succour, the king was of force constrained to retire with his armie, and retorne againe to Worcester, in which retorne the enimies took certeine cariages of his laden with vittels. The Frenchmen after the armies were thus withdorne, returned into Britaine, making small bags of their painefull iourne.

This yeare at London, the earle of Arundell married the bassard daughter of the king of Portingale, the king of England and the queene with their presence honozing the solemnitie of that feast, which was kept with all sumptuous roialtie, the morrow after saint Katharins daie. And on the daie of the Conception of our ladie, the ladie Philip king Henries daughter was proclaimed queene of Denmarke, Polande, and Sweden, in presence of such ambassadoys, as the last summer came hither from the king of those countries, to demand hir in marriage for him, and had so travelled in the matter, that finally they obtained it. And on the daie of the translation of saint Martine, the towne of Roiston was on fire. This yeare the first of March a parliament began, which continued almost all this yeare: for after that in the lower house they had denied a long time to grant to any subsidie: yet at length, a little before Christmasse, in the eight yeare of his reigne they granted a fiftenth to the losse and great damage of the communalitie, for thorough lingering of time, the expences of knights and burgeses grew almost in value to the summe that was demanded.

Moreover, by the clergie a new kind of subsidie was granted, to the king, to be leuied of stipendarie priests and friers mendicants, and other such religious men as long for the dead, celebrating (as they termed it) anniuersaries: euerie of them gaue halfe a marke, in reliefe of other of the clergie that had still borne the burthen for them before. Whereupon now they murmured and grudged sore, for that they were thus charged at that present. The same time the earle of Northumberland, and the lord Bar-dolfe, warned by the lord David Fleming, that there was a conspiraite practised to deliuer them into the king of Englands hands, fled into Wales to Owen Glendouer. This cost the lord Fleming his life: for after it was knowne that he had disclosed to the earle of Northumberland what was meant against him, and that the earle thereupon was shifted awaie, certeine of the Scots sue the said lord Fleming.

Whereupon no small grudge rose betwixt those that so sue him, and the said lord Flemings friends. For this and other matters, such dissention sprang up amongst the Scottish nobilitie, that one durst not trust another, so that they were glad to sue for a truce betwixt England and them, which was granted to indure for one yeare, as in some booke we find recorded. This truce being obtained, Robert king of Scotland (upon considerations, as in the Scottish histories ye may read more at large) sent his eldest son James intituled prince of Scotland (a child not past nine yeares of age) to be conueied into France, vnder the conduct of the earle of Dykenie, and a bishop, in hope that he might there both remaine in safetie, and also learne the French tong.

But it fortunied, that as they sailed neare to the English coast about Flambrough head in Holderness, their ship was taken and staied by certeine mariners of Claie (a towne in Norfolk) that were abroad the same time; and so he and all his companie being apprehended the thirtieth of March, was conueied to Windsoze, where though he had letters from his father, which he presented to the king, containing a request in his sommes behalfe for fauour to be shewed towards him, if by chance he landed within any of his dominions: yet was he detained, and as well he himselfe as the earle of Dykenie was committed to safe safe keeping in the Tower of London, but the bishop got away and escaped (as some write) by what means I know not. By the Scottish writers we find that this chanced in the yeare 1404, that is, two yeares before the time noted in diuerse English writers, as Thomas Walsingham and other. But Harding saith it was in the ninth yeare of king Henries reigne, to wit, in the yeare 1408.

But whensoever it chanced, it is to be thought, that there was no truce at that present betwene the two realmes, but that the warre was rather open, sith diuerse English rebels still remained in Scotland, and were there succored to the high displeasure of king Henrie. ¶ By authoritie of the parlement that all this time continued, the Britons that serued the queene, with two of hir daughters were banished the realme. Robert Halome chancellor of Oxford, as then being in the popes court at Rome, was created archbishop of York. ¶ Whereouer the same time, the pope gaue vnto Thomas Langlie the bishopricke of Durham, which by the death of Walter Skirlow was then void. In the summer of this yeare, the ladie Philib the kings yonger daughter was sent ouer to hir affianced husband, Erie king of Denmarke, Polande, and Sweden, being conueied thither with great pompe, and there married to the said king, where she tasted (according to the common speech vsed in praiseng for the successe of such a match together in marriage) both joy and some sorrow among. There attended hir thither Henrie Bowet bishop of Bath, and the lord Richard brother to the duke of York.

There was a iusts held at London, betwixt the earle of Kent, and the erle of Marre a Scottishman; also sir John Cornetwall, and the lord Beaumont, against other two Scottish knights, whereof the honoz remained with the Englishmen. In the parlement which yet continued, the duke of York was restored to his former libertie, estate and dignitie, where manie supposed that he had bene dead long before that time in prison. Edmund Holland earle of Kent was in such fauour with king Henrie, that he not onelie aduanced him to high offices and great honozs, but also to his great costs and charges obtained for him the ladie Lucie, eldest daughter, and one of the heires of the lord Barnabo of Aquilane, which Barnabo paid to him 100000 ducates, in the church of S. Marie Queres in Southwarke, by the hands of Don Alfonso de Catinuola, vpon the day of the solemnization of the marriage, which was the four and twentieth of Januarie.

¶ In this yeare Roger of Walden departed this life; who hauing bene tossed vp and downe with sundrie changes of fortune, tried in a short time how incessant, vncertaine, variable, wandering, vnsable, and flitting the is; which when he is thought firmelie to stand, the slippinglie falleth; and with a dissembling loke counterfaitefeth false ioies. For by the means of hir changeablenesse, the said Roger of a poore fellow, grew vp to be high lord treasurer of the realme, and shortly after archbishop of Canturburie; but by what right, the world knoweth, considering that the lord Thomas Arundell was then liuing. Anon after he was deposed from his dignitie, and lead the life of an ordinarie priuat man a long time; within a while after againe he was promoted and made bishop of London, which se he had not possessed a full yeare, but was depriued, and Nicholas Bobinwith succeeded in his roome. So that hereby men are taught not to be proud of their preferment, nor to reckon of them as of perpetuities, sithens they may be as sone dispossessed as possessed of them; and for that all estates & degrees depend vpon Gods power and prouidence, whereof the poet diuinelie saith,

Ludit in humanis diuina potentia rebus, Et certam praesens vix habet hora fidem.

In this yeare the seventh of Maie was Thomas Langlie consecrated bishop of Durham after the decease of Walter Skirlow. In which place he continued one and thirtie yeares. He among other his beneficall deeds beautified the church of Durham for euer with a chanterie of two chapelnes. Besides which for the increase of learning (wherewith himselfe was greatlie furnished) he built two scholes, the one for grammar to instruct youth, whereby in following time they might be made moze able to benefit themselves and serue their countrie; and the other of musick, wherein children might be made apt to serue God and the church, both which scholes he erected in a parcell of ground commonlie called The plate greene. To which buildings (for he was one that delighted much therein, and like vnto the philosopher Anaxagoras supposed that there was not any moze earthlie felicitie, than to erect sumptuous palaces, whereby after their death the memorie of the founders might haue continuance) he added manie sumptuous parts of the palace of Durham. In the towne whereof he did also from the ground (of most stately stone) erect a new gaole with the gate-house to the same, in that place where of old it remained, and then by iniurie of time fallen downe and consumed. This man inioined the see of Durham almost the whole time of three kings, that is, about six yeares and six moneths in the time of Henrie the fourth, nine yeares and five moneths in the time of Henrie the fifth, and fiftene yeares in the time of Henrie the sixth; during the gouernment of all which princes, he was all his life time highly esteemed and reuerenced for his singular wisdome, and for the great authoritie he bare in publike, betwene whome and the maior of Newcastell arose great contention, about a bridge called Tinebridge in the towne of Gateshead or Coteshead, in Latine called Caput caprae. But in the yeare of our redemption 1416, and of Henrie the fifth, the fourth, and of his bishopricke the eleuenth, this bishop had the recouerie thereof, as appeareth by the letter of atturme of the said bishop, made to diuerse to take possession of the same.

bris, anno pontificatus nostri undecimo.*

According whereunto in the said yeare, possession was delivered in the presence of these persons, whose names I thinke not vnnmeet for their posterities cause to be remembred, being persons of god credit and of antiquitie, that is to saie, John Lomelle, Rafe Cwate, Robert Hilton, William Fulthrop, William Tempest, Thomas Suerties, Robert Cogniers, William Clarton shiriffe of Durham, Robert de Egle, John Bertram, John Wiberington, and John Middleton knights of Northumberland, Christopher Porlie, Will. Dinunderlaw knights of Westmerland; and also in the presence of these es-quiers, Robert Hilton, Robert Cwate, William Bolwes, John Coniers, William Lampton the elder, John de Porzen, William Lampton the younger, Hugh Worunghell, John Battlie, William Bellingham, Robert Belthis, Henrie Talboies; Thomas Carbois, John de Hutton, William Hutton, Thomas Coker of Ffisburyne, and sune others. This bithop also procured certeine liberties from the pope in the church of Durham, by vertue of which grant they which were excommunicate (and might not in-ioy the pynilege of any sacraments, in other places throughout the bishopprie) should yet baptise their children in a font of that church, in an especiall place appointed therefore, and also receive the other sacraments there to be administered unto them. He died the eight and twentieth of Nouember in the yeare of our redemption 1437, and was buried in the church of Durham in the chanterie which he had before erected. Before whose death at his manour of Holston he builded all the west gates there of goodlie stone and lime, with the chambers thereto belonging on which he placed his armes.]

1407
The duke of Blenche besieged the towne in Calcuigne.

The duke of Blenche hauing leuied a mightie armie, had besieged the towne of Burge and Blaie in Calcuigne, meaning with force to win the same; but so it fortunied, that for the space of eight weekes together, there passed not one date without tempest of raime, snow, and haille, mixed with winds and lightnings, which killed aswell men as cattell, by reason whereof he lost (as was reported) six thousand men, so that he was constrained to breake up his camps from before both those towne, and to get him awaie with dishonor, for all his brags and boasts made at his first coming thither. The sametime, Henrie Daie and certeine other persons of the fine ports, with fiftene ships, toke an hundred and twentie pises, which laie at anchor in and about the coast of Britaine, laden with iron, salt, oyle, & Roshell wines.

Henrie Daie
a valiant sea man.

In this season also billes were set up in diuerse places of London; and on the doore of Bailes church, which was conteneid, that king Richard being aline and in health, should come thither with great magnificence & powder to recouer againe his kingdome: but the contriner of this deuise was quicklie found out, apprehended, and punished according to his demerits. The cite of London this yeare in the summer was so infected with pestilent mortali-tie, that the king durst not repaire thither, nor come neare to it. Whereupon he being at the castell of Leeds in Kent, and departing from thence, toke ship at Quinburgh in the Ile of Shepie, to saile ouer vnto Lae in Essex, and so to go to Blaschie, there to passe the time till the mortalitie was ceased.

As he was vpon the sea, certeine French pirates which laie lurking at the Thames mouth to watch for some prete, got knowledge by some meanes (as was supposed) of the kings passage, and thereupon as he was in the midst of his course, they entred among his fleet, and toke foure vessels next to the kings ship, and in one of the same vessels sir Thomas Kampston the kings vicechamberlaine, with all his chamber stufte and apparell. They followed the king so neere, that if his ship had not bene swift, he had landed sooner in France than in Essex: but such was his god hap, that he escaped and arrived at his appointed port. The lord Camois, that was commanded with certeine ships of warre to waite the king ouer (whether the wind turned so that he could not keepe his direct course, or that his ship was but a slug) ran so far in the kings displeasure, that he was attached & indited, for that (as was surmized against him) he had practised with the Frenchmen, that the king might by them haue bene taken in his passage.

We haue heard that the pope by vertue of his pro-uision had given the archbishopricke of Yorke vnto maister Robert Halom; but the king was so offended therewith, that the said Robert might in no wise inioy that benefice, and so at length, to satisfie the kings pleasure, maister Henrie Bolwet was translated from Bath vnto Yorke, and maister Robert Halom was made bishop of Salisburie then void by remouing of Henrie Chichelle to S. Dauides. The lord Henrie prince of Wales this yeare in the summer season besieged the castell of Abrukswith, and constrained them within to compound with him vnder certeine conditions for truce; but the prince was no sooner from thence departed, but that Owen Glendouer by subtil craft entered the castell, put out the keepers, and charging them with treason for concluding an agreement without his consent, placed other in that forte to defend it to his life.

About the feast of the Assumption of our ladie, that ancient warriour and worthy knight sir Robert Knols departed this life: he was (as before ye haue heard) borne of meane parentage; but growen into such estimation for his ballant prowesse, as he was thought meet to haue the leading of whole armies, and the rule and government of large prouinces. For not long before his decesse, he being gouernour of Aquitaine, incumbered with age, resigned his office vnto sir Thomas Belfort, a right ballant capteine, and therewith returned into England, where he died at a manour place of his in Northfolke, & from thence brought to London in a litter, with great pompe and much torch light, was buried in the church of Whitefriars in Fleetstreet by the ladie Constance his wife, where was done for him a solemne obsequie, with a great feast, and liberall dole to the poore.

Besides the diuerse noble exploits, and famous warlike enterprises atchued by this ballant sonne of Mars, he (to continue the perpetuall memorie of his name) builded the brydge of Rochester, ouer the riuer of Medwaite with a chappell at the end thereof; he repared also the bodie of the church of the Whitefriars where he was buried, which church was first founded by the ancestor of the lord Greie of Codner. He also founded a college of secular priests at Dorset, and did manie other things in his life right commendable. Sir Thomas Kampston constable of the tower was drowned, in coming from the court as he would haue shut the brydge, the streame being so big, that it ouerturned his barge. This yeare the twentieth of October began a parlement holden at Glocester, but remoued to London as shoulde appere in November; for (as we find) in that moneth this yere 1407, and ninth of this kings reigne, a subside was granted by authoritie of a parlement then assembled at London, to be leuied through the whole realme.

The lord Camois was arreigned the last of October, before Edmund earle of Kent that daie high steward of England, and by his peeres acquit of the offense, whereof he had bene indicted (as before we haue heard) and so dismissed at the barre, was restored againe both to his goods, lands, and offices. This yere the winter was exceeding sharpe through frost and snow that continued & couered the ground by all the moneths of December, Januarie, Februarie, and March, inasmuch that thrushes, blackbirds, and manie thousand birds of the like smaller size, perished with verie cold and hunger.

The earle of Northumberland, and the lord Bardolfie, after they had bene in Wales, in France and Flanders, to purchase aid against king Henrie, were returned backe into Scotland, and had remained there now for the space of a whole yere: and as their euill fortune would, whilst the king held a counsell of the nobilitie at London, the said earle of Northumberland and lord Bardolfie, in a dismall houre, with a great power of Scots returned into England, recouering diuerse of the earls castles and seignories, for the people in great numbers resorted vnto them. Wherevpon incouraged with hope of good successe, they entred into Yorkeshire, & there began to destroe the countrie. At their coming to Threlke, they published a proclamation, signifieng that they were come in comfort of the English nation, as to releue the common-wealth, willing all such as loved the libertie of their countrie, to repaire vnto them, with their armor on their backs, and in defensible wise to assist them.

The king advertised hereof, caused a great armie to be assembled, and came forward with the same towards his enemies: but per the king came to Nottingham, sir Thomas, or (as other copies haue) Rafe Rokefrie shiriffe of Yorkeshire, assembled the forces of the countrie to resist the earle and his power, committing to Grimbaut biggs, beside Banerborough, there to stop them the passage; but they returning aside, got to Weatherbie, and so to Tadcaster, and finally came forward vnto Barmham more, nere to Haiselwood, where they chose their ground meet to fight vpon. The shiriffe was as readie to giue battell as the earle to receiue it, and so with a standard of S. George speyd, set fiercelie vpon the earle, who vnder a standard of his owne armes encountred his aduersaries with great manhood. There was a sore incounter and cruell conflict betwixt the parties: but in the end the victorie fell to the shiriffe. The lord Bardolfie was taken, but sore wounded, so that he shortly after died of the hurts. As for the earle of Northumberland, he was slaine outright: so that now the prophesie was fulfilled, which gaue an inkling of this his heauie hap long before; namely,

Stirps Persicina periet confusa ruina.

For this earle was the stocke and maine root of all that were left aliue called by the name of Persie; and of manie more by diuerse slaughters dispatched: for whose misfortune the people were not a little sorrie, making report of the gentlemen valiantnesse, renowne, and honour, and applieng vnto him certeine lamentable verses out of Lucane, his taleng:

Sei nos nec sanguis, nec tantum vulnera nostri Affecere senis; quantum gestata per urbem Ora ducis, quæ transfixa deformis pile Vidimus.

For his head, full of slaer hoxie heares, being put vpon a stake, was openlie carried through London, and set vpon the bridge of the same cite: in like manner was the lord Bardolfie. The bishop of Bangor was taken and pardoned by the king, for that when he was apprehended, he had no armor on his backe. This battell was fought the nineteenth day of Februarie. The king to purge the North parts of all rebellion, and to take order for the punishment of those that were accused to haue succoured and assisted the earle of Northumberland, went to York, where when manie were condemned, and diuerse put to great fines, and the countrie brought to quietnesse, he caused the abbat of Hailes to be hanged, who had bene in armour against him with the fore-said earle.

In the beginning of March, the king sent Edmund Holland earle of Kent with an armie of men imbarked in certeine ships of warre vnto the sea, because he had knowledge that diuerse rowers were waxing about the coasts of this land, and did much hurt. When the earle had ferched the coasts, and could meet with no enimie abroad, he was aduertised by spies, that the pirats hearing of his coming to sea, were withdrawne into Britaine: therefore the said earle intending to be reuenged on them, whome he sought, directed his course thither, and finding that they had laid by their ships in the haucens, so as he could not fight with them by sea, he lanchd out his boats, and with his fierce soldiers toke land, and manfullie assaulted the towne of Bysake standing by the sea side. They within stoutlie defended themselves, doing their best to repell the Englishmen, with throwing darts, casting stones, and shooting quarels; in which conflict the earle receiued a wound in his head, so that he died thereof within five daies after.

The Englishmen not dismayed with his death, but the more desirous to obtaine their purpose, continued their assaults, till by fine force they entered the towne, set it on fire, and slue all that made resistance; and after for want of a generall to command what should be done, they being pestered with priees and prisoners, returned into England. The countesse of Kent that was daughter (as we haue heard) to Bernabo viscount lord of Millaine, having no issue by hir husband, was now moued by the king after hir husbands death, to marrie with his ballard brother the earle of Dorset, a man verie aged and euill vsaged; wherevpon the misliking him, meant rather to satiffie hir owne fantasie, and therefore chose for hir husband Henrie Portmer, a yowle young bacheller, by whom she had issue a daughter named Anne, married to sir John Astobemond.

This yere, the next daie after the feast daie of Marie Magdalen, in a counsell holden at London by the cleergie, the doctors of the vniuersities of Cambridge and Orenford being there, with the rest assembled, debated the matter, whether they ought to withdraw from the pope, payments of monte, and their accustomed obedience, considering that contrarie to his word and promise so solemnlie made, and with an oth confirmed, he withdraw himselfe from the place where he (according to covenants) shoulde haue bene present, to aduance an agreement and concord in the church. Upon the read of the statute of our ladie, there chanced such floods through abundance of raue, as the like had not bene sent afore by any man then liuing. Also about the feast of All saints, the cardinal of Burges came into England, to informe the king and the cleergie of the constant dealing of pope Gregorie, in like manner as he had informed the French king and the French men, to the end that he might persuaide both these kings, pope Gregorie might be induced to obserue and per-forme that oth, which he had receiued, so as by the roalleged) following the aduise of the learned men of the vniuersities of Paris, Bologna, Orleans, Tho-ing schisme, determined to obeie neither the one nor the other that contended for the papacie, vntill peace

An extract of the kings letter to pope Gregorie.

Oft holie father, if the seat apostolicall would boushale by prouidence to consider, how great dangers haue inuaded the whole world vnder the pretext of schisme, and speciallie the slaughter of christian people, which is of aboute two hundred thousand (as it is auouched) by the outrage of warres and battell sproung by in sundrie parts of the world; & now late-lie to the number of thirtie thousand (by meanes of the dissention about the bishop-ricke of Leodes betwene two, one contending vnder the authoritie of true pope, and the other vnder the title of antipope) slaine in a foughten field, whereof we make report with græte; truite the said seat would be penitue in spirit, & with due sorrow troubled in mind, yea at the motion of a good conscience, it would rather giue ouer the honour of that apostolicall seat, than suffer such detestable deeds further to be committed, vnder the cloke of dissimulation, taking example of the true and naturall mother, which pleading before king Salomon, chose rather to part with hir owne child, than to see him cut in sunder. And although by that new creation of nine cardinals, against your oth (that we maie ble the words of others) made by you, wher-of a belement cause of wondering is risen, it maie in some sort be supposed (as it is likelie) that your intent respecterly not anie end of schisme; yet farre be it alwaies from the world, that your circumspect seat should be charged by anie person with so great inconstancie of mind, whereby the last errour might be counted worse than the first, &c.

An extract of the said kings letter to the cardinals.

Being desirous to shew how great zeale we had, & haue, that peace might be granted & giuen to the church by the consent of the states of our realme, haue sent ouer our letters to our lord the pope, according to the tenure of a copie inclosed within these presents effectualle to be executed.
Wherefore we doe earnestlie beseech the reuerend college of you; that if happilie the said Gregorie be present at the generall counsell holden at Pisa, about the yielding by of the papacie, according to the promise and oth by him manie a time made, to fulfill your and our desires, as we with and beare our selues in hand he will do; that you will so order things concerning his estate, that thereby God maie cheerlie be pleased, and as well Gregorie himselfe, as we, who deseruedlie doe tender his honour and commoditie with all our harts, maie be beholden to giue you and euerie of you manifold thanks.

This yeare certeine learned men in Oxford and other places, publielie in their sermons maintained and set forth the opinions and conclusions of Wic-cliffe. This troubled the bishops and other of the clergie sore, inasmuch that in their conuocation house, the six and twentieth of June, by a speciall mandat of the lord chancellor in presence of the procurators, regents, and others, as Richard Courtenie, Richard Talbot, Nicholas Zouch, Walter Spibford, & such like in great multitude: sentence was pronounced by John Wels, doctor of the canon law against the books of John Wiccliffe doctor of diuinitie, intituled De sermone in monte, Triologorum de simonia, De perfectione statuum, De ordine christiano, De gradibus cleri ecclesie: and to these was added the third treatise, which he compiled of logike or sophistrie. These books and the conclusions in the same contained, the chancellor of the vniuersitie of Oxford by common consent and assent of the regents and non regents of the same vniuersitie, reprinted, disanulled and condemned, inhibiting on paine of the great curse and deprivation of all degrees scholasticall, that none from thenceforth should affirme, teach, or preach by anie manner of nicenes or waies, the same hereticall books (as they tearmed them) containing ante the like opinions as he taught and set forth in the same books.

lismen defendants. The Welsh rebell Owen Glendower made an end of his wretched life in this tenth yeare of king Henrie his reigne, being dylent now in his latter time (as we find recozded) to such miserie, that in manner despairing of all comfort, he fled into desert places and solitarie caues, where being destitute of all reliefe and succour, dreadding to shew his face to anie creature, and finallie lacking meat to susteine nature, for more hunger and lacke of food, miserable pined awhile and died. This yeare Thomas Beaufort earle of Surrie was made chan-celloz, and Henrie Scrope lord treasurer. A parlement began this yeare in the quindene of saint Vi-larie, in which the commons of the lower house erbitated a bill to the king and lordz of the upper house, containing effect as followeth.

A supplication to the king.

The most excellent lord our K. and to all the nobles in this present parlement assembled, your faithfull commons doo humble signifie, that our souereigne lord the king might haue of the temporall possessions, lands & reuenues which are leuodlie spent, consumed and wasted by the bishops, ab-bats, and priors, within this realme, so much in value as would suffice to find and susteine one hundred and fiftie earles, one thousand & five hundred knights, six thousand and two hundred esquierz, and one hundred hospitals more than now be.

The king (as some write) upon advised consideration hereof had, misliked of the motion, & thereupon commanded that from thenceforth they should not presume to studie about anie such matters. An other thing the commons sued to haue granted vnto them, but could not obtaine: which was, that cleriks con-uicted should not from thence forth be deliuered to the bishops prison. Whereupon they demanded to haue the statute either reuoked, or qualified, which had bene established by authoritie of parlement, in the second yeare of this kings reigne, against such as were reputed to be heretiks, or Lollards. By force whereof it was provided, that wheresoeuer such manner of persons should be found and knowne to preach or teach their erroneous doctrine, they should be attached with the kings writ, and brought to the next goale: but the king seemed so highlie to fauour the clergie, that the commons were answered plainelie, they should not come by their purpose, but rather that the said statute should be made more rigorous and sharpe for the punishment of such persons.

During this parlement one John Babbie a tailor, or (as some write) a smith, being convicted of heresie, was brought into Smithfield, and there in a tun or pipe burnt to death, in pittifull manner. The kings eldest sonne the lord Henrie prince of Wales being present, offered him his pardon, first before the fire was kindled, if he would haue recanted his opinions; and after when the fire was kindled, hearing him make a roying noise verie pittifullie, the prince caused the fire to be plucked backe, and exhorting him being with pittifull paine almost dead, to remember himselfe, and renounce his opinions, promising him not onelie life, but also three pence a daie so long as he liued to be paid out of the kings coffers: but he hauing recouered his spirits againe, refused the princes offer, chosing eithers to tast the fire, and so to die, than to forsake his opinions. Whereupon the Henrie the fourth.

prince commanded, that he should be put into the tun againe, from thenceforth not to haue axie fa-uour or pardon at all, and so it was done, and the fire put to him againe, and he consumed to ashes.

The king demanded in this parlement, that it might be granted to him, to haue euerie yeare in which he held no parlement a tenth of the cleargie, and a fiftenth of the laitie; but the estates would not agre thereto, by reason whereof, the parlement continued till almost the middle of Maie. At length they granted to giue him a fiftenth, not without great murmuring and grudging of the commonaltie. About this season died the lord Thomas Beauford earle of Surrie. The eleuenth of Aprill or thereabouts, the towne of saint Omers was burnt by casuall fire together with the abbey, in which towne was such strange and marvellous prouision of engines, and all manner of furniture and preparation for the winning of Calis, as the like had neuer bene seene nor heard of. Some write, that they of Calis standing in doubt of such pueruenance, & great preparation deuised to annoie them, procured a young man to kindle a fire, whereby all that bread-full prouision was consumed to ashes, and so they with in Calis deliuered of a great deale of care and feare which they had thereof.

¶ But Tho. Walsingham maketh a full & complet declaration both concerning the dukes deuise, & also of the Calestians deliuerance from the danger of the same; which because it perfecteth the report of this present matter, I haue thought good to set downe word for word as I find it in his Hypodigme. About the ninth of Aprill (saith he) the towne of saint Audou-mare was burned with the abbey, wherein was hidden and laid up the execrable prouision of the duke of Burgognie, who had vowed either to destroe the towne of Calis, or else to subdue it to the will and pleasure of the French. There a great manie engines to this daie no where seene, there an exceeding sort of vessels containing poison in them were kept in store, which he had aforehand provided to cast out to the destruction of the said towne. For he had gathered together serpents, scorpions, todes, and other kinds of venemous things, which he had closed and shut up in little barrells, that when the flesh or substance of those noisome creatures was rotten, and dissolved into fil-thie matter, he might laie siege to Calis, and cast the said barrells let out of engines into the towne, which with the violence of the thow being dashed in peeces, might choke them that were within, poison the barnelled men touched therewith, & with their scattered venem infect all the streets, lanes, & passages of the towne. In the meane time, a certeine pong man allured with couetousnesse of gold, or lead with affection and loue towards the kings towne, asked of the gouernours what reward he should deserue, that would discharge and set free the towne from so great a feare, and would burne all the prouision which they suspected. Hereupon they leuied a summe of that yellow metall (namelie gold) where with the pongman contented, went his waie, and with fire ready made for the purpose, did not onelie burne the said venemous matter and infected stuffe, but also together with the monasterie almost the whole towne.

Whereupon this yeare Sir Robert Umfravill vice admirall of England, ambused the countreies on the sea coasts of Scotland: for comming into the Forth with ten shippes of warre; and being there fourtene daies together, he landed euerie daie on the shoore of the river of the other, taking yvelles, shoules & prisoners; where standing the duke of Albanie, and the earle Douglas were readie there, with a great powder to resist him: he burnt the galliot of Scotland (being a ship of great account) with manie oyl & bes-sele lieng the same time at the Blackenesh ouer a gainst Leth. At his returne from thence, he brought with him fourtene good ships, and manie other great piles of cloathes, both wollen, and linnen, pitch, tarre, wood, flower, meale, wheat and rie, which be sold abroad, the markets were well holpen thereby, so that his surname of Robert Spendmarket seemed verie well to agree with his qualities, which name he got by this occasion.

About foure years before this, he burnt the towne of Poppel on the market daie, causing his men to meat the cloathes which they got there with their bowes, & so to sell them atwaie, whereupon the Scots named him Robert Spendmarket. Shortly after his returne from the sea now in this eleuenth yeare of king Henries reigne, he made a roade into Scotland by land, hauing with him his nephue young Gilbert Amfrevill earle of Angus (commonlie called earle of Baine) being then but fourtene yeares of age, and this was the first time that the said earle spread his banner. They burnt at that time Jedworth, and the most part of Wintdale. This yeare there died of the bloudie sir in the citie of Burdeaur fourtene thousand persons, and so fore raged that disease in Gascoigne and Guien, that there wanted people to dresse their vines, and presse their grapes.

John Brendergest knight, & William Long scowred the seas, so as no pirat durst appeare, but that merchants & passengers might passe to & fro in safetie. But yet through disdain of some that envied their good successe, the same Brendergest and Long were accused of robberies which they should practise, in spoling such ships as they met with, of diuerse things against the owners wils. Brendergest was drinen to take sanctuary at Westminster, and could not be suffered to lodge in anie mans house for feare of the kings displeasure, commanding that none should receive him, and so was constrained to set by a tent within the porch of saint Peters church there, and to haue his seruants to watch nightlie about him for doubt to be murdered of his aduersaries: but his associat William Long late still at the sea, till the lord admirall hauing prepared certeine vessels went to the sea himselfe in person to fetch him: but yet he could not catch him untill he had promised him pardon, and undertaken vpon his fidelitie that he should haue no harme: but notwithstanding all promises, vpon his comming in he was shut vp fall in the Tower, and so for a time remained in duerance. The archbishop of Canturburie minding in this season to visit the vniuersitie of Oxenford, could not be suffered, in consideration of priuileges which they pretended to haue.

The realme of France in this meane while was disquieted, with the two factions of Burgognie and Dyleance, in most miserable wise, as in the French histories it maie further appeare. Neither could the king, being a lunaticke person, and feeble of bzaime, take any full order for reforming of such mischeifs, so that the whole state of the kingdome was maruellouslie brought in decaie: neither toke those troubles end by the death of the duke of Dyleance (murdered at length through the practise of the duke of Burgognie) but rather more perillouslie increased. For the young duke of Dyleance Charles, sonne to duke Lewis thus murdered, alied himselfe with the dukes of Berrie and Bourbon, and with the earles of Alansson & Arminache, whereby he was so stronglie banded against the duke of Burgognie, whom he defied as his mostail so and enemie, that the duke of Burgognie fearing the sequels of the matter, thought good (because there was a motion of marriage betwixt the prince of Wales & his daughter) to require aid of king Henrie, who foreseeing that this ciuill discorde in France (as it after hapned) might turne his realme to honoz and profit, sent to the duke of Burgognie, Thomas earle of Arundell, Gilbert Amfrevill earle of Angus (commonlie called the earle of Baine) sir Robert Amfrevill, vncle to the same Gilbert, sir John Oldcastell lord Cobham, sir John Greie, and William Doxter, with twelue hundred archers.

They toke shipping at Douer, & landed at Blois, from whence with speedie iourneys in the latter end of this twelfth yeare of king Henries reigne they came to Arras, where they found the duke of Burgognie, of whom they were isisfullie receiued, & from thence he appointed them to go vnto Peron, where he assembled a power also of his owne subiects, and remouing from thence, he marched through the countrie, by Roie, Bretueil, Beaunois, and Gisors, till he came with his armie vnto Dontois, where he remained about the space of thre weeks. From Dontois the two and twentieth of October, the duke of Burgognie marched towards Paris, and passing the river of Saine at Pont Meulene, he staid not till he came to Paris, into the which he entered the 23 of October, late in the evening. The duke of Dyleance laic at the same time at saint Denis, with the more part of his armie, & the residue kept the towne of S. Clou, where a bridge late ouer the river of Saine. On the 9 of November, with hard & sharpe fight the Englishmen gat the towne of saint Clou, with the bridge, slue & downed nine hundred souldiours that were set there to defend that passage, besides 400 that were taken prisoners. They toke also about 12 hundred horses, which they found in the towne, with great riches, whereof the men of warre made their profit.

Among other prisoners, sir Panferd de Bos a valiant capteine was taken, and shortly after put to death, as diuerse other were, which the Burgognians bought of the Englishmen that had taken them prisoners. The tower that stood at the end of the bridge could not be wone. At an other bickering also, it chanced that the Englishmen, vnder the leading of the earle of Angus or Baine, had the vpper hand, and toke manie prisoners, whom the duke of Burgognie would that they should haue bene likewise put to death as traitors to their countrie, but the said earle of Angus answered for himselfe, and the residue of the Englishmen, that they would rather die all in the place, than suffer their prisoners to be viled otherwise than as men of war ought to be, that is, to haue their liues saued, and to be ransomed according as the law of armes required, and by that meanes they were preserved. The duke of Burgognie hauing the world at will (for the duke of Dyleance immediatlie after the losse of saint Clou, departing from saint Denis, got him into the high countries) sent home the Englishmen with hartie thanks, and great rewards.

This yeare, the king created his brother Thomas Beauford earle of Dorset, and his sonne the lord Thomas of Lancaster, that was lord steward of England, and earle of Aubemarke, he created duke of Clarence. John duke of Burgognie, hauing now the gouernance both of the French king and his realme, so persecuted the duke of Dyleance and his complacers, that finally they for their last refuge required aid of king Henrie, sending ouer vnto him certeine persons as their lawfull procurators (of the which one was called Albert Aubemont, a man of great wit, learning, & audacitie) to offer in name of the confederates vnto the said king Henrie and to his sonnes, certeine conditions, which were made and concluded the yeare of our Lord 1412, the eight of Aprile. The names of the chiefe confederats were these, John duke of Berrie and earle of Boitou, Charles duke of Dyleance, and Walois erle of Blois, and Beaumont lord of Coucie and Ach, John duke of Bourbon, and Antiergne earle of Clearmont forest, and Lisle lord of Beaulieu, and Casseau Chinon, John duke of Aranson, Barnard earle of Arminacke, and others. The effect of the articles which these confederats were agreed vpon touching their offer to the king of England, were as followeth.

The articles of couenants which they offered to the king of England.

First, they offered their bodies, finances, mylands, to serue the king of England, his heires, and successors, in all iust causes and actions, sauing alwaies their allegiance, knowing that he would not further inquire of them.

2 Secondlie, they offered their sonnes and daughters, naeres and nephews, and all other their kinfolks to be bestowed in marriages according to the pleasure of the king of England.

3 Thirdlie, they offered their castels, towne, treasures, & all their other goods, to serue the said king.

4 Fourthlie, they offered their friends, allies, and well-willers to serue him, being the most part of all the nobles of France, churchmen, clearkes, and honest citizens, as it should well appeare.

5 Fiftlie, they offered to put him in possession of the duchie of Guien, which they were ready to protest to belong vnto the king of England, in like and semblable wise, in libertie and franchises, as any other king of England his predecessor had held and inioied the same.

6 Sixtlie, that they would be ready to recognise the lands which they possessed within that duchie, to hold the same of the king of England, as of the verie true duke of Guien, promising all seruices and homages after the best maner that might be.

7 Seuenthlie, they promised to deliuer vnto the king, as much as laie in them, all towne and castels appertaining to the roialtie and seigniozie of the king of England, which are in number twentie towne and castels: and as to the regard of other towne & fortresses which were not in their hands, they would to the uttermost of their powers, helpe the king of England and his heires to win them out of his aduersaries hands.

8 Eightlie, that the duke of Berrie, as vassall to the king of England, and likewise the duke of Orleans his subiect and vassall, should hold of him by homage and fealtie, the lands and seigniozies hereafter following, that is to saie: the duke of Berrie to hold onelle the countie of Ponthieu during his life, and the duke of Orleans to hold the countie of Angoulesme during his life, and the countie of Perigour to: euer, and the earle of Arminacke to hold foure castels vpon certaine suerties and conditions, as by indenture should be appointed. For the which offers, couenants and agreements, they requested of the king of England to condescend vnto these conditions insuing.

The conditions which they requested of the king of England.

First, that the king of England, as duke of Guien should defend and succor them as he ought to do, against all men, as their verie lord and soueraigne, and speciallie vntill they had executed iustice fullie vpon the duke of Burgognie, for the crime which he committed vpon the person of the duke of Orleans.

2 Secondlie, that he should assist them against the said duke of Burgognie and his fautors, to recouer against their goods, which by occasion of the said duke and his friends they had lost and bene depriued of.

3 Thirdlie, that he should likewise aid them in all iust quarels, for recouering of damages done to their friends, vassalls and subiects.

4 Fourthlie, to helpe and assist them for the concluding and establishing of a firme peace betwixt both the realmes, so far as was possible. And further they besought the king of England to send vnto them eight thousand men, to aid them against the duke of Burgognie and his complices, which daylie procured the French king to make war vpon them, seeking by all waies & meanes how to destitoe them.

The king of England louinglie interteined the messengers, and vpon consideration had of their offers, as well for that he detested the shameful murder of the duke of Orleans (which remained unpunished by support of such as maintained the duke of Burgognie, who as it appeared) would keepe promise no longer than serued his owne turne) as also for that the same offers seemed to make greatlie both for his honor and profit, thought that by the office of a king he was bound in dutie to succour them that cried for iustice, and could not haue it; and namelie sith in right they were his subiects and vassalls, he ought to defend them in maintenance of his superiourtie and seigniozie. Herevpon as duke of Guien, he toke vpon him to succor and defend them against all men, as their verie lord and soueraigne, and so sending aboute the messengers, promised to send them aid verie shortly.

This feat was not so secretlie wrought, but that it was knowne straightwaies in France. Wherefore the French kings counsell sent the earle of Saint Paul downe into Picardie, with sixtene hundred horsemen, and a great number of footmen, who approaching to Guines, attempted to assault the castell, but was repelled and beaten backe, so that he retired to the towne of Saint Quintines, as one that neuer wan gain at the Englishmens hands, but euer departed from them with losse and dishonor. In this meane season the French king being led by the duke of Burgognie, pursued them that toke part with the duke of Orleans, commonlie called Arminacks, and after the winning of diuerse towne he besieged the citie of Burges in Berrie, comming before it vpon saturdaye the eleuenth of June, with a right huge armie. Within this citie were the dukes of Berrie and Bourbon, the earle of Auvergne, the lord Dalbyet, the archbishops of Sens and Burges, the bishops of Paris and Chartres, hailing with them sixtene hundred armed men, and foure hundred archers and arcuballisters.

There were with the king at this siege, his sonne the duke of Aquitaine, otherwise called the Dolphin, the dukes of Burgognie and Bar, and a great number of other earles, lords, knights, and gentlemen; so that the citie was besieged euen till within the faur burges of that side towards Dun le Roie. The siege continued, till at length through mediation of Philibert de Lignac, lord great maister of the Rhodes, and the marshall of Sauoie, that were both in the kings campe, traouelling betwixt the parties, there were appointed commissioners on both sides to treat for peace, to wit the maister of the crossbowes, and the seneschall of Beinalt, and certaine other for the king; and the archbishop of Burges, with the lord of Cau court & others for the Orleantins side. These coming together on a Fridaye, the fifteenth of Iulie in the Dolphin's tent, vied the matter with such discretion, that they concluded a peace, & so on the wednesdaye next following, the campe brake vp, & the king returned.

Whilist these things were a doing in France, the lord

Om. 14. 12.

An. Reg. 13.

The prince of Wales, eldest sonne to king Henric, got knowledge that certeine of his fathers seruants were busie to giue informations against him, whereby discord might arise betwixt him and his father: so they put into the kings head, not onely what euill rule (according to the courte of youth) the prince kept to the offense of manie: but also what great resort of people came to his house, so that the court was nothing furnished with such a traine as daily followed the prince. These tales brought no small suspition into the kings head, least his sonne would presume to blurpe the crowne, he being yet allue, through which suspitions gelousie, it was perceived that he favoured not his sonne, as in times past he had done.

The Prince sore offended with such persons, as by slanderous reports, sought not onely to spot his good name abroad in the realme, but to sove discord also betwixt him and his father, wrote his letters into euerie part of the realme, to reprove all such slanderous deuises of those that sought his discredit. And to cleare himselfe the better, that the world might understand what wrong he had to be slandered in such wise: about the feast of Weter and Paule, to wit, the nine and twentieth daie of June, he came to the court with such a number of noble men and other his friends that wished him well, as the like traine had bene seldome seene repairing to the court at any one time in those daies. He was apparelled in a gowne of blew satten, full of small oilet holes, at euerie hole the needle hanging by a silke thred with which it was sewed. About his arme he wore an hounds collar set full of Ss of gold, and the tirets likewise being of the same metall.

The court was then at Westminster, where he being entred into the hall, not one of his companie durst once advance himselfe further than the fire in the same hall, notwithstanding they were earnestlie requested by the lords to come higher: but they regarding what they had in commandement of the prince, would not presume to do in any thing contrary thereto. He himselfe onely accompanied with those of the kings house, was freight admitted to the presence of the king his father, who being at that time greivously diseased, yet caused himselfe in his chaire to be borne into his priue chamber, where in the presence of three or foure persons, in whom he had most confidence, he commanded the prince to shew what he had to saie concerning the cause of his coming.

The prince kneeling doونه before his father said: Most redoubted and souereigne lord and father, I am at this time come to your presence as your liege man, and as your naturall sonne, in all things to be at your commandement. And where I understand you haue in suspition my demeanour against your grace, you know verie well, that if I knew any man within this realme, of whom you should stand in feare, my dutie were to punish that person, thereby to remoue that grasse from your heart. Then how much more ought I to suffer death, to ease your grace of that grasse which you haue of me, being your naturall sonne and liege man: and to that end I haue this daie made my selfe readie by confession and receiving of the sacrament. And therefore I beseech you most redoubted lord and deare father, for the honour of God, to ease your heart of all such suspition as you haue of me, and to dispatch me here before your knees, with this same dagger [and withall he delivered unto the king his dagger, in all humble reverence: adding further, that his life was not so deare to him, that he wished to liue one daie with his displeasure] and therefore in thus ridding me out of life, and your selfe from all suspition, here in presence of these lords, and before God at the date of the general iudgement, I faithfully protest clealie to forgive you.

The king moued herewith, cast from him the dagger, and embracing the prince kissed him, and with shedding teares confessed, that in deed he had him partly in suspition, though now (as he perceived) not with iust cause, and therefore from thenceforth no misreport should cause him to haue him in mistrust, and this he promised of his honour. So by his great wisdom was the wrongfull suspition which his father had conceived against him removed, and he restored to his fauour. And further, where he could not but greivously complaine of them that had slandered him so greatly, to the defacing not onely of his honoz, but also putting him in danger of his life, he humble besought the king that they might answer their vniust accusation; and in case they were found to haue forged such matters upon a malicious purpose, that then they might suffer some punishment for their faults, though not to the full of that they had deserued. The king seeming to grant his reasonable desire, yet told him that he must tarric a parlement, that such offenders might be punished by iudgement of their peeres: and so for that time he was dismissed, with great loue and signes of fathers affection.

Thus were the father and the sonne reconciled, betwixt whom the said pickthanks had sowne diuision, inasmuch that the sonne upon a vehement conceit of vnkindnesse sprung in the father, was in the waite to be worne out of fauour. Which was the more likelie to come to passe, by their informations that priuily charged him with riot and other vnciuill demeanour vnsuemelie for a prince. Indeed he was youthfullie giuen, grolone to audacitie, and had chosen him companions agreeable to his age; with whom he spent the time in such recreations, exercises, and delights as he fancied. But yet (it should seme by the report of some writers) that his behaviour was not offensive or at least tending to the damage of any bodie; sith he had a care to auoid doing of wrong, and to tedder his affections within the tract of vertue, whereby he opened vnto himselfe a redie passage of good liking among the prudent sort, and was beloued of such as could discern his disposition, which was in no degre so excessive, as that he deserued in such vehement maner to be suspected. In whose dispraise I find little, but to his praise verie much, parcel whereof I will deliuer by the waite as a metyard whereby the residue may be measured. The late poet that versified the warres of the valorous Englishmen, speaking of the issue of Henric the fourth, faith of this prince (among other things) as followeth:

procreo qui natus maximus heres Corpore, progressus cum pubertatis ad annos Esset, res gestas multas iuueniliter audax, Asciscens comites quos par sibi iunxerat etas, Nil tamen iniuste commisit, nil tamen unquam Extra virtutis normam, sapientibus aequè At alijs charum.

About the same time, John Drendergest knight, being restored to the kings fauour, with thirtie ships scotized the seas, toke good prizes of wine and vitels, which releued the commons greatly. Amongst other enterprises, he landed vpon the sudden at Craal on the faire day, toke the towne, and robbed the faire, so as they that were come thither to sell their wares, had quicke utterance and slow payment. King Henric vnderstanding that the french king by setting on of the duke of Burgonie in pursuing the contrary faction, had besieged the cite of Burges (as before we haue heard) determined with all speed to aid the duke of Orleans, & so about the feast of the Assumption tion of our ladie, he sent ouer an armie of eight hundred men of armes, and nine thousand archers, vnder the leading of his second sonne the duke of Clarence accompanied with Edward duke of York, Thomas earle of Dorset, and diuerse other noble men and worthie captains. They landed in the Baie de la Vogue saint Maix, in the countrie of Constantine.

The Englishmen swarmed like bees round about the countrie, robbing and spoiling the same.

Shortlie after their departure from the place where they landed, there came to them six hundred armed men of Gascoignes that were inrolled at Burdeaur.
When newes thereof came to the French court, being then at Auverre, incontinentlie the earles of Arlanfon and Richmond were dispatched to go vnto the English campe, because they had euer bene partakers with the duke of Mleance, to giue them thanks for their paines, and to aduertise them of the peace that had bene latelie concluded betwixt the parties, and therefore to take order with them, that they might be satisfi'd, so as they should not spoile the countrie, as they had begun. But whereas the Englishmen were greedie to haue, and the duke of Mleance was not rich to paie, they marched on towards Guien in good order, and that by sacking of towne, and ransoming of rich prisoners, they got great treasure, and manie good priees and booties.

Being passed the riuer of Loire they spoiled the towne of Beaulieu, and with fire and sword wasted the countie of Touraine and Apaine. The lord de Rambures appointed to resist such violence, was easily vanquished. Whereouer, to the aid of the duke of Mleance, the king of England sent ouer to Calis the earls of Kent and Warwick, with two thousand fighting men, which spoiled and wasted the countrie of Bullennois, burnt the towne of Samer de Bois, and toke with assault the fortreffe of Kussalt, and di-uerse other. This yeare, the king abased the coines of his gold and silver, causing the same to be currant in this realme, at such value as the other was valued before, where indeed the noble was worse by foure pence than the former, and so likewise of the silver, the coines whereof he appointed to be currant after the same rate. In this yeare, and vpon the twelfth day of October, were three flouds in the Thames, the one following vpon the other, nobbing betwene: which thing no man then liuing could remember the like to be seene.

In this kings time, and in the eighth yeare of his reigne (as Richard Grafton hath recorded) a worthie citizen of London named Richard Whittington, mercator and alderman, was elected maior of the said citie, and bare that office three times. This man so bestowed his goods and substance, that he hath well de-serued to be registred in chronicles. First he erected one house or church in London to be a house of prayer, and named the same after his owne name, Whittington college, remaining at this date. In the said church, besides certeine preests and clerks, he placed a number of poore aged men and women, and allowed for them houses and lodgings, and allowed them wood, coles, cloth, and weeklie monie to their great reliefe and comfort. This man also at his owne cost builded the gate of London called Newgate in the yeare of our Lord 1422, which before was a most oug-lie and lothsome prison. He also builded more than the halfe of S. Bartholomews hospitall in west Smithfield. He builded likewise the beautiful librarie in the grate friers in London now called Christs hospitall, standing in the north part of the cloister thereof, where in the wall his armes be grauen in stone. He also builded for the ease of the maior of London, his heir, and the worthiefull citizens, on the solempne daies of their assemblie, a chapel adioining to the Guildhall; to the intent that before they entered in to any of their worlde affaires, they should begin with prayer and invocation to God for his assistance: at the end ioining to the south part of the said chapel, he builded for the citie a librarie of stone, for the custodie of their records and other booke. He also builded a great part of the east end of Guildhall, and did manie other good deeds worthie of imitation. By a writing of his mans owne hand, which he willed to be kept as a schedule to his last will and testament, it appeareth that a pitifull and relenting heart he had at other mens miseries, and did not onlie with but also did what he could procure for their releefe. In so much that he charged and commanded his executors, as they would answer before God at the daie of the resurrection of all flesh, that if they found any debtoz of his, whome if in conscience they thought not to be well worth three times as much as they owght him, and also out of other mens debt, and well able to paie, that then they should neuer demand it; for he clearlie forgave it: and that they should put no man in late for any debt due to him.

A worthie memorie of a notable minded gentleman.

We haue heard how the duke of Clarence and his armie did much hurt in the realme of France, in places as he passed: whereupon at length, the duke of Mleance being earnestlie called vpon to dispatch the Englishmen out of France, according to an article comprised in the conclusion of the peace, he came to the duke of Clarence, rendering to him and his armie a thousand gramercies, and disbursed to them as much monie as he or his friends might easily spare; and for the rest being two hundred and nine thousand frankes remaining unpaid, he deliuered in gage his second brother, John duke of Angouleme, which was grandfather to king Francis the first, that reigned in our daies, sir Sparcell de Burges, and sir John de Samoures, sir Archembald Willers, and di-uerse other, which earle continued long in England, as after shall appeare. When this agreement was thus made betwixt the dukes of Mleance and Clarence, the English armie with rich priees, booties and prisoners came to Burdeaur, making warre on the frontiers of France, to their great gaine. In this meane while, the lord of Helie, one of the marshals of France, with an armie of foure thousand men, besieged a certeine fortreffe in Guien, which an English knight, one sir John Blunt kept, who with three hundred men that came to his aid, discomfited, chaged, and ouerthrew the French polver, toke prisoners twelue men of name, and other gentlemen to the number of six score, and amongst other, the said marshall, who was sent ouer into England, and put in the castell of Calicebet, from whence he escaped, and got ouer into France, where seruing the duke of Mle-ance at the battell of Agincourt, he was slaine among other.

In this fourteenth and last yeare of king Henries reigne, a counsell was holden in the white friers in London, at the which, among other things, order was taken for ships and gallies to be builded and made readie, and all other things necessarie to be provided for a boiage which he meant to make into the holle land, there to recouer the citie of Jerusalem from the Infidels. For it grewed him to consider the great malice of christian princes, that were bent vpon a mischievous purpose to destruye one another, to the perill of their owne soules, rather than to make war against the enemies of the christian faith, as in conscience (it seemed to him) they were bound. He held his Christmas this yeare at Eltham, being sore ver-ed with sicknesse, so that it was thought sometime that he had bene dead : notwithstanding it pleased God that he somwhat recovered his strength againe, and so passed that Christmasse with as much joy as he might.

The morrow after Candlemas daie began a par-lement, which he had called at London, but he departed this life before the same parlement was ended : for now that his provisions were readie, and that he was furnished with sufficient treasure, soldiers, captains, vittels, munitions, tall ships, strong galleies, and all things necessarie for such a roiall iournie as he pretended to take into the holie land, he was effsones taken with a soze sicknesse, which was not a leprossie, Striken by the hand of God (saith maister Hall) as folish friers imagined; but a verie apoplexie, of the which he languished till his appointed houre, and had none other græse nor maladie; so that what man ordeineth, God altereth at his good will and pleasure, not giving place moze to the pzince, than to the po-rest creature living, when he seeth his time to dispose of him this waie or that, as to his omnipotent power and diuine prouidence seemeth expedient. During this his last sicknesse, he caused his crowne (as some write) to be set on a pillow at his beds head, and suddenly his pangs so soze troubled him, that he laie as though all his vitall spirits had bene from him departed. Such as were about him, thinking verelie that he had bene departed, couered his face with a linnen cloth.

The pzince his sonne being hereof aduertised, entered into the chamber, toke a waie the crowne, and departed. The father being suddenlie reuiued out of that trance, quicklie perceiued the lacke of his crowne; and hauing knowledge that the pzince his sonne had taken it a waie, caused him to come before his presence, requiring of him what he meant so to misuse himselfe. The pzince with a god audacitie answered, Sir, to mine and all mens iudgements you seemed dead in this world, wherefore I as your next heire apparant toke that as mine owne, and not as yours. Well saie sonne (said the king with a great sigh) what right I had to it, God knoweth. Well (said the pzince) if you die king, I will haue the garland, and trust to keepe it with the sword against all mine enemies, as you haue done. Then said the king, I commit all to God, and remember you to do well.
With that he turned himselfe in his bed, and hostlie after departed to God in a chamber of the abbats of Westminster called Jerusalem, the twentieth daie of March, in the yeare 1413, and in the yeare of his age 46, when he had reigned thirteene yeares, five mo-neths and 08 daies, in great perplexitie and little pleasure [for fouretene yeares, as some haue noted, who name not the disease whereof he died, but refer it to sicknesse absolutelie, whereby his time of departure did approach and fetch him out of the world: as Ch. Orl. saith, whose words may serue as a funerall epigramme in memorie of the said king Henrie :

Henricus quartus his septem rexerat annos Anglorum gentem summa cum laude & amore, longa senectutis fatalis terminus aui Ingruuerat, morbus fatalem accerserat horam.]

Well find, that he was taken with his last sick-nesse, while he was making his prayers at saint Cowards shrine, there as it were to take his leaue, and so to proceed forth on his iournie: he was so sudden-lie and greuouslie taken, that such as were about him, feared least he would haue died presentlie, wherefore to relæue him (if it were possible) they bare him into a chamber that was next at hand, belonging to the abbat of Westminster, where they laid him on a pallet before the fire, and vsed all remedies to reuie him. At length, he recovered his speech, and understanding and perceiuing himselfe in a strange place which he knew not, he willed to know if the chamber had anie particular name, whereunto answer was made, that it was called Jerusalem. Then said the king; Lauds be giuen to the father of heauen, for now I know that I shall die here in this chamber, according to the prophesie of me declared, that I should depart this life in Jerusalem.

Whether this was true that so he spake, as one that gaue too much credit to folish prophesies & vaine tales, or whether it was fained, as in such cases it commonlie happeneth, we leaue it to the aduised reader to iudge. His bodie with all funerall pompe was conueied vnto Cantuarburie, and there solemnlie buried, leaving behind him by the ladie Marie daughter to the lord Humfrie Bohun earle of Hereford and Northampton, Henrie pzince of Wales, Thomas duke of Clarence, John duke of Bedford, Hum-frie duke of Gloucester, Blanch duchesse of Bawter, and Philip quene of Denmarke: by his last wife Jane, he had no children. This king was of a meane stature, well proportioned, and forsmallie compact, quicke and liuelie, and of a stout courage. In his latter daies he shewed himselfe so gentle, that he gat moze loue amongst the nobles and people of this realme, than he had purchased malice and euill will in the beginning.

But yet to speake a truth, by his proceedings, after he had attained to the crowne, what with such taxes, tallages, subsidies, and exactions as he was constrained to charge the people with; and what by punishing such as moued with disdeine to see him visurpe the crowne (contrarie to the oth taken at his entring into this land, vpon his retorne from exile) did at sundrie times rebell against him, he wan himselfe moze hatred, than in all his life time (if it had bene longer by manie yeares than it was) had bene possible for him to haue wooed out & remoued. And yet doubtelie, worthe were his subiects to tast of that bitter cup, sithens they were so readie to ioinie and clappe hands with him, for the depossing of their rightfull and naturall pzince king Richard, whose chefe fault rested onlie in that, that he was too bountifull to his friends, and too mercifull to his foes; spe-ciallie if he had not bene dyatone by others, to seeke reuenge of those that abused his good and courteous nature. ¶ But now to retorne to the matter present.
The duke of Clarence immediatlie vpon knowlege had of his father king Henrie the fourth his death, returned out of Guen into England, with the earle of Angolesme, and other prisoners.

Now will we rehearse what writers of our English nation liued in the daies of this king. That renowned poet Geffrie Chaucer is wortheilie named as pzin cipall, a man so exquisitlie learned in all sciences, that his match was not lightlie found any where in those daies; and for reducing our English tong to a perfect conformitie, he hath excelled therein altogether; he departed this life about the yeare of our Lord 1402, as Bale gathereth: but by other it appeareth, that he decessed the five and thientith of October in the yeare 1400, and lieth buried at Westminster, in the south part of the great church there, as by a ma-nument erected by Nicholas Bigham it doth ap-peare. John Colver descended of that wortheilie familie of the Colvers of Sittenham in Northfolke (as Leland noteth) studies not onelie the common lawes of this realme, but also other kinds of literatures, and great knowledge in the same, namelie hypoteticall inventions, applieng his inuention with Chaucer, to garnish the English tong, in bringing it from a rude imperfection, vnto a moze apt elegancie: for whereas before those daies, the learned vsed to write onelie in Latine or French, and not in English, our tong remained verie barren, rude, and imperfect; but now by the diligent industrie of Chaucer and Gower, it was within a while greatly amended, so as it grew not onely verie rich and plentifull in words, but also so proper and apt to expresse that which the mind conceived, as anie other vsuall language. Gower departed this life shortly after the decesse of his deere and louing friend Chaucer; to wit, in the yeare 1402, being then come to great age, and blind for a certaine time before his death. He was buried in the church of saint Marie Querries in Southwarke.

Pozeuour, Hugh Legat bozne in Hertfordshyre, and a monk of saint Albons, wrote scholies vpon Archytrenius of John Huanuill, and also vpon Boetius De consolatione; Roger Allington, chancelor of the vniuerſitie of Oxforb, a great ſophiſter, & an enemy to the doctrine of Wickliſſe; John Botrell, a logician; Nicholas Cozham, bozne in a village of the ſame name in Hertfordshyre, a Dominike frier, firſt proceeded maſter of art in Orenford, and after going to Paris, became the French kings confeſſor; and therefore hath bene of ſome taken to be a French man; John Killethull, ſo called of a monaſterie in the weſt parties of this realme thereof he was go-uernour; Walter Wiſſe, ſo called of a towne in Dorſolke where he was bozne, firſt a Carmelite frier profeſſed in Dorwich, and after going to Cambridge, he there proceeded doctoꝝ, he was alſo confeſſor to the duke of Lancaster, and to his wiſſe the ducheſſe Conſtance, & a great ſetter forth of pope Ar-bans cauſe againſt the other popes that were by him and thoſe of his faction named the antipapes; Thomas Waldon, ſo called of the towne of that name in Eſſex where he was bozne; John Edo, defended out of Wales by lineage, and bozne in Herefordshyre, a Franciſcane frier.

Adde to the forenamed, Nicholas Fakingham, bozne in Pozzfolke, a greie frier, proceeded doctor in Wrenford, a great diuine, and an excellent philosopher, ppointual of his order here in England; Lawrence Holbecke, a monke of Ramfe, well sene in the Hebrue towng, and wroze thereof a dictionarie; John Colton, archbishop of Ardmach; John Sparrie, so called of a village in Pozkeshire where he was bozne, a Carmelite of Doncaster; Richard Gesefer bozne in Pozzfolke, a diuine, and an Augustine frier in Pozzwich; John Lathburie, a Franciscane frier of Reading; Nicholas Pount; Richard Scrope bozther to William Scrope, lord treasurer of England, studied in Cambridge, and proceeded there doctor of both the lawes, became an aduocat in the court of Rome, and afterwards was advanced to the gouernement of the see of Couentre and Lichfield, and at length was removed from thence, and made archbishop of Pozke, he wroze an inuectiue against king Henrie, and at length lost his head, as before ye haue heard; John Wrotham, a Carmelite frier of London, and after made warden of an house of his order in Calis.

Furthermore, John Colbie, a Carmelite frier of Portwich; William Horpe a northerne man borne, and student in Orenford, an excellent diuine, and an earnest follower of that famous cleark John Wilkiffe, a notable preacher of the tooke, and expelling his doctrine no lesse in trade of life, than in speach, he was at length apprehended by commandement of the archbishop of Canturburie Thomas Arundell, and committed to prison in Saltwode castell, where at length he died; Stepan Patrington, borne in John kethire, a frier Carmelite, provinciall of his order through England, of which booke there were at that season 1500 within this land, he was bishop of saint Dauides, and confessor; to king Henrie the first, about the fift yeare of whose reigne he decessed; Robert Pascall, a Carmelite frier of Aulobus, confessor also to the said k. who made him bishop of Hereford; Reginald Langham, a frier minor of Norwich; Actonus Dominicans; Thomas Palmer, warden of the Blacke friers within the cite of London; Boston of Wurt, a monke of the abbeye of Wurt in Suffolke, wrote a catalog of all the wyters of the church, and other treatises.

Successor, Thomas Beuerell, a frier Carmelite, borne in Suffolke, he was advanced to the see of Worcester in Ireland by Richard the second, and after by pope Boniface the ninth remoued to London in Wales, and from thence called by Henrie the fourth with consent of pope Gregorie the twelfth, to go uerne the see of Worcester, and so continueth bishop of that cite, until he ended his life in the yeare of our Lord 1418, which was about the first yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the sixth; John Purueie, an excellent diuine, proceeded master of art in Oxen-ford, he was apprehended for such doctrine as he taught, contrarie to the ordinances of the church of Rome, and was at length compelled by Thomas Arundell, archbishop of Cantuarburie, to recant at Pauls crosse seuen speciall articles, he wrote di-uerse treatises, & was the second time committed to prison in king Henrie the sixth his daies, by Henrie Chicheleie, that succeeded Arundell in gouernement of the church of Cantuarburie; William Holme, a greie frier (and a good physitian for curing diseases of the bodie, whatsoeuer his physicke was for) the soule he liued untill Henrie the sixth his daies, and deceased about the fourth yeare of his reigne; Nicholas Bafard, a blacke frier, a doctor of diuinitie profess'd at Oxenford; Thomas Rabburne, archdeacon of Sudburie, and bishop of saint Dauids in Wales, succeeding after Stephan Warrington, he wrote a chronicle, and certeine epistles (as Iohn Bale noteth.)

Finalitie and to conclude, Nicholas Wilson, who being sore grieved in mind, as diuerse other in those daies, to consider what inconuenience rebounded to the church, by reason of the strife and bzingling among the prelates for the acknowledging of a lawfull pope two or thre still contending for that dignitie, wrote a booke, intituled De tollendo schismate; John Walter, an excellent mathematician, being first brought top of a scholer in the college of Wyndhesler, and after studied at Orenford; Thomas of Newmarke, taking that surname of the towne in Cambridgeshire where he was borne, he for his worthinesse (as was thought) was made bishop of Careleill, well sene both in other sciences, and also in diuinitie; William Auger a Franciscane frier, of an house of that order in Bzidgewater; Peter Audell a graie frier, and of his order the ppsouciall here in England; John Langton, a Carmelite; Robert Whantham a monke of Cernelle in Dorsetshire, wrote a booke in verse, of the originall and signification of words; William Doxton, a Franciscane frier of Couentrie; Hugh Sneyth, a blacke frier, and a great preacher; Richard Ffolsham a monke of Boxwith; Robert Wimbeldon, a singular diuine, and an excellent preacher, as appeareth by the sermon which he made vpon this text, redder rationem villicationis sue.

Thus farre Henrie Plantagenet sonne to Iohn of Gaunt duke of Lancaster.
